This suit was brought to obtain a decree quieting the title of the United States to a large body of lands in California, acquired under the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo.

These lands, it is stated by counsel, aggregate about 700,000 acres, 61,939 acres of which have heretofore been patented to the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, and for 72,000 acres of which that company has made application for patents. They are thus described in the bill filed by the United States: All the sections of land designated by odd numbers in townships 3 and 4 north, ranges 5, 6, and 7 west; township 1 north, ranges 16, 17, and 18 west; township 6 and the south three fourths of township 7 north, ranges 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, and 19 west; all sections designated by odd numbers as shown by the public surveys, embraced within the townships from number 2 north to number 5 north, both numbers included, and ranges from number 8 west to number 18 west, both numbers included, except sections 23 and 35, in township 4 north, range 15 west, and except sections 1, 11, and 13, in township 3 north, range 15 west; also the unsurveyed lands within said area which will be designated as odd-numbered *sections [25 when the public surveys according to the laws of the United States shall have been extended over such townships—all of the aforesaid lands being surveyed by San Bernardino base and meridian.

The government suggests that the greater portion of these lands have been set apart under authority of the act of Congress of March 3, 1891 (26 Stat. at L. 1095, 1103, chap. 561, § 24), and by the Proclamation of the President of the United States of December 20, 1892 (27 Stat. at L. 1049), as a public reservation.

The principal contention of the United States is that the lands in dispute are in the same category in every respect with those in controversy in United States v. Southern Pacific Railroad Company, 146 U. S. 570 [36:1091], and United States v. Colton Marble & Lime Company and United States v. Southern Pacific Railroad Company, 146 U. S. 615 [36: 1101]; and that, so far as the question of title is concerned, the judgments in those cases have conclusively determined, as between the United States and the Southern Pacific Railroad Company and its privies, the essential facts upon which the government rests its present claim.

Stated in another form, the United States insists that in the former cases the controlling matter in issue was, whether certain maps filed by the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad Company in 1872, and which were accepted by the Land Department as sufficiently designating that company's line of road under the act of Congress of July 27, 1866 (14 Stat. at L. 292, chap. 278), were valid maps of definite location; the United States contending in those cases that they were, and the Southern Pacific Railroad Company contending that they were not, maps of that character; that that issue was determined in favor of the United States; and that as the lands now in dispute are within the limits of the line of road so designated, it is not open to the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, in this proceeding, to question the former determination that such maps sufficiently identified the lands granted to the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad Company by the act of 1866, and were therefore valid maps of definite location.

This position of the government makes it necessary to ascertain what was in issue and 26] what was determined in the *former cases. Did the former adjudication have the scope attributed to it by the United States? If it did, the decision of the present case will not be difficult.

It is necessary to a clear understanding of the question just stated that we should first look at the provisions of the several acts of Congress relating to the Atlantic & Pacific and Southern Pacific Railroad Companies, and which were referred to and construed in the former cases.

The Atlantic & Pacific Railroad Company was incorporated by the act of Congress approved July 27, 1866 (14 Stat. at L. 292, chap. 278), with authority to construct and maintain a line of railroad and telegraph from a point at or near Springfield, Missouri, to the western boundary line of that state, thence by the most eligible railroad route, to be determined by the company, to the Canadian river, thence to Albuquerque on the river Del Norte, thence by way of Agua Frio or other suitable pass to the head waters of the Colorado Chiquito, thence along the 35th parallel of latitude, as near as might be found most suitable for a railroad route, to the Colorado river at such point as might be selected by the company for crossing and "thence by the most practicable and eligible route to the Pacific." § 1. In the aid of the construction of that line Congress granted every odd-numbered section of public land (not mineral) to the amount of twenty alternate sections per mile on each side of such line as the company might adopt through any territory of the United States, and ten alternate sections per mile on each side of the line through any state, to which the United States had full title, and not reserved, sold, granted, or otherwise appropriated, and free from preemption or other claims or rights, "at the time the line of said road is designated by a plot thereof filed in the office of the Commissioner of the General Land Office." § 3.

Section 4 made provision for patents to be issued to the company for lands opposite to and conterminous with each section of 25 miles of road, completed in a good, substantial, and workmanlike manner.

It was also provided that the President of the United States should cause the lands to be surveyed for 40 miles in width *on both sides [27 of the entire line after the general route was fixed, and as fast as the construction of the railroad required; that the grants, rights, and privileges specified in the act of Congress were given and accepted subject to the conditions that the company would commence work within two years from the approval of the act, complete not less than 50 miles per year after the second year; construct, equip, furnish, and complete its main line by July 4, 1878; and if the company made any breach of the conditions imposed, and allowed the same to continue for upwards of one year, then, at any time thereafter, the United States could do any and all acts and things needful and necessary to insure a speedy completion of the road. §§ 6, 8, 9.

By the 18th section of the act the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, a California corporation, was authorized to connect with the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad at such point, near the boundary line of the state, as it deemed most suitable for a railroad line to San Francisco; and to have a uniform gauge and rate of freight or fare with that road; and in consideration thereof, to aid in its construction, "shall have similar grants of land, subject to all the conditions and limitations herein provided, and shall be required to construct its road on the like regulations, as to time and manner, with the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad herein provided for."

The 20th section provided that, the better to accomplish the object of the act, "namely, to promote the public interest and welfare by the construction of said railroad and telegraph line, and keeping the same in working order, and to secure to the government at all times, but particularly in time of war, the use and benefits of the same for postal, military, and other purposes, Congress may, at any time, having due regard for the rights of said Atlantic & Pacific Railroad Company, add to, alter, amend, or repeal this act."

The legislature of California by an act approved April 4, 1870, authorized the Southern Pacific Railroad Company to change the line of its road so as to reach the eastern boundary of the state by such route as the company should determine to be the most practicable. And by joint resolution passed *June 28, [28 1870, Congress declared that that company might construct its road and telegraph line, as near as might be, on the route indicated by the map filed by that company in the Department of the Interior on the 3d day of January, 1867, and "upon the construction of each section of said road in the manner and within the time provided by law, and notice thereof being given by the company to the Secretary of the Interior, he shall direct an examination of each of such sections by commissioners to be appointed by the President, as provided in the act making a grant of land to said company, approved July 27, 1866, and upon the report of the commissioners to the Secretary of the Interior that such section of said railroad and telegraph line has been constructed as required by law, it shall be the duty of the said Secretary of the Interior to cause patents to be issued to said company for the sections of land conterminous to each constructed section reported on as aforesaid, to the extent and amount granted to said company by the said act of July 27, 1866, expressly saving and reserving all the rights of actual settlers, together with the other conditions and restrictions provided for in the 3d section of said act." 16 Stat. at L. 382.

By an act approved March 3, 1871, Congress incorporated the Texas Pacific Railroad Company and made to it a grant of public lands. And by the 23d section of that act it was provided: "That for the purpose of connecting the Texas Pacific Railroad with the city of San Francisco the Southern Pacific Railroad Company of California is hereby authorized (subject to the laws of California) to construct a line of railroad from a point at or near Tehachapi Pass, by way of Los Angeles, to the Texas Pacific Railroad at or near the Colorado river, with the same rights, grants, and privileges, and subject to the same limitations, restrictions, and conditions as were granted to said Southern Pacific Railroad Company of California, by the act of July 27, 1866: Provided, however, That this section shall in no way affect or impair the rights, present or prospective, of the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad Company or any other railroad company." 16 Stat. at L. 573, 579, chap. 122.

29] *The Southern Pacific Railroad Company constructed the road thus contemplated, and claims that the lands here in dispute passed to it under the above act of 1871.

The Atlantic & Pacific Railroad Company built part of its road east of Colorado river, but did not construct any line west of that river or in California.

In consequence of such failure, Congress, by the act of July 6, 1886 (24 Stat. at L. 123, chap. 637), provided "that all the lands, excepting the right of way and the right, power, and authority given to said corporation to take from the public lands adjacent to the line of said road material of earth, stone, timber, and so forth, for the construction thereof, including all necessary grounds for station buildings, workshops, depots, machine shops, switches, side tracks, turntables, and water stations, heretofore granted to the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad Company by an act entitled 'An Act Granting Lands to Aid in the Construction of a Railroad and Telegraph Line from the States of Missouri and Arkansas to the Pacific Coast,' approved July 27, 1866, and subsequent acts and joint resolutions of Congress, which are adjacent to and conterminous with the uncompleted portions of the main line of said road, embraced within both the granted and indemnity limits, as contemplated to be constructed under and by the provisions of the said act of July 27, 1866, and acts and joint resolutions subsequent thereto and relating to the construction of said road and telegraph, be, and the same are hereby, declared forfeited and restored to the public domain."

In execution of that act the United States, in 1889, commenced suits in the circuit court of the United States for the southern district of California for the purpose of quieting its title to various tracts of land, aggregating about 5,342 acres, and claimed by the Southern Pacific Railroad Company and by other corporations and individuals asserting title under that company. In one of those suits, the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, and D.O. Mills and Garrett L. Lansing, trustees under a mortgage executed by that Company on the 1st day of April, 1875, and Joseph Youngblood were made *defendants; in the other, the same [30 company and trustees, together with the City Brick Company, Thomas Goss, Edward Simmons, and A. A. Hubbard, were defendants.

These are the cases reported in 146 U. S. 570, 615 [36: 1091, 1104].

The issues presented by the government in the former suits are fully shown by an amended bill filed therein November 22, 1889. After referring to the organization of the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, and to the act of Congress of July 27, 1866, it proceeds: "Your orator alleges that by and pursuant to said act of Congress, the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad Company was created and duly organized, and on November 23, 1866, within the time and in the manner provided in said act, accepted said grant, and did designate the line of its route from Springfield, Missouri, to the Pacific by maps and plats thereof, which it filed in the office of the Commissioner of the General Land Office in manner following, to wit: On or about March 9, 1872, said company filed in the office of the Commissioner of the General Land Office maps designating the line of its route, and showing the general features of the country and vicinity, as follows: First—From San Francisco to San Miguel Mission in California. Second—Map of its route from San Miguel Mission via Santa Barbara and San Buenaventura, to a point in township 2 south, range 17 west, San Bernardino base and meridian, in California. Third—Map of its route from said point last mentioned to a point in township 7 north, range 7 east, San Bernardino base and meridian, in California. Fourth—Map of its route from said point last named to the Colorado river. And thereafter, on or about March, 1872, said company filed in said office as aforesaid its several other maps, designating its route from said point last named to Springfield in the state of Missouri, making altogether a continuous line designating its entire route, and showing the general features of the country from said town of Springfield, Missouri, by way of the points named in said act of Congress of July 27, 1866, to the Pacific at San Buenaventura, and from there to San Francisco, and in the manner provided in said act, and such designation was accepted by the United States. *Your orator alleges that [31 said several parts of its map, filed as aforesaid, made and constituted the entire route or line of said Atlantic & Pacific Railroad Company, fully designating the whole thereof."

It was further averred that "on March 9, 1872, and on April 22, 1872, the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of the General Land Office, respectively, ordered all the odd sections of land within 30 miles on each side of said designated route of said Atlantic & Pacific Railroad Company reserved from sale and withdrawn;" that said Atlantic &

Pacific Railroad Company did construct and complete a portion of its road west of Springfield, Missouri, in the time and manner required by said act, but did not at any time construct or complete any railroad west of the Colorado river; and that by the act of Congress approved July 6, 1886, "all the lands and rights to lands theretofore granted and conferred upon said Atlantic & Pacific Railroad Company were forfeited, resumed, and restored to entry for noncompletion of that portion of said railroad to have been constructed in California."

After alleging that the Southern Pacific Railroad Company was not the company of that name organized under certain articles of amalgamation and consolidation, dated October 11, 1870, and amended April 11, 1871, but was the now existing company of that name, and after setting out the 23d section of the act of Congress of March 3, 1871, incorporating the Texas & Pacific Railroad Company (16 Stat. at L. 573, chap. 122), and granting lands to the Southern Pacific Railroad Company for the line therein described, the amended bill in the former suits proceeded: "Said Southern Pacific Railroad Company, the corporation which existed on April 3, 1871, as heretofore shown, pretended to accept said grant on April 3, 1871, and did on that day designate the line of its road by a plat thereof, which it filed in the office of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and thereupon the Secretary of the Interior ordered all the public lands in odd sections within 30 miles of such route, to which no right or claim had attached, to be withdrawn from market and reserved. And your [32] orator *alleges that the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, which was organized and created on August 12, 1873, by the pretended articles of amalgamation and consolidation of said several railroad companies as heretofore set forth, did construct and complete a railroad from Tehachapi Pass, by way of Los Angeles to the Colorado river, in the manner and within the time prescribed in said act of Congress, in which the Southern Pacific Railroad Company therein named was authorized and empowered to do. And thereafter the commissioners appointed under said act for that purpose did unlawfully make and file their alleged acceptance of the whole of said railroad by sections. And there was not, and is not now, any railroad or part thereof constructed or completed under said act or between said points otherwise than as aforesaid."

It was also alleged that "on the south side of said route of the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad Company within 30 miles of said route, but also within 20 miles of the pretended designated route of the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, there was not on July 27, 1866, nor on March 12, 1872, nor on April 3, 1871, and is not now, enough public land in the odd sections to equal in amount ten alternate sections per mile of the line of road of said Atlantic & Pacific Railroad Company, within such limits, for that prior to said date of July 27, 1866, the Mexican government and the United States had sold, granted, reserved, and otherwise disposed of so great a quantity of land in those limits;" also, that "all of the said lands before described are situated on the south side of the said designated route of the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad Company more than 20 miles but less than 30 miles therefrom, but are less than 20 miles from the said pretended designated route of said Southern Pacific Railroad Company."

The amended bill concludes by alleging that the defendants and either of them have no title or interest in or to the lands described, "for that said pretended patents under which defendants solely claim title were issued inadvertently, without authority, and were at their inception, and still are, each void and inoperative to pass title, and that said lands were never granted to said Southern Pacific Railroad Company, *defendant herein, but are still [33 owned by the plaintiff;" and that the Secretary of the Interior, on the 16th day of August, 1887, on behalf of the government, and in accordance with law, demanded of said company the relinquishment of its claim to all of the lands described in such patents, and a return of the patents, all of which that company refused to do.

The relief asked was a decree cancelling the patents issued to the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, quieting the title of the government to the lands described therein, and enjoining that company from asserting or claiming any right or title thereto adversely to the United States.

The answer of the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, filed in the former suits December 30, 1889, shows its understanding as to what were the issues tendered by the government. From that answer these extracts are made:

"The defendant admits that by and under said last-mentioned act of Congress [July 27, 1866], the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad Company was created and organized, and did duly accept the provisions of the said law within the time and in the manner provided in said act, but it denies that said Atlantic & Pacific Railroad Company did designate the line of its route from Springfield, in the state of Missouri, to the Pacific coast, as required by said act.

"This defendant denies that on the 9th of March, 1872, or at or about any such time, the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad Company filed in the office of the Commissioner of the General Land Office maps designating the line of its route, or otherwise in accordance with the law, and denies that on or about the 9th March, 1872, said Atlantic & Pacific Railroad Company filed four maps in the office of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, as stated in said bill. Said company filed two maps and claimed that they were filed for the purpose of locating parts or fragments of a line for its road in the state of California, but the defendant denies that said maps constituted a valid location of said road in California. Certified copies of said maps are annexed to the answer heretofore filed in this suit by this defendant and marked 'Exhibit A,' Nos. 1 and 2, which, with the indorsements *thereon, [34 are now herein referred to and made part of this answer; and this defendant says that said railroad was not located or attempted to be located on or about March 9, 1872, or at any such time, in California, either in whole or in part, otherwise than as aforesaid by said maps. This defendant denies that the Atlantic &

Pacific Railroad Company by or through the filing of said maps, acquired the right to any lands of the United States lying opposite to the lines or route marked on said maps, and denies that said company acquired the right to select any public lands along said routes or lines as 'other lands' in lieu of sections within 20 miles that had been granted, sold, 'reserved, occupied by homestead settlers, or pre-empted or otherwise disposed of' by the United States. These maps were sent to the General Land Office by the Secretary of the Interior with a letter dated March 9, 1872, of which a certified copy is annexed to said answer heretofore filed, marked 'Exhibit B.'

"This defendant says that the lands mentioned in the amended bill herein lie opposite to the line of route marked on the said map, designated in said letter as No. 2 of a portion of the proposed road of the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad Company, that is, a piece of road within the state of California, 'from a point on the western boundary line of Los Angeles county, California, to a point in township 7 north, range 7 east, of San Bernardino meridian in said state.' Neither when filed in March, 1872, nor at any such time, did it appear that said map represented any part of a line that was, or was intended to be, enjoined to any other part located before that time for the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad.

"Further answering, this defendant says that the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad Company afterwards, viz., on the 13th day of August, 1872, filed in the Department of the Interior two other maps which it claimed were intended to designate the line of other fragments or portions of its railroad in California. Certified copies of said maps and of the letter of the Secretary of the Interior of April 16, 1874, in respect thereto, are annexed to the answer filed 35] heretofore in this suit by this *defendant, marked 'Exhibit C.' Nos. 1 and 2, and are now herein referred to and made part of this answer. And this defendant denies that said maps constituted a valid location of the parts or fractions of road therein described, and denies that the four maps hereinbefore mentioned of four several parts of the road constituted a valid location of the said Atlantic & Pacific Railroad in California. And it denies that the said Atlantic & Pacific Railroad was ever in any other wise lawfully located in the state of California. . . . And the defendant says that there is nothing in or upon said maps to identify the same as the line of road mentioned in the said act of Congress."

After referring to the 18th section of the act of July 27, 1866, and alleging that the construction of a railroad from the Colorado river to San Francisco was "expressly relegated and appropriated to this defendant," and that the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad Company was never authorized to construct any such line of railroad, or to acquire any lands by reason of or in respect of the construction or proposed construction of any such line, the answer of the Southern Pacific Railroad Company denied that, "on or about March, 1872, the Atlantic & Pacific Company filed in the office of the Commissioner of the General Land Office maps designating its route from the Colorado river to Springfield, in the state of Missouri," or that "said maps made altogether the line of railroad from Springfield, in the state of Missouri, to the Pacific coast, which was provided for and required by said act of Congress of July 27, 1866, to be constructed and completed by the said Atlantic & Pacific Railroad Company," or "that the several parts of its map filed made and constituted the whole of its line as provided for in said act of Congress;" that the parts of its map, "when taken together, showed a line terminating at San Francisco, which was not the terminus provided for by said act of Congress." The answer also denied that on March 9, 1872, and April 22, 1872, or at any such times, the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of the General Land Office ordered all the odd sections of land within 30 miles on each side of the designated route *of the said Atlantic & Pacific Railroad [36 Company reserved from sale and withdrawn; that about April 22, 1872, the Commissioner of the General Land Office ordered lands withdrawn for 30 miles on each side of the parts of lines of route attempted to be located March 9, 1872, by the two maps hereinbefore mentioned as filed March 9, 1872, his orders being addressed to the register and receiver of the United States land office at San Bernardino, Los Angeles, and Visalia, and were substantially as shown by the certified copy of the Commissioner's letter of said date to the officers at Los Angeles; but the defendant denied that the orders of April 22, 1872, had any effect whatever upon its rights and grants, and were intended only to take effect upon public lands not reserved, sold, granted, or otherwise appropriated at the time of filing said maps, March 9, 1872.

The defendant averred that "the lands involved in this suit had previously, on the 3d April, 1871, by the filing of the map of definite location of the defendant's railroad, been duly reserved from sale by and under the said 23d section of the act of Congress of March 3, 1871, and the 6th section of the act of Congress of July 27, 1866, which said sections are quoted in the bill of complaint herein, and avers also that said lands had been duly withdrawn from market and appropriated for the use of this defendant by the order of the Commissioner of the General Land Office to the register and receiver of the United States land office at Los Angeles, issued April 21, 1871, a copy of which is hereto annexed, marked 'R,' and made a part of this answer."

Admitting that the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad Company did construct and complete a portion of its road west of Springfield, Missouri, in the time and manner required by said act, but averring that that company did not at any time construct or complete any railroad west of the Colorado river, the defendant averred that "on the 3d April, 1871, it designated the line of its said railroad, as described in said § 23, by a map thereof, filed in the office of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and thereupon the said Commissioner ordered all the public lands in odd sections within *30 miles of such route to be withdrawn[37 from market. Certified copy of the map filed by this defendant in the office of the Commissioner of the General Land Office is annexed to the answer heretofore filed by this defendant, marked 'Exhibit D,' and the same is now referred to and made part of this answer;" that "it is the same railroad company that constructed the railroad provided for in the 23d section of said act of Congress of March 3, 1871, and that it fully constructed and completed its road according to said act, and the construction thereof bas been accepted and approved by the President of the United States, construction of the last mile of said road having been accepted by President Hayes on the 23d of January, 1878."

The Southern Pacific Railroad Company admitted in its answer that the line which the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad claimed to have located in California "crosses the line of the Southern Pacific Railroad located under the act of March 3, 1871," but alleged "that under and by virtue of said act of March 3, 1871, and the map of location filed on the 3d day of April, 1871, the lands described in said patent were reserved for and appropriated to tbis defendant, whose title thereto has become perfect and complete by the construction of its road as prescribed in said act," and that "the said Atlantic & Pacific Railroad Company's pretended line was not located until subsequent to the year 1871; that when sougbt or pretended to be located, it was found to be on a wholly unauthorized route, not prescribed or permitted under any act of Congress in relation to or affecting said Atlantic & Pacific Railroad Company."

The answer of the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, in the former cases, also contained these paragraphs:

"This defendant admits that on the south side of the pretended location of the Atlantic & Pacific road, and within 30 miles thereof, but also within 20 miles of the locatlon of the Southern Pacific Railroad, tbere was not on April 3, 1871, and is not now, enough public land in the odd sections to equal ten alternate sections per mile on each side of the pretended location of the line of the said Atlantic & Pacific 38] *Railroad Company within such limits, and this defendant admits that tbe above-described tracts of land are situated more than 20 miles and less than 30 miles from tbe line of the pretended location of tbe Atlantic & Pacific Railroad, and less than 20 miles from the said located line of tbe Southern Pacific Railroad.

"This defendant avers that said tracts of land have been granted, by the 23d section of the act of March 3, 1871, to it, the Southern Pacific Railroad Company. . . .

"This defendant admits that, under date of March 29, 1876, April 4, 1879, and December 27, 1883, the patents were issued to this defendant for the lands hereinabove descrlbed, but denied that such patents were issued inadvertently or without authority. On the contrary, this defendant avers that said patents were issued wlth due deliberation and in strict conformity with the law, and that the signatures of the President of the United States and the recorder of the General Land Office thereto were affixed fairly and properly and under the autbority of law. This defendant here refers to the Exhibit 1, Nos. 1 and 2, annexed to its answer heretofore filed, and makes the same part of this answer,

"When the grant of lands was made to this defendant, March 3, 1871, and its grant was located, April 3, 1871, all the lands involved in this case were public lands of the United States."

To this answer a general replication was filed.

The pleadings in the former suits show that the government based its claim to relief upon certain grounds that were distinctly controverted by tbe Southern Pacific Railroad Company. Those grounds were:

That the grant by Congress of public lands to the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad Company was before the grant to the Soutbern Pacific Railroad Company;

That when the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad Company designated its line by a plat thereof filed in the office of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, as required by Congress, it acquired an inchoate title to the lands granted, *that is, a right to earn them [39 and to obtain a complete title by construction of its road;

That the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad Company, by certain maps and plats filed in the office of the Commissioner of the General Land Office in 1872 and fully identified both in the bill and answer—which maps were accepted by the Interior Department as adequate and valid—sufficiently designated, as required by the act of 1866, an entire line from San Francisco via San Miguel Mission, Santa Barbara, San Buenaventura, and the Colorado river to Springfield, Missouri, so as to become entitled, as of the date of tbe grant of July 27, 1866, to earn the lands appertaining to the line so designated;

That the lands then in controversy appertained to the line of road, and were within the exterior lines of the route, so designated, were among the lands granted to the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad Company, and in consequence of such designation were withdrawn by the Secretary of the Interior from sale or preemption for the benefit of that company; and,

Tbat the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad Company having failed to meet the conditions of the grant by constructing its road in California, the lands to which it had acquired an inchoate title by means of the accepted map designating its line were "restored to the public domain," under the above act of July 6, 1886 (24 Stat. at L. 123, chap. 637), and were not left, upon such statutory forfeiture, to be earned by the Southern Pacific Railroad Company under the junior grant.

Tbe Southern Pacific Railroad Company controverted the material allegations of the government's bill and amended bill, and made defense upon tbese among other grounds:

That the only designation of a line or route ever made by tbe Atlantic & Pacific Railroad Company was one of an entire line from Springfield to San Francisco, and tbat it had no authority to establish, designate, or locate any such extended line;

That the maps of 1872 filed by the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad Company, which were referred to in the bill, and also made parts of the company's answer, were not sufficient *to identify [40 any specific lands west of the Colorado river; were not therefore maps of definite location; and that that company never made any sufficient location or designation of a line in California, so that it could claim the lands in dispute under the grant made by the act of 1866;

That the lands in question were covered by the location made by the Southern Pacific Railroad Company under the act of Congress granting lands to it, and were part of those withdrawn from sale and in its favor by the Secretary of the Interior; and,

That, in any view, the right of the Southern Pacific Railroad Company to those lands attached and became complete upon the forfeiture of the lands and rights granted to the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad Company, such forfeiture—it was claimed—not affecting the rights previously acquired by the Southern Pacific Railroad under the accepted maps of the definite location of its line, and under the withdrawal from sale of the lands appertaining to that line.

In the former suits it was conceded that if the maps filed by the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad Company in 1872 were valid maps of definite location, sufficiently identifying the lands granted to it, then the lands involved in those suits were within the overlapping limits of the two grants.

The learned counsel for the railroad company in those cases contended that, in order to show a conflict between the claims of the two companies to the particular lands then in controversy, the United States must show that the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad Company designated its route under the act of 1866, and that there was no proof of that fact "except that the Atlantic & Pacific Company from time to time filed certain fragmentary maps pretending to designate routes, and which, if connected, would not constitute a route such as the act of 1866 authorized it to select." This general point, counsel argued, resolved itself into three subsidiary questions, namely: "1. Whether the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad Company ever designated its route. Whether such a designation, if made, operated, from the mere circumstance that the grant to that company 41] was prior in time to that made to *the Southern Pacific Company, to exclude the lands in the overlapping limits at the place of crossing from the latter grant. 3. Whether, if such designation was made, the proviso in the 23d section of the above act of March 3, 1871, protecting the rights, 'present and prospective,' of the Atlantic & Pacific Company, was designed for any other purpose than to save to it any lands which it might eventually earn by a full performance of its undertaking."

Manifestly the fundamental question in the former cases was whether the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad Company ever filed any such maps as the act of 1866 contemplated when declaring that the odd-numbered sections granted should be those on the line of the road to which the United States had full title, not reserved, sold, granted or otherwise appropriated, and free from pre-emption or other claims or rights, "at the time the line of said road is designated by a plat thereof, filed in the office of the Commissioner of the General Land Office."

In those cases the circuit court denied the relief asked and dismissed the bills filed by the United States. 39 Fed. Rep. 132, 40 Fed. Rep. 611, 45 Fed. Rep. 596, 46 Fed. Rep. 683. But this court reversed the judgment so rendered, holding—

That the grants to the Atlantic & Pacific and the Southern Pacific Railroad Companies were in præsenti, that is to say, the route not being at the time determined, the grant was in the nature of a float, no title attaching to any specific sections until they were capable of identification;

That when the granted lands were once identified by approved maps of definite location, the grants severally took effect by relation as of the dates of the respective acts of Congress—the grant to the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad Company being prior in time to that made to the Southern Pacific Railroad Company;

That the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad Company did file maps of definite location in 1872, which were "received and approved by the Land Department as maps of definite location;" that then "the specific tracts were designated, and to them the title of the Atlantic & Pa- [42 cific attached as of July 27, 1866;" that "in fact the line of definite location of the Atlantic & Pacific was established, and maps thereof filed and approved, before any action in that respect was taken by the Southern Pacific Company;" and that "there was never a time, therefore, at which the grant of the Southern Pacific could be said to have attached to these lands, and the plausible argument based thereon, made by counsel for the Southern Pacific Company, falls to the ground;"

That the map filed by the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, April 3, 1871, could not have been a map of definite location, but was "only of the general route, and there was then no designation of lands to which the Southern Pacific Company's title could attach;"

That it was immaterial whether the map of definite location of the Southern Pacific road was filed and approved before or after April 11, 1872, "for when filed the grant could take effect by relation only as of March 3, 1871 [the date of the grant to it], and at that time, and for nearly five years theretofore, the title to these lands had been in the Atlantic & Pacific;" nor was it material that the act of 1871 "in terms purports to bestow the same rights, grants, and privileges as were granted to the Southern Pacific Railroad Company by the act of 1866," for that merely defined "the extent of the grant and the character of the rights and privileges" given, and did "not operate to make the latter grant take effect by relation as of the date of the prior grant, and thus subject the grants to the two companies to the rule controlling contemporaneous grants as established by St. Paul & Sioux City Railroad v. Winona & St. Peter Railroad, 112 U. S. 730 [28: 876], and Sioux City & St. Paul Railroad v. Chicago, Milwaukee & St. P. Railway, 117 U. S. 406 [29: 928]," that "even if Congress had in terms expressed an intent to that effect in a subsequent act, it was not competent by such legislation to devest the rights already vested in the Atlantic & Pacific Company;" that the case, stating it in the best way for the railroad company, was one "of two companies with conflicting grants, each of whose line of definite location has been ap-

43] proved *by the Land Department;" and that "unquestionably, the grant older in date takes the land;"

That whatever right or title was acquired by the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, by its map filed April 3, 1871, was absolutely displaced when the Atlantic & Pacific Company's map was filed;" that Congress intended "no scramble between companies for the grasping of titles by priority of location, but that it is to be regarded as though title passes as of the date of the act, and to the company having priority of grant, and, therefore, that in the eye of the law it is now as though there never was a period of time during which any title to these lands was in the Southern Pacific;" so that, "whatever may have been the dates of the filing by the respective companies, the case stands as though the lands granted to the Atlantic & Pacific had been identified in 1866 and title had then passed, and there never was a title of any kind vested in the Southern Pacific Company;" and,

That upon the forfeiture by Congress of the rights granted to the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad Company, the lands to which its grant had attached upon the filing and acceptance of its map of definite location in 1872 did not inure to the benefit of the Southern Pacific Railroad Company; that "if the act of forfeiture had not been passed by Congress, the Atlantic & Pacific could yet construct the road, and that, constructing it, its title to these lands would become perfect;" that "no power but Congress could interfere with this right of the Atlantic & Pacific;" that "Congress, by the act of forfeiture of July 6, 1886, determined what should become of the lands forfeited;" that "it enacted that they be restored to the public domain;" that "the forfeiture was not for the benefit of the Southern Pacific, it was not to enlarge its grant as it stood prior to the act of forfeiture," but was for the benefit of the United States, as shown by the act of Congress declaring that the lands be restored to the public domain; consequently, that by the act of forfeiture, "the title of the Atlantic & Pacific was retaken by the general government, and retaken for its own benefit and not that of the Southern Pacific Company;" and 44] that the lands belonged to the *United States, and the Southern Pacific Railroad Company had "no title of any kind" to them. United States v. Southern Pacific Railroad Company, 146 U. S. 570, 607 [36: 1091, 1102].

Touching the point made in the former cases, that the maps filed by the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad Company designating a line from the Colorado river to San Francisco were inoperative by reason of the want of authority to construct a road to the latter city, the court said: "But it is urged by counsel for defendant that no map of definite location of line between the Colorado river and the Pacific ocean was ever filed by the Atlantic & Pacific or approved by the Secretary of the Interior. This contention is based upon these facts: The Atlantic & Pacific Company claimed that, under its charter, it was authorized to build a road from the Colorado river to the Pacific ocean, and thence along the coast up to San Francisco; and it filed maps thereof in four sections. San Buenaventura was the point where the westward line first touched the Pacific ocean. One of these maps was of that portion of the line extending from the western boundary of Los Angeles county, a point east of San Buenaventura, and through that place to San Miguel Mission, in the direction of San Francisco. In other words, San Buenaventura was not the terminus of any line of definite location from the Colorado river westward, whether shown by one or more maps, but only an intermediate point on one sectional map. When the four maps were filed, and in 1872, the Land Department, holding that the Atlantic & Pacific Company were authorized to build not only from the Colorado river directly to the Pacific ocean, but also thence north to San Francisco, approved them as establishing the line of definite location. Subsequently, and when Mr. Justice Lamar was Secretary of the Interior, the matter was re-examined and it was properly held that under the act of 1866 the grant to the Atlantic & Pacific was exhausted when its line reached the Pacific ocean. San Buenaventura was, therefore, held to be the western terminus, and the location of the line approved to that point. The fact that its line was located, and maps filed thereof in sections, is *immaterial. [45 St. Paul & Pacific Railroad v. Northern Pacific Railroad, 139 U. S. 1 [35: 77]. Indeed, all the transcontinental roads, it is believed, filed their maps of route in sections. So the question is, whether the filing a map of definite location from the Colorado river through San Buenaventura to San Francisco, under a claim of right to construct a road the entire distance, is good as a map of definite location from the Colorado river to San Buenaventura, the latter point being the limit of the grant. We think, unquestionably, it is. Though a party claims more than he is legally entitled to, his claim ought not to be rejected for that to which he has a right. The purpose of filing a map of definite location is to enable the Land Department to designate the lands passing under the grant; and when a map of such a line is filed, full information is given, and, so far as that line may legally extend, the law perfects the title. It surely cannot be that a company must determine at its peril the extent to which its grant may go, or that a mistake in such determination works a forfeiture of all its rights to lands." 146 U. S. 570, 596 [36: 1091, 1098].

The closing paragraph in the opinion in the former cases is in these words: "Our conclusions, therefore, are, that a valid and sufficient map of definite location of its route from the Colorado river to the Pacific ocean was filed by the Atlantic & Pacific Company, and approved by the Secretary of the Interior; that by such act the title to these lands passed, under the grant of 1866, to the Atlantic & Pacific Company, and remained held by it subject to a condition subsequent until the act of forfeiture of 1886; that by that act of forfeiture the title of the Atlantic & Pacific was retaken by the general government, and retaken for its benefit, and not that of the Southern Pacific Company, and that the latter company has no title of any kind to these lands." 146 U. S. 607 [36: 1102].

In the cases of United States v. Colton Marble

& Lime Company and United States v. Southern Pacific Railroad Company, 146 U. S. 615 [36: 1104], it was adjudged that the proviso in the act of March 3, 1871 (16 Stat. at L. 573, chap. 122) giving lands in aid of the construction of the Southern Pacific Railroad), that the grant should "in no way affect or impair the rights, 46] present or *prospective, of the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad Company," operated to except the indemnity lands of the Atlantic & Pacific Company from the grant to the Southern Pacific Company.

The former cases were decided in this court on the 12th day of December, 1892.

A petition for rehearing was presented to several members of the court, but a rehearing was not granted. In that petition the Southern Pacific Railroad Company insisted that this court had erred in various particulars, among them the following:

In not giving due legal effect to the forfeiture act of July 6, 1886, its contention—as on the original hearing—being that the legal operation and effect of that act were to avoid the grant to the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad Company as of the date of the act of 1866, and to restore to the United States, as of that date, the title to all the lands embraced in the forfeiture, leaving nothing in the way of the full enjoyment by the Southern Pacific Railroad Company of the grant made to it; consequently, that all proceedings taken by the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad Company, under the act of 1866, were avoided and defeated as absolutely and effectually as if the grant had never been made and no proceedings taken in execution of it; and,

In respect to the "designation of line under the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad maps and the effect and operation thereof."

The present suit was brought by the United States against the Southern Pacific Railroad Company and D. O. Mills and G. L. Lansing as trustees in a mortgage executed by that company on the 1st day of April, 1875 (the same trustees and mortgage referred to in the former cases), as well as against certain individuals and corporations, to quiet the title of the United States to the lands involved in this suit. It was pending at the time the former cases were decided in this court. The lands now in controversy are situated opposite to and are conterminous with the first, second, and fourth sections of the Southern Pacific Railroad as con-47] structed *between 1873 and 1877, inclusive, and within the primary and indemnity limits of the grant to the Southern Pacific Railroad Company made by the 23d section of the Texas & Pacific act of March 3, 1871; the 61,939.62 acres patented to that company being opposite to the first and fourth sections of its road. It may be said that the lands here in dispute belong to one or the other of the following classes: Land within the common granted limits of both the Atlantic & Pacific grant of 1866 and the Southern Pacific grant of 1871; lands within the granted limits of the Southern Pacific grant and the indemnity limits of the Atlantic & Pacific grant; lands within the Southern Pacific indemnity limits and the Atlantic & Pacific granted limits; lands within the common indemnity limits of both grants. Of those in dispute, 219,012.93 acres have not been surveyed by the United States.

But all the lands now in dispute are within the limits of the grant to the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad Company, if the maps filed by that company in 1872, and which were approved by the Land Department, are to be regarded as maps of definite location. This is substantially admitted to be a correct statement of the controlling question before the court; for the defendants, in their very able argument, state that the lands involved in the suit "are within the limits which would have appertained to the grant to the Atlantic & Pacific upon the 1872 route, if that had been an authorized route, and if a definite location had been duly made thereon so as to attach the grant to specific lands."

The contingencies here suggested have been fully met by this court; for it was distinctly adjudged, in the former cases, as between the government and the Southern Pacific Railroad Company (146 U. S. 570, 596 [36:1091, 1098]), that the maps filed in 1872 sufficiently identified the lands granted to the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad Company on the contemplated line between the Colorado river and San Buenaventura on the Pacific coast, although, for want of authority in that company to construct a railroad to San Francisco, they did not secure to the company any lands north of San Buenaventura; that is, those maps were directly adjudged to be maps adequately *fixing [48 or locating the line of the road under the act of 1866. The records of those cases having been introduced in the present suit, there is no room for doubt—if those records are competent evidence—as to what was in issue and what was adjudged in the former cases. The maps which in this case are relied upon by the United States as maps of definite location, and which the Southern Pacific Railroad Company denies to be of that character, are the identical maps which the government relied on in the former cases, and the same which that company referred to and made part of its answer in the former litigation, and which were adjudged by this court, in conformity with the contention of the government, to be valid maps of definite location, the acceptance of which made it impossible for the Southern Pacific Railroad Company to acquire any interest in any lands granted to the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad Company that were forfeited to the United States by the act of 1886.

It is said, however, that, under the pleadings and evidence in this collateral proceeding it is open to the Southern Pacific Railroad Company to renew the contest as to the sufficiency of the maps of 1872 filed by the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad Company and to show that they were not maps of definite location.

Is this position consistent with the settled rule of law as to the conclusiveness, between parties and their privies, of the final determination by a court of competent jurisdiction of matters put in issue by the pleadings?

The importance of this question, independently of the magnitude of the interests to be affected by our decision, and of the earnest contention of learned counsel, justifies a reference to some of the adjudged cases, showing the grounds upon which this salutary rule rests.

The general principle announced in numerous cases is that a right, question, or fact distinctly put in issue and directly determined by a court of competent jurisdiction, as a ground of recovery, cannot be disputed in a subsequent suit between the same parties or their privies; and even if the second suit is for a different cause of action, the right, question, or 49] fact *once so determined must, as between the same parties or their privies, be taken as conclusively established, so long as the judgment in the first suit remains unmodified. This general rule is demanded by the very object for which civil courts have been established, which is to secure the peace and repose of society by the settlement of matters capable of judicial determination. Its enforcement is essential to the maintenance of social order: for the aid of judicial tribunals would not be invoked for the vindication of rights of person and property, if, as between parties and their privies, conclusiveness did not attend the judgments of such tribunals in respect of all matters properly put in issue and actually determined by them.

Among the cases in this court that illustrate the general rule are Hopkins v. Lee, 19 U. S. 6 Wheat. 109, 113 [5:218, 219]; Smith v. Kernochen, 48 U. S. 7 How. 198, 216 [12:666, 673]; Thompson v. Roberts, 65 U. S. 24 How. 233, 240 [16:648, 650]; Washington, Alexandria, & Georgetown S. P. Co. v. Sickles, 65 U. S. 24 How. 333, 340, 341, 343 (16:650, 652, 653]; Russell v. Place, 94 U. S. 606, 608 [24:214, 215]; Cromwell v. Sac County, 94 U. S. 351 [24:195]; Campbell v. Rankin, 99 U. S. 261 [25:435]; Mason Lumber Co. v. Buchtel, 101 U. S. 638 [25:1072]; Bissell v. Spring Valley Township, 124 U. S. 225, 230 [31:411, 413]; and Johnson Co. v. Wharton, 152 U. S. 253 [38:430].

In Hopkins v. Lee—which was a suit in equity by the purchaser of land to compel the vendor to remove certain encumbrances upon it—it was held that a fact established therein and made the basis of a decree could not be disputed in a subsequent action of covenant brought by the latter against the former for not conveying certain lands, part of the consideration, the court saying that the rule on that subject had found its way into every system of jurisprudence, not only from its obvious fitness and propriety, but because without it an end could not be put to litigation; in Smith v. Kernochen—which was ejectment by an assignee of a mortgage to recover possession of the mortgaged premises—that a final decree, in a previous suit, brought by the mortgagee against the mortgagor to foreclose the mortgage, adjudging the mortgage to be invalid for want of authority in the mortgagor to execute it, concluded the question of title, the court
50] observing *that the case came within the general rule that the judgment of a court of concurrent jurisdiction directly upon the point is as a plea, a bar, or as evidence conclusive between the same parties or their privies upon the same matters when brought directly in question in another court; in Thompson v. Roberts, that the judgment of a court of law, or a decree of a court of equity, directly upon the same point, and between the same parties, is good as a plea in bar, and conclusive when given in evidence in a subsequent suit; in Washington, Alexandria, & Georgetown S. P. Co. v. Sickles, that to the end that rights might be secured and the repose of society preserved, and that limits might be imposed upon the faculties of litigation, the presumption had been adopted that the thing adjudged by a court of competent jurisdiction, under definite conditions, shall be received in evidence "as irrefragable truth," such a presumption being a guaranty of the future efficiency and binding operation of the judgment; in Cromwell v. Sac County, that a judgment upon the merits constitutes an absolute bar to a subsequent suit upon the same cause of action in respect to every matter offered and received in evidence, or which might have been offered to sustain or defeat the claim in controversy, while if the second action is upon a different claim or demand, the judgment in the prior action operates as an estoppel only as to those matters in issue or points controverted upon the determination of which the finding or verdict was rendered, the inquiry in such case being "as to the point or question actually litigated and determined in the original action, not what might have been litigated and determined;" in Russell v. Place, that "a judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction, upon a question directly involved in one suit, is conclusive as to that question in another suit between the same parties;" in Campbell v. Rankin, that in an action to recover damages for trespass upon a mining claim, the record of a former suit between the same parties, involving the same question of interfering mining claims, was admissible as evidence, the court observing that "whenever the same question has been in issue and tried and judgment rendered, it is conclusive of the issue so decided in any subsequent *suit between the same parties;" in [51
Mason Lumber Co. v. Buchtel, that in a suit for the amount of the first instalment due on a contract for the purchase of timber lands—the defense being that the defendant had been induced to make the contract by false and fraudulent representations—a judgment based upon a finding that no such representations were made, was conclusive in respect of that matter in a subsequent action brought on the contract to recover a different instalment; in Bissell v. Spring Valley Twp., that an adjudication, in an action on coupons of municipal bonds, sustaining the defense that the municipality never executed the bonds, and that the bonds were not its legal obligations, was conclusive in a subsequent action brought by the same party on different coupons of the same bonds; and in Johnson Co. v. Wharton, that in an action to recover stipulated royalties, for a named period, for guard rails constructed according to the specifications of a certain patent, in which judgment was given for the plaintiff, the defendant in a second suit brought to recover like royalties for a later period could not make the same defense, although, by reason of the small amount in dispute, he was precluded from having the judgment in the first suit reviewed upon writ of error, this court stating that it was a general rule, having its foundation in a wise public policy, that the final judgment of a court, at least one of superior jurisdiction, competent under the law of its creation to deal with the parties and the subject-matter, and having acquired jurisdiction of the parties, concludes those parties and their privies in respect of every matter put in issue by the pleadings and determined by such court. See also Lessee of Parrish v. Ferris, 67 U. S. 2 Black, 606, 608 [17: 317, 318]; Washington, A. & G. Steam Packet Co. v. Sickles, 72 U. S. 5 Wall. 580, 592 [18: 550, 554]; Dowell v. Applegate, 152 U. S. 327, 342 [38: 463, 469].

The latest expressions of opinion by this court on this question are in Last Chance Mining Co v. Tyler Mining Co. 157 U. S. 683, 691 [39: 859, 863], and New Orleans v. Citizens' Bank, 167 U. S. 371, 396 [42. ——]. In the first of these cases it was held that a judgment by default in favor of the Last Chance Mining Company against the Tyler Mining Company for a parcel of land embraced within the bound-52] aries of certain mining claims, *alleged to have been legally located and to belong to the former company, precluded the latter company from contending in a subsequent action for part of a mineral vein not embraced within the former suit, but within the mining claims involved in the first suit, that the mining claims in question had not been legally located—the court observing that a judgment by default was just as conclusive an adjudication between the parties of what is essential to support the judgment as one rendered after answer and contest, the essence of estoppel by judgment being that "there has been a judicial determination of a fact, and the question always is, Has there been such determination? and not, Upon what evidence or by what means was it reached?"

In New Orleans v. Citizens' Bank, it was held that the final and unreversed judgment of a court in Louisiana of superior jurisdiction upon the issue duly raised by the pleadings whether the bank was exempt by contract with the state from taxes assessed against it for particular years, concluded that question, as between the same parties and their representatives, in respect of taxes assessed against it for subsequent years. In that case the court said: "The estoppel resulting from the thing adjudged does not depend upon whether there is the same demand in both cases, but exists, even although there be different demands, when the question upon which the recovery of the second demand depends has, under identical circumstances and conditions, been previously concluded by a judgment between the parties or their privies."

In view of these adjudications, it would seem that the controlling inquiry is whether, under the pleadings in the former cases, the sufficiency of the Atlantic & Pacific maps of 1872 as maps of definite location was a matter in issue and determined, as between the United States and the Southern Pacific Railroad Company. That that matter was in issue and was actually decided in the former cases, is too clear to admit of doubt. That it was material is equally clear; for, upon its determination depended the question whether the grant of public lands to the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad Company attached to any specific lands along its line to which the forfeiture act of 1886 could apply. *If those [53 maps were valid maps of definite location, then, according to the settled adjudications of this court, to which reference has often been made, the right of that company to earn the lands appertaining to its line, thus definitely located, attached, by relation, as of the date of the grant to it in 1866; and in this view the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, holding the junior grant, took none of the lands appertaining to that line by reason of the definite location and construction of its line. Thus, also, those lands were in such condition, at the date of the forfeiture act of 1886, that they could be forfeited as lands in which the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad Company then had an interest, and, in accordance with the act of Congress, be fully restored to the public domain for the exclusive benefit of the United States, unaffected by the later grant made to the Southern Pacific Railroad Company.

The only way in which, in the former cases, the court could have avoided a decision as to the character of those maps, was to have held that whether they were maps of definite location or not, the rights of the Southern Pacific Railroad Company attached, upon the declaration of forfeiture, to the lands then in dispute, and that Congress was without power to restore them to the public domain. So far from sustaining that view, the court expressly adjudged that, upon the acceptance of the Atlantic & Pacific maps of 1872, the rights of that company, in the lands granted, attached as of the date of the grant of 1866, and that it was not possible for the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, by the location of its road, whether located before or after its acceptance of the maps of 1872, to acquire any interest whatever in the lands there in dispute that would prevent Congress, upon forfeiting the rights of the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad Company, from restoring such lands to the public domain to be disposed of by the United States as it saw proper.

It is in effect said that the failure of the government in the former cases to aver, in words, that the maps of 1872 were maps of "definite location," leaves the question of the sufficiency of those maps open in this case relating to different lands. *It seems to be [54 forgotten that the amended bill was in exact conformity with the act of 1866, which in the 3d section—the one making the grant—used the words "at the time the line of said road is designated by a plat thereof filed in the office of the Commissioner of the General Land Office." The word "designated" in that act meant no more nor less than the words "definitely located" mean. When the Southern Pacific Railroad Company denied that the Atlantic & Pacific line had been sufficiently designated, or that there had been a valid location of it, both litigants, as well as the court, understood, and properly, that the case presented the question whether there had been such a definite location of the Atlantic & Pacific line as the act of Congress required. That that company so understood the word "designated," as used in the 3d section of the act of 1866, is beyond question; for its answer filed in the former cases on the 30th of December, 1889, in which it claimed the lands then in controversy, refers to the map filed by it on the 3d April, 1871, as one by which "it designated the line of its said railroad." And when it was adjudged that the maps of 1872 indicated a definite location of the line of the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad, the settled rules of law forbid that the defeated party should reopen that question in another suit, relating to other lands appertaining to the line so designated. The matter alleged by the government, and upon which the recovery proceeded, was, we repeat, the sufficiency of the maps of 1872 to entitle the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad Company to earn the lands there in dispute.

It is also said that the decision in the former cases concluded, at most, only the question of title in respect of the lands there in controversy. This cannot be correct when the lands in both suits have a common source of title, and the title depends upon the existence or nonexistence of the same fact or facts. If the accepted maps filed by the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad Company in 1872 sufficiently located the line of that company, it could not possibly be that they were valid maps of definite location as to part of the lands appertaining to that line, and not maps of that character in [55 respect of other *lands embraced by it. Consequently, the former judgment, while unmodified, determined the character of the maps, as between the United States and the Southern Pacific Railroad Company. If the court had adjudged in the former cases that those maps were neither filed nor accepted as maps of definite location, but were only maps of general route, could it be doubted that the government would have been estopped from asserting to the contrary in a subsequent suit involving other lands claimed by the Southern Pacific Railroad Company which were covered by the same maps, and appertained to the same line? Must a different principle be applied because the decision was favorable to the government upon the question whether the maps of 1872 were maps of definite location? Certainly not.

But it is earnestly insisted that a prior judgment cannot operate as an estoppel in a subsequent suit between the same parties, unless it be pleaded when there is an opportunity to do so; that such an opportunity existed in this suit; and that the United States having failed to avail itself of that opportunity, it was open to the court to determine the truth of the matter upon all the evidence now before it.

This contention is based upon the 45th rule in equity, providing: "No special replication to any answer shall be filed. But if any matter alleged in the answer shall make it necessary for the plaintiff to amend his bill, he may have leave to amend the same with or without the payment of costs, as the court, or a judge thereof, may in his discretion direct." Under this rule, it is said, the United States had an opportunity to amend its bill, and in that mode have met the allegations of the amended answer of 1893; but, having failed to ask leave to amend, it lost the benefit of the former judgment.

The part of the amended answer of 1893 to which counsel refer as making an issue or issues not made in the former cases, and which, it is contended, must have been met by an amended bill if the government expected to rely upon the prior judgment, is as follows:

"And the said respondents deny that said Atlantic & Pacific Railroad Company did locate on the ground or designate *upon a [56 plat or map the whole of said line of railroad, under or in accordance with said act, from Springfield, Missouri, by way of the points or places named in said act, or otherwise, to the Pacific ocean, and deny that it ever lawfully located or adopted or designated any part of said line in the state of California; and deny that on or about the — day of ——, 1866, or at any other time, said company did file any such plat in the office of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and deny that at that or at any such time, any such designation or location of said line of railroad was approved by the Secretary of the Interior; and deny that the odd sections of public lands on each side of said road for 30 miles were withdrawn from market or reserved; and deny that the lands in suit herein, or any of them, fell within the 20 mile limits of any such line, or were ever lawfully withdrawn from market, or reserved for, or for the benefit of, the said Atlantic & Pacific Railroad Company; and deny that the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad Company ever designated a line of railroad between the Colorado river and the Pacific ocean by a map thereof filed in the office of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, or made or filed a map of definite location of a route from the Colorado river to the Pacific ocean, whether by the most practical and eligible route or otherwise howsoever. The said respondents aver that the said Atlantic & Pacific Railroad Company never made any actual or definite location of its railroad in California, nor constructed any part of a railroad in said state, under or according to the act of Congress approved July 27, 1866, or any amendments, modifications, or supplements thereto or otherwise howsoever. The pretended location of a route by said Atlantic & Pacific Railroad Company in California never was or became an actual or definite location, or anything else than an attempted or pretended designation of a general route for a railroad from San Francisco to The Needles, and such pretended location or designation of route was a colorable and fraudulent location or designation of an unauthorized and impracticable line. The Secretary of the Interior never undertook to accept such pretended location *or desig- [57 nation as anything else than a designation of a general route, and no right to or interest in any public lands was, or could be, acquired by said railroad company by reason of any such attempted location or designation, or any act of acceptance thereof."

Undoubtedly, there are cases in which a party may lose the benefit of a prior judgment, in respect of matters determined by it, when, having an opportunity to plead such judgment, he fails to do so. But that principle has no application in the present case. Under equity rule 45, a general replication to the amended answer of the defendant company sufficed, unless that amended answer contained such matter as made it "necessary" that the government should amend the bill. But when a former recovery is to be relied on by the plaintiff it can only be necessary to amend the bill when the rules of pleading imperatively require that to be done in order to obtain the benefit of such recovery. No amendment of the bill was necessary in this case for the reason that the judgment in the prior suit —the present suit being on a different cause of action—could not be pleaded as an absolute bar arising upon the face of the record, but could be used as evidence to support the contention that the maps of 1872 sufficiently identified the lands granted by the act of 1866. The contrary is again asserted by the Southern Pacific Railroad Company in this suit. But that precise issue we have seen was made in the former suit, and was determined for the United States. And to establish that fact, the United States introduced the former record as evidence in its behalf. To say that the government lost the benefit of its former judgment covering this issue or question, because it did not amend its bill and plead the judgment as an estoppel, is to say that it was required to set out in its pleading what was merely evidence to support its title to the lands in controversy. The 45th equity rule is not to be so interpreted. It means, at most, that a general replication is always sufficient to put in issue every material allegation of an answer or amended answer, unless the rules of pleading imperatively require an amendment of the bill. Besides, rule 45 must be construed in con-[58 nection with the *equity rule 19, declaring that the plaintiff, at his direction, may omit from the bill "what is commonly called the charging part of the bill, setting forth the matters or excuses which the defendant is supposed to intend to set up by way of defense to the bill." If it was competent for the government, in this case, to have referred, in its bill, to the former suit, and, in advance, by appropriate allegations, to have met the objections which it supposed the defendant would urge to the former judgment as fixing the character of the maps of 1872, it was not bound to pursue that course nor to amend its bill and set out what was only evidence of its title to the particular lands in controversy.

But there is another reason why the United States was not required to amend its bill. Before the amended answer of 1893 was filed, the government, by its pleadings, had distinctly alleged that the maps of 1872 sufficiently designated the line of the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad, and identified the lands granted to it, while the defendant's pleadings with equal distinctness averred that they were not valid maps of definite location. Such was the condition of the record when this court decided the former case on the 12th day of December, 1892. That decision, as we are informed by the railroad company, instructed it "as to where the real strain of the controversy came," and having failed "to appreciate the inferences which the court might draw from facts or evidence," leave was obtained in the circuit court to file, and it did file in this case, the amended answer of 1893, bringing, it is claimed, into view such new issues and such additional facts as deprived the government of the right, unless it amended the bill and formally pleaded such judgment as an estoppel, to rely upon the judgment in the prior cases as conclusive of the matters determined by it. That which is claimed to be new in the amended answer was not such matter as even prior to equity rule 45 would have required a special replication or an amended bill in order to avoid its effect. The amended answer was, at most, only a more extended statement of the grounds of defense previously set forth. The manifest purpose of it was to relieve the strain of the prior *decision, and, under the [59 guise of presenting new issues of a substantial character, to enable the railroad company, by introducing additional evidence on its behalf, to retry, in this collateral proceeding, the question as to the sufficiency of the maps of 1872. The pleadings in the prior cases distinctly averred an adequate designation of the line of the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad and the identification of the lands appertaining to that line. The averment in the amended answer of 1893, that the location by the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad Company of its route in California "never was or became an actual or definite location," but was only "an attempted or pretended designation of a general route for a railroad from San Francisco to The Needles," and that such designation of its route was "a colorable and fraudulent location or designation of an unauthorized and impracticable line," and was not at all necessary, because the defendant company, under its original answer, if not estopped by the former judgment, could have introduced any evidence tending to show that there had been no valid definite location of the line of the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad, and that the maps of 1872 were filed and accepted only for the purpose of indicating a general route. So that if the government was entitled, under the pleadings as they were when the defendant company filed its amended answer of 1893, to introduce in evidence the record and judgment in the former cases, its right in that respect was not lost by its failure to amend its bill and especially set up that record.

That the record and judgment in the former cases were admissible in evidence without being specially pleaded, we entertain no doubt. And when before the court as admissible evidence, the only inquiry was whether the sufficiency of the maps of 1872 was a matter in issue and determined between the parties to those cases. There are some cases holding that a judgment, without being specially pleaded, is not conclusive upon the issues to which it relates, but is only persuasive evidence, and that the court is at liberty to find according to the truth as shown by all the evidence before it. But according to the weight of authority and upon principle, *the former [60 judgment, if admissible in evidence at all, is conclusive of the matters put in issue and actually determined by it. Mr. Greenleaf correctly says that "the weight of authority, at least in the United States, is believed to be in favor of the position, that where a former recovery is given in evidence, it is equally conclusive, in its effect, as if it were specially pleaded by the way of estoppel." 1 Greenl. Ev. § 531. This view is in accord with the decisions of this court above cited. See also, Marsh v. Pier, 4 Rawle, 273, 288 [26 Am. Dec. 131]; Lawrence v. Hunt, 10 Wend. 80, 83 [25 Am. Dec. 539]; Betts v. Stair, 5 Conn. 550 [13 Am. In the present case the railroad company has made an elaborate argument in support of the proposition that the necessary legal effect of the forfeiture act of July 6, 1886, was to restore the title of all lands affected by that act to the United States, as of the date of the grant of July 27, 1866, and to "avoid" and "defeat" as of that date the grant to the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad Company with like effect as if it had never existed; that upon such forfeiture the United States became seised of its original estate in the lands as of July 27, 1866, with the same effect as if it had never made any grant to the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad Company; and that it could only enter upon the lands for forfeiture as of its former estate in them. In this view, it is contended that the rights of the Southern Pacific Railroad Company attached immediately upon the forfeiture, and before the lands so forfeited were restored to the public domain. It is sufficient to say, in reference to this contention, that the question as to the effect of the act of forfeiture upon the rights of the Southern Pacific Railroad Company was fully considered and determined in the former cases. 61] It was held that it was *not the intention of Congress that these lands should pass conditionally to the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, or to give to it any lands previously granted to the other company, and that the first proviso of § 3 of the act of 1866 imports that "Congress was not only not intending to give to one company that which it had already given to another, but intended that lands previously granted should be definitely excepted from the latter grant." The court said: "Again, there can be no question, under the authorities heretofore cited, that, if the act of forfeiture had not been passed by Congress, the Atlantic & Pacific could yet construct its road, and that, constructing it, its title to these lands would become perfect. No power but that of Congress could interfere with this right of the Atlantic & Pacific. No one but the grantor can raise the question of a breach of a condition subsequent. Congress, by the act of forfeiture of July 6, 1886, determined what should become of the lands forfeited. It enacted that they be restored to the public domain. The forfeiture was not for the benefit of the Southern Pacific; it was not to enlarge its grant as it stood prior to the act of forfeiture. It had given to the Southern Pacific all that it had agreed to in its original grant; and now, finding that the Atlantic & Pacific was guilty of a breach of a condition subsequent, it elected to enforce a forfeiture for that breach and a forfeiture for its own benefit."

For the reasons stated, we are of opinion that it must be taken in this case to have been conclusively adjudicated in the former cases, as between the United States and the Southern Pacific Railroad Company—

1. That the maps filed by the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad Company in 1872 were sufficient, as maps of definite location, to identify the lands granted to that company by the act of 1866.

2. That upon the acceptance of those maps by the Land Department, the rights of that company in the lands so granted, attached, by relation, as of the date of the act of 1866; and,

3. That in view of the conditions attached to the grant, *and of the reservations of [62 power in Congress contained in the act of 1866, such lands became, upon the passage of the forfeiture act of 1886, the property of the United States, and by force of that act were restored to the public domain, without the Southern Pacific Railroad Company having acquired any interest therein that affected the power of the United States to forfeit and restore them to the public domain.

These grounds being accepted as the basis of our decision, the law in the present case is clearly for the United States; for, as all the lands here in controversy are embraced by the maps of 1872, and therefore appertain to the line located by such maps, it must be, for the reasons stated in the former decision, that the United States is entitled, as between it and the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, to the relief given by the decree below.

Even if we were prepared upon a re-examination of the former cases, or upon the showing made by the present record, to hold that the maps of 1872 were not valid maps of definite location, we could not for that reason, in this proceeding, go behind the former adjudication, and deny to the United States the benefit of the rule making that adjudication so long as it was unmodified, conclusive, as between the parties to it, of all matters actually determined under the issues in the prior suits.

One other matter deserves attention. The learned counsel for the railroad company in their extended comments upon the evidence in the present record, insist that, under the proof now before the court, it is indisputable that the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad Company did nothing more than file in the Interior Department "a map of general or preliminary route for the purpose of securing a preliminary withdrawal of lands;" that the maps of 1872 were neither filed nor accepted as maps of definite location; and that the proof is of such a peculiar character as to demand an examination of it by the court.

In support of this contention reference was made to duly certified copies of certain letters, appearing in the records of the Interior Department: 1. A letter to Mr. Delano, Secretary *of the Interior, from Mr. Hill- [63 yer, attorney of the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad Company under date of March 8, 1872, inclosing "the accompanying maps to be filed in the office of the Commissioner of the General Land Office"—the above maps of 1872, four in number—which letter concludes: "The Atlantic & Pacific Railroad Company respectfully request that the lands embraced in the grant to the company under the provisions of the act of July 27, 1866, and coterminous with the portions of the line or route designated by the plats herewith filed or heretofore filed by said company, may be withdrawn from sale, entry, or pre-emption, and reserved for said railroad company according to the provisions of said act." 2. A letter from Secretary Delano to Mr. Hillyer, under date of March 9, 1872, acknowledging the receipt of the latter's letter, "transmitting four maps of the preliminary location of portions of the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad," and saying that said "maps have to-day been transmitted to the Commissioner of the General Land Office for appropriate action." 3. A letter from the Secretary of the Interior to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, under date of March 9, 1872, saying: "I transmit herewith, for appropriate action, four maps of the preliminary location of portions of the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad," and that said "maps were received yesterday from C. J. Hillyer, Esq., atty. of the Co.—in this city."

From these documents it appears that the attorney of the railroad company described two of the maps as "designating," and the remaining two as "showing," the line or route of the railroad, while the two letters of the Secretary describes them as maps of the "preliminary location of portions" of the road. It is conceded that in the letters of the Secretary, as originally written, the maps were referred to as maps of definite location of portions of the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad. And it was shown that the word "preliminary," inserted in place of "definite," in the two letters of the Secretary, was in the handwriting of a former (now deceased) clerk in the Land and Railroad Division of the Interior Department, who, it is claimed, made the change with the knowledge [64] *or in conformity with the directions of the Secretary; also, that corresponding memoranda, in pencil and in the handwriting of that clerk, appear upon those letters and upon the jackets containing them.

Upon the part of the United States it is contended that there is no evidence whatever tending to show that the secretary had any knowledge of or directed the word "definite" to be stricken out and "preliminary" inserted; on the contrary, that the Department, at all times, subsequently to March 9, 1872, treated the maps in question as maps of definite location. In support of its position the government refers to the fact that in the letter-press copy, as well as in what is called by counsel the permanent record of letters, in the department, the letter of the Secretary to the Commissioner of the General Land Office contains the words "definite location," not "preliminary location," and the letter of the Secretary to Mr. Hillyer of March 9, 1872, reads "four maps of the definite location," not "four maps of the preliminary location." The government also refers to the fact that when the Commissioner of the Land Office received the letter from the Secretary of the Interior the indorsement placed on the back of the map was in these words: "Map of definite location of the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad through the county of Los Angeles and part of San Bernardino, California. Received at the C. L. O. with Secretary's letter of March 9, 1872;" also to the letter of the Commissioner, dated April 22, 1872, and addressed to the local land officers in California, in which the former said: "Gentlemen: I transmit herewith a diagram showing the definite location of the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad under the act of July 27, 1866 (14 Stat. at L. 292), from a point on the western boundary of Los Angeles Co. to a point in T. 7 N., R. 7 E. of the San Bernardino, in your district, showing also the twenty and thirty mile limits of the land grant under said act," etc. It also appears that Assistant Attorney General Smith, in an official communication addressed to the Secretary of the Interior, under date of March 16, 1874,—in which he considered the question of the right of the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad Company to locate its line *from the Colorado river, by way [65 of Tehachapi pass to San Francisco,—referred to and treated the maps of 1872 as maps of definite location. And they were so referred to and treated by Secretary Lamar in his opinion of March 23, 1886, holding that that company was not entitled to construct a road from San Buenaventura to San Francisco. 4 D. L. O. 458.

We cannot concur in the view that the evidence upon this branch of this case is of such nature as to compel the court, in the interest of truth and justice, not only to consider it but to pass again upon the issue made in the former suits as to the character of the maps of 1872. Whatever is new in the evidence now before us, touching that matter, is simply cumulative on the one side or the other. The application to consider that evidence is practically an application for a rehearing as to things directly determined in the former suits between the same parties, and which adjudication has never been modified. Such a course of procedure is wholly inadmissible under the settled rule of res judicata. Without, therefore, expressing any opinion as to the effect of this new evidence relating to matters once finally adjudged, we hold that the Southern Pacific Railroad Company cannot, in this proceeding, question the validity of those maps as maps of definite location.

One of the objects of this suit was to obtain a decree quieting the title of the United States, not only to the lands claimed by the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, but to those claimed by numerous individual defendants by purchase from or contract with that company. The decree which was passed declares that it is not to "affect any right which the defendants, or any of them, other than the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, now have or may hereafter acquire in, to, or respecting any of the lands hereinbefore described, in virtue of the act of Congress entitled 'An Act to Provide for the Adjustment of Land Grants Made by Congress to Aid in the Construction of Railroads and for the Forfeiture of Unearned Lands, and for Other Purposes; approved March 3, 1887.'" Instead of leaving undetermined the matters in dispute between the United States and the defendants other than the *Southern Pacific Railroad Company, [66 the circuit court should have determined, by its final decree, what rights those defendants have by virtue of the above act of March 3, 1887 (24 Stat. at L. 556, chap. 376), in the lands or any of them now in dispute and claimed by the United States. The effect of the decree is to leave undetermined the question whether the defendants who claim under the Southern Pacific Railroad Company are protected by that or any other act of Congress. The government was entitled to a decree quieting its title to all the lands described in its pleadings, except those, if any, that are protected, in the hands of claimants, by acts of Congress. United States v. Winona & St. Peter R. R. Co. 165 U. S. 463 [41: 789]; Winona & St. Peter R. R. Co. v. United States, 165 U. S. 483 [41: 798]. But as the government has not appealed, the decree cannot be reversed for the error of the circuit court in not finally disposing of the issues between the United States and the individual defendants who claim under the Southern Pacific Railroad Company.

The result is that the decree must be affirmed in all respects as to the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, as well as to the trustees in the mortgage executed by that company, and affirmed also as to the other defendants, subject, however, to the right of the government to proceed in the circuit court to a final decree as to those defendants.

It is so ordered.

Mexican land grant—adverse possession—evidence—imperfect grant.

1. A presumption of the approval by the Mexican governor of a grant of land does not arise where an alcalde who had been directed to put the grantee in possession of land asked for, and to transmit the expediente to his superior for approval, gave possession of more land than the petition asked for, and there is no approval to be found upon the papers themselves, although the expediente, which belonged to the public archives, was found in possession of the grantee, without anything to show that it was delivered to him in place of a testimonio.
2. Mere proof of pasturing stock on a vast tract of land, without any evidence of an exclusive possession under a claim of right, is not sufficient to show adverse possession.
3. The omission of any mention of a grant of at least half a million acres of land, in a will which clearly shows the testator's intent to marshal his assets and mention and dispose of all his property by specific dispositions, is irresistible evidence that he did not suppose he owned that land.
4. An imperfect grant which can be confirmed by the court of private land claims must be one which the complainant could by right, and not by grace, have demanded should be made perfect by the former government had the territory not been acquired by the United States.

[Nos 43, 46.]

Argued April 19, 1897. Decided October 18, 1897.

APPEALS from a judgment of the Court of Private Land Claims confirming in the petitioner Bergere, for herself and the other heirs of Manuel Antonio Otero et al., the title to 11 square leagues of land in the territory of New Mexico. Reversed, and case remanded with directions to enter judgment in conformity with the opinion.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. J. D. O'Bryan, James W. Vroom, and T. B. Catron for Bergere et al., claimants.

Messrs. Matthew G. Reynolds, Special Assistant to the Attorney General, and Holmes Conrad, Solicitor General, for the United States.

Mr. Justice Peckham delivered the opinion of the court:

These are cross-appeals from a judgment of the court of private land claims, confirming in the petitioner Bergere, for herself and the other heirs of Manuel Antonio Otero, and Miguel Antonio Otero, the title to 11 square leagues of land in the territory of New Mexico. The petition was filed in the court below, asking that the validity of the title to a very much larger tract of land in the above territory, alleged to have been granted in 1819 to one Bartolomé Baca by acting Governor Melgares, might be confirmed to the heirs and legal representatives of Baca, of whom, she alleged, she was one.

The number of acres contained in the alleged grant was not stated, but it has been variously estimated at from half a million to a million and a half.

The judgment of confirmation was granted upon the ground, as stated by the court, that the grant to Baca was imperfect at the time of the cession of the department of New Mexico to *the United States by the treaty of Guada-[68 lupe Hidalgo, and hence it could only be confirmed by the court for the amount of 11 square leagues, under the 7th subdivision of § 13 of the act of Congress of March 3, 1891, chap. 539, creating the court of private land claims. (26 Stat. at L. 854.) That subdivision reads as follows:

"No confirmation in respect of any claims or lands mentioned in § 6 of this act, or in respect of any claim or title that was not complete and perfect at the time of the transfer of sovereignty to the United States as referred to in this act, shall in any case be made or patent issued for a greater quantity than 11 square leagues of land to or in the right of any one original grantee or claimant, or in the right of any one original grant to two or more persons jointly, nor for a greater quantity than was authorized by the respective laws of Spain or Mexico applicable to the claim."

The petitioner thought the court below should have confirmed her title to the whole of the land described in the alleged grant, while the counsel for the government was of the opinion that the judgment ought not to have confirmed her title to any portion thereof. Both parties have therefore appealed from the judgment to this court.

In the course of the trial certain papers were put in evidence on the part of the petitioner, for the purpose of proving the alleged grant. They were written in the Spanish language, and a sworn translation thereof, also appearing in the record, reads as follows:

"To the Acting Governor:

"Don Bartolomé Baca, captain of the volunteer militia company of cavalry of the villa of Albuquerque, residing in the jurisdiction of Tome, before you with the greatest respect and subordination, as by law required, represents: That he has a number of sheep, horned cattle, and horses, without legitimate property on which to keep them together under shepherds, cattle herders, and horse herders, to take care of them and secure their safety, they now roving over different places, exposed to all the contingencies arising from their being 69 |*scattered. There being vacant on the other side of the Abó Mountain a tract called the Torreon, and which extends, on the north, to the Monte del Cibolo; on the south to the Ojo del Cuervo; on the east to the springs called the Estancia Springs; on the west to the said Abó Mountain; he prays you to be pleased to grant the same in real possession, in the exercise of the powers upon you conferred by His Majesty, in order to establish thereon a permanent ranch or hacienda, which he engages to occupy with his stock, sustaining the same with armed servants, who may defend it against the incursions of the enemy without abandoning it; and he will also, if possible, open lands for cultivation, whether irrigable or dependent upon the seasons, for the advancement of agriculture, and, although the water sources it contains are small and uncertain, he proposes to improve them with reservoirs and other appliances which will secure every advantage possible; and he affirms that it has at present no owner, and that it never has had any known owner.

"Wherefore he prays you to be pleased to grant this his petition in conformity with law, and to direct the royal judge of his district to give him legal possession, with the proper documents and other formalities which are required, whereby he will receive favor, grace, and justice. I swear that I do not act in bad faith, and in that which is necessary, etc.

"Santa Fé, July 2, 1819.

"As he asks it according to law, and I understand that no injury results to any third party, but, on the contrary, increase of stock raising and agriculture under the conditions asked:

"Don José Garcia de la Mora will proceed to give the possession, designating limits and doing what is proper, which, being concluded, he will transmit the expediente to this office, so that if it be approved the proper testimonio may be ordered to be given to the petitioner.

*"In execution of the decree of July 2, [70
1819, I, José Garcia de la Mora, the judge commissioned by Lieutenant Colonel Facundo Melgares, governor of the province of New Mexico, proceeded in company with captain of volunteer militia Bartolomé Baca, who, by his merits and conduct in the service of both majesties, as has been proved by the offices which have been conferred upon him of alcalde mayor, and in other services in the field, the governors always appointing him commander of campaigns and scouting parties, which he always led with honor and valor, and in addition to all this he has always surpassed others in voluntary contributions, setting a good example to his inferiors. Wherefore, in reward of all these merits and services I have proceeded in his company to examine the tract he applies for, and knowing that it is wild land, and that no injury results to any third party, I have placed him in possession in the name of the King (whom may God preserve), and I took him by the hand and led him over the whole tract, he shouting and plucking up grass and throwing stones in the name of the King, saying, 'Long live our beloved monarch, Don Fernando VII., whom God may preserve,' with hurrahs and shouts, and I shed tears of delight at his acclamations; and I designated to him for his boundaries: On the south, the Ojo del Cuervo, following its line to the Ojo del Chico; on the east, the Cerro del Pedernal; on the north, the Ojo del Cibolo; on the west, the Altura de la Sierra (summit of the mountain range); the said gentleman being satisfied and grateful to the said governor for the benefit conferred upon him, binding himself to increase by his intelligence the limited waters which have been donated to him in order that his herds may be maintained, to which he is bound, transmitting the whole for your approval, he will satisfy the fees which may be charged to him.

"Wherefore, I transmit this to the superior authority in order that, it being examined by you, you may decide as you may deem just.

"[Roto] elgares." [rubrica.]

The petitioner claims that the evidence shows an approval by the governor of the action of the alcalde in delivering juridical possession of the land described in the petition of Baca, and that thereby the grant became effective and absolute. Also that there is sufficient evidence of an adverse possession of such land by Baca from 1819 to the time of his death in 1834 and after that time by his heirs and representatives.

The court below found the following facts:

"First. That on February 4, 1819, Bartolomé Baca presented a petition to the then governor of the province of New Mexico, Facundo Melgares, setting forth that he had registered a piece of vacant land which was called the Torreon; that the said governor made the said grant as petitioned for on July 2, 1819, and directed José Garcia de la Mora to give possession, designating the limits and officiating duly; that afterwards, to wit, on September 12, 72] 1819, the *said official gave to the said Bartolomé Baca the actual possession of the said tract of land, called the Torreon, petitioned for.

"Second. That the said tract of land, called the Torreon, had been in the actual possession of Bartolomé Baca for more than four years from the date of the grant on said September 12, 1819.

"Third. That the said petitioner who filed her petition for herself and other heirs of Manuel Antonio Otero and Miguel Antonio Otero are the legal successors in interest to the rights of the said heirs of the said Bartolomé Baca.

"The court finds as a matter of law that the grant to said Bartolomé Baca was imperfect at the time of the cession of the department of New Mexico to the United States of America by the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, and that the petitioner for herself and other heirs of Manuel Antonio Otero and Miguel Antonio Otero, as the legal representatives of the said Bartolomé Baca, is entitled to a confirmation of 11 square leagues of land within the outboundaries of the tract of land, called the Torreon, granted to said Baca, and of which he was put in actual possession.

"It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed by this court that the claim of the petitioner for the land hereinbefore described and set out be, and the same is hereby, confirmed to the extent of 11 square leagues to the heirs and legal representatives of Bartolomé Baca, provided that this confirmation shall not confer any right or title to any gold, silver, or quicksilver, mines, or minerals of the same."

In regard to the character of the grant involved in this proceeding, it is conceded on the part of counsel for petitioner that the approval of the governor was necessary in order to make the grant effective. In their brief they say: "Now this grant was not finally made until return was made by the alcalde and approval had. Before that time it had no existence. The confirmation of the government was the one act that fixed the right of the grantee, and that final act was based upon the return and, necessarily in this case, in confirmation of the return."

73] *We have no doubt of the correctness of this view. The governor, in his reference of the case to the alcalde, bids him transmit the expediente to his office, so that if approved the proper testimonio may be ordered to be given the petitioner. Until approved, the action of the alcalde was of no effect.

The burden of showing this approval rested with the petitioner, and unless she has sustained it she has failed in this branch of her case.

In speaking of the burden cast upon a petitioner who asks confirmation of an alleged grant of land under the act of 1891, above referred to, this court in Whitney v. United States, 167 U. S. 529, at 547 [42: 263, at 270], said: "Upon the whole, we have come to the conclusion that the claimants have not made out their case by a fair preponderance of evidence, or such weight of testimony as is necessary to establish their title to this large tract of land."

Counsel for the petitioner claim that, assuming the burden as above stated, there is a presumption, arising from an inspection of these papers and from a consideration of the other evidence in the case, that there was an approval of the action of the alcalde by the governor, and that the grant was thus made effective. We do not concur in this view, and we are of opinion that the papers themselves show no approval by the governor, and that there is no evidence of other facts or circumstances from which such approval could properly be presumed.

There is no approval to be found upon the papers themselves. This is too plain for argument. The torn portion of the paper following the report of the alcalde has no word of approval thereon. There is part of a sentence which, as translated, means "the boundaries by," and under it is the signature of Melgares, with the exception that the first letter of his name is lacking. This does not and cannot in and of itself constitute an approval in fact, and there must be something more than this torn paper upon which to found a presumption of such approval.

It is, however, urged that the presumption arises from an inspection of all the papers above referred to, aided by a consideration of the other evidence in the case.

*We think no such presumption can be[74 indulged in from an inspection of all of the papers in question, even when aided by the other evidence.

Such an inspection shows that the alcalde proceeded on his own account to deliver juridical possession of a much larger tract of land than Baca had petitioned for in his petition to the governor. This larger tract the alcalde described in his report to the governor, and submitted his action to the governor for his final approval.

The action of the alcalde is sufficient to prevent a presumption of approval founded solely on an inspection of the papers. The difference between the amount of the land asked for and that delivered by the alcalde is too great to permit of any presumption of approval. There must be some proof of it. We are not aided in making this presumption by a consideration of the other evidence.

Counsel for the petitioner refer to the fact of the possession of these papers by Baca as an important piece of evidence in aid of this presumption. The possession alluded to was proved by one of the grandsons of Baca, who was a witness for the petitioner. He testified that his mother was a daughter of Baca, and that his father was Baca's administrator. The papers of Baca were in the possession of his father as such administrator. His father died somewhere about 1880, and after his death the witness took the box of papers that had belonged, as he said, to his grandfather and kept it. He did not know its contents until he was looking for some papers belonging to his father, when he found what he describes as a part of the grant of a tract to Bartolomé Baca. Witness took the paper to Manuel Antonio Otero, who said: "Let us search for the other part, and I will buy it from you and the other heirs;" and then after a further search the other part was found, and these papers thus found are the ones above set forth.

Upon these facts it is said that it appears that the papers were in possession of Baca, and that they were delivered to him by or on behalf of the governor, and it therefore follows that the grant was approved by him, or [75 otherwise the papers *would not have been delivered. The bare fact of possession of the papers as above stated is all that the evidence shows. There is not one word of proof of any delivery of the papers to Baca, and we cannot see, from the mere fact of possession of the papers under these circumstances, sufficient ground upon which to base a presumption of delivery and therefore of approval.

We are asked to presume the fact of delivery because the papers were found in the box of papers once belonging to Baca, and we are then further asked to presume an approval because of the presumed delivery. This requires an entirely too free use of presumptions unsupported by evidence tending in the direction of proof of the facts to be presumed. If the papers had contained an approval by the governor, it might perhaps have been admissible to presume a delivery from the fact of possession. It is too much to ask us to presume both facts from the sole fact of the possession of the papers. The other evidence in the case, viewed in connection with these facts, is wholly insufficient to permit of the presumption. It is directed only to the fact of possession of the land by Baca, the character and weight of which evidence will be spoken of hereafter. It is enough to say here that it is insufficient to be used as lending any strength to the presumption of approval which we are at present discussing.

In the condition in which the papers were found, some evidence further than mere possession of them should have been given. The papers were not found together or at the same time; they were torn, and part of the name of the governor had disappeared; they were not of a character to be probably found in the hands of Baca. The proof as to the manner in which Spanish grants were evidenced, as ascertained from an examination of the records in the surveyor general's office in the territory, is unimportant. The witness was simply unable to give an opinion as to the general custom. Here, however, the papers themselves showed that something other than those papers were to be given the grantee. The papers formed the expediente and belonged in the archives of the government when approved, and they show on their face that *if the gov- [76 ernment approved, there was to be given in that case a proper testimonio to the petitioner, which it was evidently contemplated should be something other than this expediente. There is no proof of the existence of any such paper or that it was ever given.

Under all these circumstances some explanation as to the possession of these papers by Baca should have been given, showing they were intended as in place of the testimonio, so that the presumption of a delivery and an approval by reason thereof would not necessarily rest solely upon the fact that the papers without any approval indorsed on the return were found as stated.

Evidence of the delivery of juridical possession of the land to Baca is also referred to as aiding the presumption of the subsequent approval by the governor and the delivery of the papers to Baca, and the further alleged fact of the retention of such possession by Baca up to his death in 1834 is also mentioned for the purpose of strengthening this presumption. The alcalde in fact delivered to Baca juridical possession of much more land than was asked for by Baca in his petition. This fact is attempted to be explained upon the theory that the petition of Baca did not describe in detail the land he asked for, and that the governor in referring the petition to the alcalde directed him to designate the limits, and do what was proper, etc. There is, however, a sufficient description of the land contained in the petition of Baca. It was in regard to that particular land thus described that the acting governor said that "as he asks it according to law," etc., "Don Mora will proceed to give possession, designating the limits." Was this an authority to Don Mora to designate such limits as might seem good to him, or was it simply an authority to designate those limits which were described in the petition of Baca? We have no doubt it was the latter, and hence when the alcalde made return that he had delivered juridical possession of a much larger tract of land than had been asked for, it would naturally be supposed there might be hesitation and refusal to approve on the part of the governor. Certainly, no presumption of approval would arise from these *facts. Therefore the delivery of [77 juridical possession, as shown in this case, has not the usual importance that is attached thereto when such delivery takes place as the concluding act in a grant of an absolute character. This delivery was concededly conditional, and could have no final effect until the approval by the governor, and this approval must be shown by the petitioner to have been given, and cannot be presumed to follow the delivery of juridical possession.

Actual possession of the land described in the alleged grant for four years by Baca, as found by the court below, is also claimed as an important fact upon which, in addition to the evidence already alluded to, the presumption of approval may properly be sustained. The evidence upon which the finding is based is not substantially contradicted, and it shows that after the delivery of juridical possession by the alcalde Baca built some small buildings on a portion of the land, for the use of his herders and servants, who occupied them, and who were attending to the business of looking after his horned cattle, sheep, and horses, for which Baca wanted pasture. He never himself resided on the land, but subsequently to his taking possession from the alcalde and at different times prior to his death in 1834, other persons, embracing in all a number of families, had come upon Baca's portion of the land, and had dwelt there, without any molestation from him, and probably with his consent, on account of the protection their presence would afford to his interests against the Indians. During the years subsequent to the grant in question there were granted within the boundaries thereof small grants to settlements or towns, which the petitioner says were granted with the assent of Baca and his legal representatives. There is also evidence of some small attempts at cultivation within a narrow range of land contained in the grant, hardly enough to speak of. Some of the witnesses for the petitioner said the place was called Torreon because Baca built a torreon there, and the people gave it that name for that reason. The accuracy of this evidence becomes doubtful, to say the least, when, by referring to the original application of Baca to the acting gover-

78] nor *for the grant, he describes it therein as "a vacant ——— ——— tract called the Torreon, and which extends," etc., as described. Two of the sons of Baca occupied at one time a log house that was built by Baca upon the land, and they occupied it while superintending the herders who were caring for the cattle being pastured in the vicinity. Petitioner's witnesses also said that since 1819 and up to the death of Baca, he was recognized as the owner of the property, and after his death the property was recognized and respected as that of Baca.

Who were the persons thus recognizing ownership is not stated, whether servants and agents of Baca, or independent third persons. Some of the witnesses making these statements were wholly ignorant, as they said, of the fact that grants of portions of this land had been made by the Mexican government as vacant and unoccupied lands. Subsequently to the date of 1819 such conveyances were in fact made; and whether the title conveyed by them was good or bad, it appears conclusively that the Mexican government, during the time when this possession of Baca is claimed to have been in existence, regarded the tract as vacant and unoccupied so far as to permit of its conveyance to others of various portions of the land now claimed. Another witness thought that Baca occupied about 300 varas in width from east to west and from north to south, but he was ignorant as to the boundaries of the grant, although so far as he knew Baca claimed no more than 300 varas, and this was under some cultivation for a distance of about 100 varas from north to south, and this was as late as 1829 or 1830. Other persons during this time came in and made application to the judge of first instance, as witness remembered, for other portions of land embraced in this alleged grant, on the theory that such portions were vacant and unoccupied.

This in substance is the evidence of possession, and it cannot, as we think, at all strengthen the presumption of an approval of the grant and a possession in accordance with it.

Nor do we think there is any evidence upon which to base a claim of adverse possession of this land as of right or under some *claim[79 of title. There is no evidence showing a possession exclusive in its nature and founded upon a claim of right to the land so possessed. If there had been evidence of an approval of the grant, the delivery of juridical possession, as stated in the return of the alcalde, might be sufficient evidence of title at one time to the whole land, yet, in the absence of such evidence of approval, we are of opinion that the actual possession, as proved, was totally insufficient to support a claim of title to this immense tract of land; nor is it sufficient to support a presumption that the acting governor did approve the grant and that what appears upon the torn expediente is in reality part of his written approval thereof. The recognition of the property as belonging to Baca was very probably a recognition of the occupancy by him of the 300 varas above alluded to, and is surely not definite enough to base a claim that the possession of this large amount of land by Baca was either notorious or in any degree exclusive, or that any portion of it was ever used by him for any purpose other than the pasturing of his cattle, sheep, and horses, and purposes connected therewith, but in no way exclusive of other persons.

In regard to proof of the fact of pasturing cattle as evidence of an adverse possession upon which to base a claim of title, we have held that such fact is of very slight weight when applied to cases arising under alleged grants of land of the nature of the one under consideration. In the case of Whitney v. United States, already above cited, 167 U. S. 529, 546 [42: 263, 269], this court said, speaking through Mr. Justice Brown, as follows:

"The claimant also relies upon a long-continued adverse possession of this land, maintained for nearly 170 years from the date of the grant, and nearly eighty years from the date of the testimonio issued by the alcalde mayor de Baca. Had it been shown that this possession was complete, adverse, and undisputed during the whole life of this grant, such possession would probably be regarded as complete evidence of title. Nor are we disposed to deny that the fact that the Luceros and their descendants pastured stock upon these lands is evidence of such possession, but in order to make it of any *particular weight it should be [80 shown to have been exclusive, and that no other person pastured or had the same right to pasture upon these lands. The proceedings in the case first above mentioned, of the intrusion of the Romeros, indicate the lands to have been held in common and to have been subject to pasturage by the Indians and other residents of that neighborhood. Under such circumstances, it should be made to appear that the rights of Lucero and his descendants were exclusive in this particular. In addition to this, however, it is a fact so notorious that we may take judicial notice of it, that mere pasturage upon these western lands is very slight evidence of possession. The court below was of opinion that from a practical standpoint the grazing of stock in this country has no value as evidence of practical location. In view of the fact that all, or nearly all, of this testimony respecting possession is given by witnesses who are descended from Lucero, or connected with his family, or are interested in the litigation, and the possession relied upon is not shown to have been exclusive, or inconsistent with the use of this vast tract as a pasturage common to all the dwellers in that neighborhood, we think the court did not err in refusing to give it weight as evidence of title."

These remarks apply with great force to this case, so far as the evidence herein goes to show actual possession by reason of the pasturing of stock, which is really all the evidence of possession the case affords It is entirely lacking in evidence of an exclusive possession under a claim of right, and the testimony is consistent with a mere occupancy of but a small portion of the land by Baca and his servants for purposes of pasturage, and without claim of further or exclusive right or title.

There is another fact that we think bears a good deal of force upon the question whether there ever was an approval by the governor, and, as connected therewith, whether Baca himself ever thought that he had or claimed to have any title to or property in the land described in his petition or in the report of the alcalde, and that fact is that he makes no mention whatever of this property [81] in his will, and does not in *that instrument claim to have any title to or interest in the same. The will was put in evidence only for the purpose of showing the written declarations of Baca as to his ownership of property and his omission to name the property in question, and we think it sufficiently proved for that purpose.

The failure to enumerate in his will a particular piece of property owned by a testator would, in ordinary cases, be of not the slightest significance. But a perusal of the will under examination shows, as we think, quite plainly, that the testator was in effect marshaling his assets and mentioning in the instrument all his property and making specific dispositions thereof. He speaks in great detail of his different pieces of property, both real and personal. The paper cannot be read without giving the impression that the testator was naming therein every piece of real property which he claimed to own. A reading of the will is the most satisfactory and the best proof of the correctness of this statement, and the instrument, with the exception of the formal parts, is therefore given in full in the margin.†

*After reading the will the inference is, [82] as we think, irresistible, that Baca did not suppose he owned, and made no claim to own, the property in question here. If he had owned it or *claimed to own it, there can be no doubt [83] it would have been mentioned in the will. A grant containing at the lowest estimate half a million acres of land would be much too large *for the testator to have overlooked or ig- [84] nored in a declaration of ownership of property such as is contained in this will.

We should infer from this omission that Baca knew he did not own the land and was aware of the fact that the action of the alcalde had never been approved by the governor.

From the fact of Baca's omission to name this land as his property we must infer that such actual possession as he had taken of a small portion of this land never led him to suppose that he was the owner of it or that he had any title to it.

It was in fact an occupation of a comparatively small piece of the land in question, for the purpose of pasturage, but in no way exclusive in its nature and under no claim of right or title. Hence the omission of Baca to mention the land as his property or to refer to it in any way.

The action of the Mexican government in making grants to third parties of certain portions of these lands, as vacant and unoccupied lands, is also of some importance. The grants were made at times which were long subsequent to the petition of Baca and the making of the return of the alcalde, and were made after an official examination of the lands then granted and a certificate that they were vacant.

We express no opinion as to the validity of these grants, and we allude to the subject only for the purpose of pointing out how the facts appeared to the Mexican officials, who, at that time, *were engaged in an investigation of [85] the question of occupancy, and who reported the lands mentioned in the respective grants as vacant and unoccupied, which we may assume they would scarcely have done had Baca or his heirs then been in the actual possession and occupancy of those very lands.

We have now referred to the substance of all the evidence contained in this record, and we are compelled to conclude that the petitioner has failed to make out a title of any kind to the land in question. While the court below failed to give judgment to the petitioner for the full amount of her claim, yet it did give her judgment for the amount already stated of 11 square leagues of land. The court found that the grant was an imperfect grant at the time of the cession of the territory to the United States.

In our view of the case no grant, perfect or

It is my will that my burial be humble and with mass with the body present. I also declare that I am lawfully married, in facie ecclesiæ, to Dona Maria de la Luz Chaves, from which marriage we have had and have, as our legitimate children, Maria Rita, Manuela Antonia, Maria Manuela, Juan, Manuel, and Maria Lugarda. I also declare as my property the house where I live, containing seventeen serviceable and three unserviceable rooms, with a chapel where the holy sacrifice of private mass is celebrated, adorned with thirty-five images in sculpture and pictures, a pulpit, twenty-four mirrors, a censer with its boot of silver, five chasubles with their corresponding accessories, two capes, two albs, two sashes, six altar draperies, two missals, one chalice with its accessories, two cruets with their salvers, eight metal candlesticks, and its vestry with a chest in which the ornaments are kept. The act creating the court of private land claims (above cited) provides in the 1st subdivision of § 13 for the confirmation of imperfect grants.

This court has construed the language there used to mean, "not only that the title was lawfully and regularly derived, but that, if the grant were not complete and perfect, the claimant could, by right and not by grace, have demanded that it should be made perfect by the former government, had the territory not been acquired by the United States." Ainsa v. United States, 161 U. The same construction was upheld in United States v. Santa Fé, 165 U. S. 675, 714 [41: 875, 888], and it is again approved in United States v. Sandoval, 167 U. S. 278, 293 [42: 168, 173]. After a full consideration of the case we must hold there is not sufficient evidence to show that at the time of the cession of the territory said sitio. I also declare as my property a house and lands in the sitio of the Aragons, an interest in said sitio which I bought of the late José Aragon.

I also declare as my property a ranch which I bought of Don Luciano Garcia on the other side, in front of Bernalillo, which consists of a house and lands, the value of which is one thousand dollars, which I gave for it. I also declare as my property two ranches in the sitio of Tome, with its houses, which I purchased of José Manuel Apodaca and Andres Mirabal, and two large fields purchased of Felipe Montoya. I also declare as my property two fields and an interest in the sitio of Las Enlames, which I purchased of the late Antonio José Baca. I also declare as my property that which I have in a room in my house set apart as a store, and in which there are forty-five pieces of calico, domestic, and muslin. I also declare as my property two houses I have in La Joya de Sevilleta, together with their share of lands in the sitio. I also declare as my property a house I have in the village of El Paso del Rio del Norte, with its vineyard and corresponding land, as appears from the document executed for me and which is in my possession. I also declare as my property the land I have in the sitio of Sansal, which Juan Antonio Baca paid me and which was received by Tomas Sanchez. I also declare as my property the broken lands I have in the sitio of Mansano and my interest therein, together with the will under the management of José Antonio Torres. I also declare as my property a mill I have in this place of San Fernando. I also declare as my property four hundred and fifty head of cattle from the brand up, seven thousand head of small stock, eight hundred ewes of mine which Don Francisco Ortiz has on shares, one thousand ewes which Gonzalez, who resides at Seboyeta, has on shares. I also declare as my property forty broken mules, a little more or less, twenty-four aparejos, with accessories, one hundred horses between unbroken and broken, twenty-four young mules one and two years old, two asses. I also declare that Don Mateo Sandoval owes me four hundred and thirty dollars in money, which I order collected. I also declare that, according to the cash book in my use and the obligations that have been made to me, collections be made of all the individuals who owe me and are not credited on their accounts and obligations. I also declare that I owe the house of the late Francisco Chaves four thousand and odd dollars in money and five thousand ewes I had from said house on shares. I order that it be paid. I also declare that I owe as tithes at El Paso del Norte four thousand dollars. This is being paid, and what is found not to have been paid, I order that it be paid. I also declare that I owe to Don Santiago Archavala for one thousand, two hundred sheep. I order that they be paid for. I also declare that I owe Don Rafael Ortiz for six hundred sheep for the year eighteen hundred and thirty-four. I order that they be paid for. I also declare that I owe my stepson, José Luna, for five hundred sheep. I also declare that Don Ricardo Ester owes me four thousand, five hundred dollars. I order that it be collected. I also declare that Don Ignacio de la Campa, who lives in Sonora, owes me one thousand, five hundred and fifty-six dollars, two reals. I order that it be collected. I also declare that Don Alexandro Legren owes me four hundred dollars, two hundred of which appear in an obligation he executed for me, and for the other two hundred he made no obligation. I order that it be collected. I also declare as my property a tract of land in the sitio of Lunas, which Antonio José Padilla paid me. I also declare that Ruybali de Savinal owes me for three hundred ewes. I order that it be collected. I also declare that Vicente Provencio, who resides at Oposura, in the state of Sonora, owes me five hundred dollars in money. I order that it be collected. I also declare that all the servants of my house, according to their accounts, are obligated to earn them in the house, even to the last real, and he who does not wish to serve shall pay in full. I also declare as my property forty she goats, which are in the possession of Gertrudis Montoya, who resides in Belen. I also declare as my property one iron cot and two bells.

[Good for seal third for the years 1833 and '34. Rubric.]

I also declare as my property a cross with its iron weather vane, which is used on the belfry. I also declare that I leave to my wife, Dona Maria de la Luz Chaves, my dwelling and all the household furniture within the doors thereof, it being observed that I have given houses to all my children; to Manuelita the house I have in Santa Fé, with its corresponding land, and to all the others I have also given houses in this place of San Fernando, with their respective lands. I also declare that I leave to my wife, Maria de la Luz Chaves, the land inclosed by a wall I have in this place and orchard.

In order to carry out all the wishes this will contains and which the codicil will contain, in case I leave one, I appoint as my executor, in the first place, my wife, Maria de la Luz Chaves; in the second, Don Jacinto Sanchez, and in the third, Don Enrique Luna, and each one in solidum, and I give them ample power to take possession of my property as soon as I die and to pay all I owe, and that their collection be lawful and real, and that they make it with the legality their good conscience may indicate to them, which charge shall continue for the legal year and as much more time as they may need, since I extend it. And after it is completed and everything is paid, in the sale of my property, furniture, real property, rights, and shares, present and future, I constitute as my sole and universal heirs my wife, Dona Maria de la Luz Chaves, and my said children, Maria Rita, Manuela Antonia, Maria Manuela, Juan Clemente, Manuel, and Maria Lugarda, who, after paying all I owe (except what I have given them), shall make a lump of what is left, the half for my said wife and the other half to be shared in equal parts by my children that they may enjoy it with the blessing of God and my own. And by these presents I revoke and cancel the wills and other testamentary provisions I may have made heretofore.

of New Mexico to the United States the predecessors or grantors of the petitioner had any title of any kind whatever, perfect or imperfect, to the land described in the petition here-

Submitted March 17, 1897. Decided October 18, 1897.

IN ERROR to the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit to review a judgment of that court affirming the judgment of the District Court of the United States for the District of Alaska in favor of the plaintiff, Patrick Whelan, against the Alaska Treadwell Gold Mining Company, for damages for personal injuries received by him while a laborer in the service of said company at its mines in Alaska. Judgments of the Circuit Court of Appeals and of the District Court reversed, and case remanded to the district court with directions for a new trial.

See same case below, 29 U. S. App. 1.

Statement by Mr Justice Gray:

This was an action brought in the district court of the United States for the district of Alaska against a mining corporation by a workman in its employ. The complaint alleged that "on November 23, 1891, and for nearly six months prior thereto, this plaintiff was in the employ of said defendant, as a workman in the mine of said defendant, in breaking and preparing rock for the chutes, and doing other work as ordered by the foreman of said defendant, one Samuel Finley, under whom this plaintiff worked, and from whom he received his orders; that on November 23, 1891, while this plaintiff was yet in the employ of said defendant, he was ordered by the foreman of said defendant company to break rock immediately above and over one of the chutes of the defendant company; that in compliance with the orders of the foreman of said *defendant, and as became his duty so to [87 do, the plaintiff proceeded to his place immediately above and over said chute, and commenced to break said rock as he had been ordered so to do; and that while so engaged, and carefully and skilfully and without negligence performing his duties as aforesaid, and without the knowledge of this plaintiff, and carelessly and negligently, the foreman of said defendant drew or caused to be drawn the gate at the mouth of said chute over which this plaintiff was working, thereby causing the rock at the head of said chute to be suddenly drawn in, carrying this plaintiff with it, through said chute, a distance about 30 feet, and completely covering him with great quantities of rock and débris," thereby greatly injuring him.

At the trial the plaintiff, being called as a witness in his own behalf, gave evidence tending to support the allegations in the complaint; and testified that on the night of November 23, 1891, he was sent by Samuel Finley, the boss in the pit, to the top of a chute, there to break rock and pound it fine enough to go through the chute, which connected with the tunnel through which the rock was shot into cars to be taken to the mill; that at the bottom of the chute was a gate, always closed until the chute was filled and orders given to draw it; that Finley's custom was to come upon the top of the chute to see if the rock was broken fine enough, and, if it was all right, to tell the men to come down as he was going to draw; and that at the time in question, after putting the plaintiff and others to work at the chute, he never gave them any notice that he was going to draw.

Finley, being called as a witness for the defendant, testified that he did give notice to the men before drawing the chute. The defendant introduced evidence, which was uncontradicted, that its business was under the control of a general manager, and was divided into three departments, the mine, the mill and the chlorination works, each of which departments had a foreman or superintendent under the general manager; that the mine department had three shifts or gangs of workmen, two by day and one at night; and that Finley was the boss of the one at night.

*There was conflicting evidence upon the [88 question whether Finley had authority to engage and discharge the workmen under him.

No other material testimony was introduced as to the relation of the plaintiff and Finley to each other or to the defendant.

At the close of the whole evidence, the defendant requested the court to direct the jury to return a verdict for the defendant, upon the ground that the plaintiff's injuries were the result of the negligence of a coemployee or fellow workman, Samuel Finley, for which the defendant was not liable. The court overruled the motion, and the defendant excepted to the ruling.

The court afterwards instructed the jury as follows: "The true test is whether the person in question is employed to do any of the duties of the master; if so, he cannot be regarded as the fellow servant, but is the representative of the master, and any negligence on his part in the performance of the duty thus delegated to him must be regarded as the negligence of the master. You have heard the testimony as to Finley's authority and duties, and whether or not he had any power to employ men or discharge them, or whether he simply acted under another man who had the same power over him that was exercised over other laborers."

The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff, and judgment was rendered thereon, and affirmed by the circuit court of appeals. 29 U. S. App. 1. The defendant sued out this writ of error.

Mr. T. Z. Blakeman, for plaintiff in error:

One injured by the negligence of a fellow servant must allege and prove his ignorance of the latter's negligent habits. He must allege want of care in engaging the servant, or that he was retained after notice of his shortcomings.

A single act of negligence does not necessarily charge the master with notice of the servant's incompetency.

The mere fact that one of a number of servants who are in the same line of employment for a common master has the power to control and direct the actions of the others with respect to such employment will not of itself render the master liable for the negligence of the governing servant.

The plaintiff's negligence to constitute a defense must have been so far an efficient cause of the injury that without his negligence the injury would not have happened.

Mr. Justice Gray delivered the opinion of the court:

The evidence introduced at the trial, giving it the utmost possible effect in favor of the plaintiff, was insufficient to support *a verdict [89 for him; and the defendant's request, made at the close of the whole evidence, to instruct the jury to return a verdict for the defendant, because Finley, whose negligence was the ground of the action, was a fellow servant of the plaintiff, should have been granted.

Finley was not a vice principal nor a representative of the corporation. He was not the general manager of its business, or the superintendent of any department of that business. But he was merely the foreman or boss of the particular gang of men to which the plaintiff belonged. Whether he had or had not authority to engage and discharge the men under him is immaterial. Even if he had such authority, he was none the less a fellow servant with them, employed in the same department of business, and under a common head. There was no evidence that he was an unsuitable person for his place, or that the machinery was imperfect or defective for its purpose. The negligence, if any, was his own negligence in using the machinery or in giving orders to the men.

The case is governed by a series of recent decisions of this court, undistinguishable in their facts from this one. Central Railroad v. Keegan, 160 U. S. 259 [40: 418]; Northern Pacific Railroad v. Charless, 162 U. S. 359 [40: 999]; Same v. Peterson, 162 U. S. 346 [40: 994]; Martin v. Atchison, T. & S. F. Railroad, 166 U. S. 399 [41: 1051]. See also Wilson v. Merry, L. R. 1 H. L. Sc. App. Cas. 326.

This ground being decisive of the case, no opinion need be expressed upon other questions argued at the bar.

Judgments of the Circuit Court of Appeals and of the District Court reversed, and case remanded to the district court with directions to set aside the verdict and to order a new trial.

The CHIEF JUSTICE and Mr. Justice Harlan dissented.

PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 90-95.)

Statute shortening a limitation is constitutional —lands sold for taxes—limitation of six months—Federal question.

1. A statute shortening the period of limitation is within the constitutional power of the legislature, provided a reasonable time, taking into consideration the nature of the case, is allowed for bringing an action after the passage of the statute and before the bar takes effect.
2. A limitation of six months after the passage of a statute, within which actions for lands sold for taxes may be brought, is not repugnant to the Constitution of the United States.
3. A statute barring certain actions if not brought within six months after its passage is not unconstitutional on the ground that it does not allow any opportunity to assert one's rights even within the period limited, if it does not take away any right of action, although the remedy available is not certain.
4. A decision that a person was not in possession of land involves no Federal question which can be reviewed by the Supreme Court of the United States on writ of error to a state court.

Argued April 19, 20, 1897. Decided October 18, 1897.

IN ERROR to the Court of Appeals of the State of New York to review a judgment of that court affirming a judgment of the Supreme Court of that State in favor of the People of the State of New York, plaintiff, against Benton Turner, defendant, for the recovery, by replevin, of a quantity of logs cut by defendant within the forest preserve of that State. Affirmed.

See same case below, 145 N. Y. 451.

Statement by Mr. Justice Gray:

This was an action of replevin, brought April 11, 1887, in behalf of the state of New York by the forest commissioners of the state against Turner, in the supreme court of the county of Franklin and state of New York, to recover a quantity of logs cut by him upon lands in that county and within the forest preserve of the state, between September 1, 1886, and March 25, 1887. The answer denied the allegations of the complaint, and alleged that at the time mentioned therein the defendant was the owner and in possession of the lands.

The material facts of the case, as found by a referee, were as follows: On October 12, 1877, the lands being then owned by one Norton, were sold by the comptroller of the state of New York for unpaid taxes of the years from 1866 to 1870 inclusive, and were bid in by the comptroller in behalf of the state, and conveyed by him to the state by deed dated June 9, 1881, and recorded June 8, 1882. The defendant, more than nine years after that sale, acquired Norton's title in the land. The land was wild forest land, uncultivated, unimproved, unenclosed, and with no dwelling house or other building thereon. Neither the state nor any officer thereof ever took actual possession of the land; and no part of it was in occupancy of any person on October 12, 1879, when the *period of two years allowed by law for re- [91 demption from the comptroller's sale expired.

At the trial before the referee, the defendant, in order to prove the invalidity of the comptroller's deed by reason of illegality in the assessment of the taxes for the years 1867 and 1870, offered to show that the oath of the assessors to the assessment roll of 1867 was taken on August 10, instead of on the 3d Tuesday of August; and that the assessors omitted to meet on the 3d Tuesday of August, 1870, to review their assessments for that year.

The plaintiff objected to the evidence as immaterial, because the comptroller's deed was made conclusive evidence of those matters by the statute of New York of 1885, chap. 448, which is copied in the margin.† The defendant 92]contended that this *statute was invalid as contrary to the 1st section of the 14th article of Amendment to the Constitution of the United States. But the referee sustained the plaintiff's objection to the evidence, and directed judgment for the plaintiff, which was accordingly rendered by the court, and affirmed by the court of appeals. 145 N. Y. 451. The defendant sued out this writ of error.

Messrs. Frank E. Smith and Thomas F. Conway for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. T. E. Hancock, Attorney General of the state of New York, and William Henry Dennis for defendant in error.

Mr. Justice Gray delivered the opinion of the court:

On May 15, 1885, the legislature of New York, by the statute of 1885, chap. 283, declared that all the lands then owned or thereafter acquired by the state of New York within certain counties (one of which was Franklin county) should constitute and be known as the forest preserve; and established a forest commission of three persons, styled forest commissioners, to "have the care, custody, control, and superintendence of the forest 93] *preserve," and "to maintain and protect the forests now in the forest preserve, and to promote, as far as practicable, the further growth of forests thereon;" and authorized them to appoint a warden and other officers, and to exercise various powers to carry out its object.

At the date of the passage of that statute, the time allowed by law for the redemption of lands from sale by the comptroller for nonpayment of taxes was two years from the time of sale. N. Y. Stat. 1855, chap. 427, § 50.

On June 9, 1885, the legislature of the state passed the statute of 1885, chap. 448, to take immediate effect, which provided that all conveyances thereafter executed by the comptroller, of lands in the same counties, sold by him for nonpayment of taxes and having been recorded for two years in the clerk's office of the county in which the lands lay, should, "six months after this act takes effect, be conclusive evidence that the sale and all proceedings prior thereto, from and including the assessment of the land, and all notices required by law to be given previous to the expiration of the two years allowed by law to redeem, were regular" and as required by law; but that all such conveyances and the taxes and tax sales on which they were based, should "be subject to cancelation, as now provided by law, on a direct application to the comptroller, or an action brought before a competent court therefor, by reason of the legal payment of such taxes or by reason of the levying of such taxes by a town or ward having no legal right to assess the land on which they are laid."

The land now in question was sold by the comptroller to the state October 12, 1877; the time allowed by law for redeeming the land from that sale expired October 12, 1879; the comptroller's deed to the state was made June 9, 1881, and recorded June 8, 1882. It had therefore been on record for three years when the statute of June 9, 1885, was passed and took effect; and by the terms of this statute, on December 9, 1885, the comptroller's deed became conclusive evidence that there was no irregularity in the assessment of any of the taxes for nonpayment of which the land had been sold and *conveyed to the state. [94 This action was brought April 11, 1887.

The statute, according to its principal intent and effect, and as construed by the court of appeals of the state, was a statute of limitations. People v. Turner, 117 N. Y. 227; Same v. Same, 145 N. Y. 451. It is well settled that a statute shortening the period of limitation is within the constitutional power of the legislature, provided a reasonable time, taking into consideration the nature of the case, is allowed for bringing an action after the passage of the statute and before the bar takes effect. Terry

†An Act to Amend Chapter Four Hundred and Twenty-Seven of the Laws of Eighteen Hundred and Fifty-Five, Entitled "An Act in Relation to the Collection of Taxes on Lands of Nonresidents and to Provide for the Sale of Such Lands for Unpaid Taxes."

Sec. 1. Section sixty-five of chapter four hundred and twenty-seven of the laws of eighteen hundred and fifty-five, entitled "An Act in Relation to the Collection of Taxes on Lands of Nonresidents and to Provide for the Sale of Such Lands for Unpaid Taxes," is hereby amended so as to read as follows:

§ 65. Such conveyances shall be executed by the comptroller, under his hand and seal, and the execution thereof shall be witnessed by the treasurer or deputy comptroller; and all such conveyances that have been heretofore executed by the comptroller, and all conveyances of the same lands by his grantee or grantees therein named, after having been recorded for two years in the office of the clerk of the county in which the lands conveyed thereby are located, and all outstanding certificates of a tax sale heretofore held by the comptroller that shall have remained in force for two years after the last day allowed by law to redeem from such sale, shall, six months after this act takes effect, be conclusive evidence that the sale and all proceedings prior thereto, from and including the assessment of the land, and all notices required by law to be given previous to the expiration of the two years allowed by law to redeem, were regular and were regularly given, published, and served according to the provisions of this act, and all laws directing or requiring the same or in any manner relating thereto: and all other conveyances or certificates heretofore or hereafter executed or issued by the comptroller shall be presumptive evidence of the regularity of all the said proceedings and matters hereinbefore recited, and shall be conclusive evidence thereof from and after the expiration of two years from the date of recording such other conveyances, or of four years from and after the date of issuing such other certificates. But all such conveyances and certificates and the taxes and tax sales on which they are based shall be subject to cancelation, as now provided by law, on a direct application to the comptroller, or an action brought before a competent court therefor, by reason of the legal payment of such taxes, or by reason of the levying of such taxes by a town or ward having no legal right to assess the land on which they are laid.

Sec. 2. The provisions of this act are hereby made applicable only to the following counties, viz., Clinton, Delaware, Essex, Franklin, Fulton, Greene, Hamilton, Herkimer, Lewis, Saratoga, St. Lawrence, Sullivan, Ulster, Warren, and Washington, but shall not affect any action, proceeding, or application pending at the time of its passage; nor any action that shall be begun, proceeding taken, or application duly made, within six months thereafter for the purpose of vacating any tax sale or any conveyance or certificate of sale made thereunder.

Sec. 3. This act shall take effect immediately.

v. Anderson, 95 U. S. 628, 632, 633 [24: 365, 366]; In re Brown, 135 U. S. 701, 705-707 [34: 316, 318].

The statute now in question relates to land sold and conveyed to the state for nonpayment of taxes; it applies to those cases only in which the conveyance has been of record for two years in the office where all conveyances of lands within the county are recorded; and it does not bar any action begun within six months after its passage. Independently of the consideration that before the passage of the statute the plaintiff had had eight years since the sale, and three years since the recording of the deed, during which he might have asserted his title, this court concurs with the highest court of the state in the opinion that the limitation of six months, as applied to a case of this kind, is not repugnant to any provision of the Constitution of the United States.

It was argued in behalf of the plaintiff in error that the statute was unconstitutional, because it did not allow him any opportunity to assert his rights, even within six months after its passage. But the statute did not take away any right of action which he had before its passage, but merely limited the time within which he might assert such a right. Within the six months, he had every remedy which he would have had before the passage of the statute. If he had no remedy before, the statute took none away. From the judgments of the court of appeals in the case at bar, and in the subsequent case of People, Millard, v. Roberts, 151 N. Y. 540, there would appear to have been some difference of opinion in that court upon the question whether his proper remedy 95]was by direct application *to the comptroller to cancel the sale, or by action of ejectment against the comptroller or the forest commissioners. But as that court has uniformly held that he had a remedy, it is not for us to determine what that remedy was under the local Constitution and laws.

It was also argued that the plaintiff in error was in possession of the land and could not be put to his action. But the decision below that he was not in possession involved no Federal question, or any other question of law, but a mere inference of fact from the evidence, which this court is not authorized to review on writ of error. Dower v. Richards, 151 U. S. 658 [38: 305]; Egan v. Hart, 165 U. S. 188 [41: 680].

Judgment affirmed.

Payment of duties, when necessary to review.

Payment of the full amount of the duties ascertained to be due upon the liquidation of an entry of merchandise is not required by the act of June 10, 1890, § 14, to be made by the importer within ten days after the liquidation of such duties, where the goods were entered for consumption, in order to enable the protesting importer to have the exaction and classification reviewed by the general appraisers and by the courts.

Argued and Submitted October 14, 1897. Decided October 25, 1897.

ON A CERTIFICATE from the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit of a question for the decision of this court in a case in that court on appeal by the United States from a judgment of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York reversing the decision of the board of general appraisers, which affirmed the decision of the collector in the rejection of certain protests and in the classification of certain merchandise for duty. Question answered in the negative.

The 14th section of the act of Congress approved June 10, 1890 (26 Stat. at L. 131, 137, chap. 407) is as follows:

"That the decision of the collector as to the rate and amount of duties chargeable upon imported merchandise, including all dutiable costs and charges, and as to all fees and exactions of whatever character (except duties on tonnage) shall be final and conclusive against all persons interested therein, unless the owner, importer, consignee, or agent of such merchandise, or the person paying such fees, charges, and exactions other than duties, shall, within ten days after 'but not before' such ascertainment and liquidation of duties, as well in cases of merchandise entered in bond as for consumption, or within ten days after the payment of such fees, charges, and exactions, if dissatisfied with such decision, give notice in writing to the collector, setting forth therein distinctly and specifically, and in respect to each entry or payment, the reasons for his objections thereto, and if the merchandise is entered for consumption shall pay the full amount of the duties and charges ascertained to be due thereon. Upon such notice and payment the collector shall transmit the invoice and all the papers and exhibits connected therewith to the board of three general appraisers, which shall be on duty at the port of New York, or to a board of three general appraisers who may be designated by the Secretary of the Treasury for such duty at that port, or at any other port, which board shall examine and decide the case thus submitted, and their decision, or that of a majority of them, shall be final and conclusive upon all persons interested therein, and the record shall be transmitted to the proper collector or person acting as such who shall liquidate the entry *accordingly, except in cases where [97 an application shall be filed in the circuit court within the time and in the manner provided for in § 15 of this act."

Upon this section, after stating the facts of this case showing its pertinency, the circuit court of appeals of the second circuit has certified to us the following question:

"Was the payment of the full amount of the duties ascertained to be due upon the liquidation of the entry of the merchandise required to be made by the importers, as well as the giving notice of dissatisfaction or protest, within ten days after the liquidation of such duties, where the goods, as in the present case, were entered for consumption, in order to enable the protesting importers to have the exaction and classification reviewed by the board of general appraisers and by the courts?

The Attorney General for appellant submitted upon the brief of Edward B. Whitney, formerly Assistant Attorney General:

This case arose under the customs administrative act of June 10, 1890. The only question relates to the timeliness of the payment of duties

The merchandise whose dutiable classification was in issue in this proceeding was important and entered for consumption at the port of New York on June 20, 1891. The entry was liquidated July 16, protests were filed July 21, and the duties were paid July 27, 1891.

The case turns upon § 14 of the customs administrative act.

The question is discussed in certain decisions of the general appraisers, but cursorily.

The point appears very technical. The importer failed by but a single day to pay his duties within the time limited. Such accidents are rare and due to the importers own carelessness or that of his agents. The question is an important one, however, because under the importers' construction of the statute they may and sometimes do indefinitely postpone a review of the collector's decision by simply refusing to pay the duties.

The practice was stated as follows by the Secretary of the Treasury to Attorney General Miller (20 Ops. Atty. Gen. 185, 186): "The practical result of this ruling is an accumulation in the customhouses of large numbers of protests, which may be made for speculative purposes and which are not promptly transmitted to the board of general appraisers because of the failure of the importers to pay the increased duties against the exaction of which they file their protest. The importers are thus enabled to take the initiatory step in suit for recovery of duties, full payment of which has not been made, and delay indefinitely the decision by the general appraisers of the question raised by the protest, with a view of taking advantage of decisions which may hereafter be made in other cases, thereby defeating one of the chief purposes of the administrative act, which was to secure the prompt disposition of questions arising under the tariff laws and discourage the filing of mere speculative protests."

Attorney General Miller therefore states the question as follows (20 Ops. Atty. Gen. 187): "Whether the payment of duties thereby required must, like the protest, be made within ten days after liquidation, or, to state the question differently, whether Congress intended to favor the importer, by permitting him not only to have possession of his goods, but to keep the government out of its revenue at pleasure, or, certainly, until judgment could be recovered against him in a plenary suit outside the statute of June 10, 1890; for it is precisely this advantage that is given the importer by the decision of the board of general appraisers of November 26, 1890, as the constructive practice complained of shows."

A literal interpretation of the statute favors the importers This is due to the repetition of the word "shall" before the words "pay the full amount of the duties." If the second (italicized) "shall" were omitted, the literal interpretation of the statute would favor the government contention.

The consequences of a literal interpretation of the statute are so remarkable that even Judge Townsend, in sustaining the importers' contention in the present case, does not adhere to it. He in effect inserts after the second "shall" the ambiguous words "within a reasonable time."

The government contends that the second "shall" was inadvertently used and should be disregarded.

The general principles of construction applicable to this case are familar. Revenue laws, like other laws, "should be so construed as to carry out the intention of the legislature in passing them."

125 Baskets of Champagne v. United States (Cliquot's Champagne), 70 U. S. 3 Wall. 114, 145 (18: 116, 121); United States v. Stowell, 133 U. S. 1, 12 (33: 555, 558)

If, therefore, the wording of a clause is such as clearly to indicate that it requires correction in order to effectuate the intent of the legislature, the correction will be made either by striking out a word which has inadvertently crept in, or substituting one word for another.

Union Ins. Co. v. United States, 73 U. S. 6 Wall. 759, 764 (18: 879, 882); Endlich, Interpretation of Statutes, §§ 295 et seq., and cases cited.

"If no sensible meaning can be given to a word or phrase, or if it would defeat the real object of the enactment, it may, or rather it should, be eliminated." Endlich, Interpretation of Statutes, § 301. A recent instance of the rule that the intent governs the latter is to be found in McKee v. United States, 164 U. S. 287 (41: 437).

These cases are especially applicable when, as here, the sentence to be construed is long and involved, so that an error might easily creep in and remain unnoticed; and still more, when the sentence bears indubitable evidence of carelessness of construction. The quotation marks about the words "but not before" in this sentence show that it was never revised by a skilful hand. Such errors of style as the repetition of this word "shall" at the wrong place are common, and are much less likely to catch or offend the eye than these sporadic quotation marks.

Strictly speaking, Judge Townsend is correct in saying that this statute contains no ambiguity. As, however, it contains the strongest evidence of unskilful construction, the court is at liberty to correct a plain mistake if it is impossible to reconcile the literal interpretation of the statute with its clear intent.

The statute makes a distinction between merchandise entered in bond and merchandise entered for consumption. The former words are equivalent to merchandise entered for warehouse. Since 1846 imported merchandise (regularly entered) has been classified into merchandise entered for consumption and merchandise entered for warehouse. The provisionally estimated duties upon the former class of merchandise must be paid before the importer can get possession of his property. Duties upon the latter class are payable at any time within three years at the importer's option. The history of this system is set forth in Barney v. Rickard, 157 U. S. 352 (39: 730), and the system still exists.

The reason for omitting the requirement of payment in the case of merchandise entered for warehouse is clear. If the requirement were extended to that class of merchandise, it would prevent any settlement of the legal questions involved until the importer was ready to withdraw his goods from warehouse; or it would require him to pay the duties while the goods were still in warehouse, and thus destroy the advantages of the warehouse system.

On the other hand, it is clear that the requirement is unnecessary as to the estimated duties which the importer must pay in order to get possession of goods which are entered for consumption.

The importance of the question is in relation to duties upon goods which have gone into the possession of the importer upon payment of the amount estimated by the collector at the time of the original entry, which estimate is thereafter found to have been too low. This class of importations contains a considerable proportion of those which are accompanied by fraud. The provisional estimate of duties is of course usually based upon the statements of the invoice. When the collector finds upon the final estimate or so-called "liquidation" of the duties that his estimate was too low, the goods have passed into the importer's hands, and the government's sole remedy is by suit. Instances of such suits are to be found in United States v. Schlesinger, 120 U. S. 109 (30: 607) and Patton v. United States, 159 U S. 500 (40: 233).

What is the effect of a literal interpretation upon such entries?

The finality of the collector's decision is destroyed by filing the protest. Until decision by the board of general appraisers it remains open to review. No decision from the board of appraisers can be obtained until the importer pays the full amount of the duties and charges.

The importer thus has it in his power to postpone indefinitely or forever any decision of these questions under the customs administrative act. Meanwhile the government may sue him; but the questions of fact, being undecided by the proper tribunal, will have to be submitted to a jury. The dutiable valuation of the goods is, indeed, already settled under § 13 of the act (replacing § 2930 of the Revised Statutes), but many questions of fact may remain open, such as "the controlling use of the article in question; or its similitude to some other article; or the values of its component materials; or its weight and fitness; or whether labor is necessary to fit it for use by the consumer; or its commercial designation."

These questions of fact, together with the questions of law involved, must be submitted to the board of appraisers if the importer so elect, by paying the duties and charges. Otherwise they go to the court and jury. Is there any reason why the importer should be given such a right of election? Is it consonant with the intent and purpose of the customs administrative act, as shown either by its well-known history or by its internal evidence? Was it not the main purpose of the act to provide a special tribunal for the trial of all such questions of fact and law, and withdraw all questions of tariff interpretation from juries?

That this cannot be the true construction of the statute is recognized by Judge Townsend, who, therefore, instead of striking out the second "shall," inserts thereafter the words "within a reasonable time." But does this interfere any less with the letter of the statute than does the simple emendation which we suggest? Does it not rather import into it an altogether unworkable condition? Who is to decide whether the payment was made within a reasonable time? The collector, by transmitting or withholding the papers? Is he an officer who is likely to be charged by Congress with the decision of such a question as the reasonableness of time? Yet his decision, if he shall see fit to withhold the papers, is final and conclusive. It cannot be controlled by a writ of mandamus outside of the District of Columbia. McIntire v. Wood, 11 U. S. 7 Cranch, 504 (3: 420); M'Clung v. Silliman, 19 U. S. 6 Wheat. 598 (5: 340). Nor even in the District of Columbia can the courts interfere, either by mandamus or by mandatory injunction, with the decision of an executive officer upon a question involving the exercise of discretion.

Decatur v. Paulding, 39 U. S. 14 Pet. 497 (10:609); Gaines v Thompson, 74 U S. 7 Wall. 347 (19: 62); Litchfield v. Richards (Litchfield v. Register and Receiver), 76 U. S. 9 Wall. 575 (19: 681); United States, Redfield, v. Windom, 137 U. S. 636 (34: 811); United States, International Contracting Co., v. Lamont, 155 U. S. 303 (39: 160); Seymour v. United States, South Carolina, 2 App. D. C. 240 and cases cited.

Yet, if reasonableness of time is the test, it must be the collector who is to decide it. It cannot be intended that this ruling should be reviewed upon a jury trial afterwards.

The learned district judge, in attempting to escape from the manifest impossibility of a literal interpretation of the statute, fell into another untenable position. It is impossible to believe that Congress intended to give the importer a choice of forum while denying that privilege to the United States. It is almost as hard to believe that Congress intended to make the right to review when the payment is not made within ten days dependent upon the permission of the collector, or even of his superior, the Secretary of the Treasury.

If, however, this court shall adopt Judge Townsend's theory, and thus in effect give the Secretary of the Treasury the right to impose a limit by general regulation upon the time within which the importer may obtain a review in such cases, the decision in the case at bar will avoid the evils, feared by Secretary Foster and Attorney General Miller, as shown by their correspondence above quoted.

Mr Edwin B. Smith, for appellees:

The statute does not impose suggested limitation.

From February 26, 1845—when the act passed "a few days" (Knoedler v. Schell, 4 Blatchf. 428) after the majority decision in Cary v. Curtis, 44 U. S. 3 How. 236 (11: 576), took effect—the right of an importer to recover excess of duties illegally exacted has rested upon statutes, by which it is created, limited, and defined.

"The act in question was passed to change the law announced by that decision."

Kriesler v. Morton, 2 Curt. C. C. 241.

The importer's right "is regulated, as to all its incidents, by express statutory provisions."

Arnson v. Murphy, 109 U. S. 238, 243 (27: 920, 922); Marine v. Lyon, 62 Fed. Rep 153, 10 C. C. A. 318; Birtwell v. Saltonstall, 14 C. C. A. 205, 63 Fed. Rep. 1004, 1007.

There is no room for inference; and if the terms of the statute are not ambiguous, there can be no reasoning from analogy.

Marine v. Lyon, 62 Fed. Rep. 153, 10 C. C. A. 317, 207 1-2 lb. Papers S. Tobacco v. United States (The Cherokee Tobacco), 78 U. S. 11 Wall. 620 (20: 229); Knickbocker v. People, Lutz, 102 Ill. 221.

Naturally, the estimate generally exceeds the duty assessed, the exceptions to this rule affording no ground for special legislation.

This payment is but preliminary and indefinite, a sum in gross and by estimate, intended to be large enough to cover the actual legal amount of duty, when ascertained.

Moke v. Barney, 5 Blatchf. 276.

The natural reading is the intended reading.

Davies v. Miller, 130 U. S. 284 (32: 932).

Applying judicial decisions to this section, it becomes evident the protest and the payment were dissevered from each other intentionally, — for a clear, just, obvious purpose.

At any time prior to payment, the collector can reconsider the liquidation, and so reliquidate as to conform to or obviate the objection raised by the protest. If he neglect or refuse to reliquidate, the protesting importer can pay and thereupon the collector "shall transmit the invoice and all the papers," etc., to the board.

Ten days were deemed sufficient time in which to formulate and file an importer's objections to the liquidation, or to determine if it was obnoxious to any; but it was not thought best to set any fixed time limitation to the collector's right to reliquidate, it being morally certain no importer would pay so long as he hoped to change the collector's mind, but could bring the matter before the board by making payment in case of refusal, or unreasonable delay.

Not questioning for a moment that revenue laws (or any other) are to be so construed as to carry out the manifest intention of the legislature, it must be conceded that the sole legislative intent of § 14 was to give a remedy to an importer aggrieved by any decision of a collector; and this was given with full knowledge of the cases declaring that he would be entitled to the benefit of doubtful phraseology and to interpret the language most beneficially for himself.

84 Edinburgh Review, July, 1846, p. 118; Gurr v. Scuds, 11 Exch. 191; Hartranft v. Weigmann, 121 U. S. 616 (30: 1015).

Justice Bradley was indubitably right when he declared, in Barney v. Watson, 92 U. S. 453 (23: 731), the act of 1845 superseded and repealed by the act of 1864. This statement was repeated in the opinion (per Matthews, J.) in Arnson v. Murphy, 109 U. S 238 (27: 920), where § 3011 is treated as subsequently—"now"—in force, only because it "appears as § 3011 of the Revised Statutes." 109 U. S. 241 (27: 921). The act of 1845 was revived by the misconception of the revisers, not called to the attention of Congress when the entire revision was adopted. This is all that is meant by United States v. Schlesinger, 120 U. S. 114 (30: 609).

Accordingly, for ten years—from June 30, 1864, to June 22, 1874—there was no statutory requirement of a payment of the duty, under duress of goods or otherwise, as a condition precedent to the review of the collector's assessment for duty.

The right to retain the goods was sufficient to compel payment of the duties or giving satisfactory security therefor. During this decade, a denial of a right to be heard upon the protest prior to payment was not declared by law.

If the purpose were not the same under existing as under previous laws, a notice of appeal would have taken the place of a protest.

The whole purpose of that notice is to give the collector opportunity to revise that decision.

Davies v. Miller, 130 U. S. 288 (32: 933); Davies v. Arthur, 96 U. S. 149 (24: 758); Heinze v. Miller, 144 U. S. 34 (36: 335).

The natural reading, adopted by Judge Townsend, being the only one which will give collectors the opportunity to consider the objections indicated by the protests to them, should not be departed from.

United States v. Wiltberger, 18 U. S. 5 Wheat 95, 96 (5: 42).

There are no such monstrous and absurd consequences involved as to require a departure from the natural and obvious meaning of the words here employed.

Beardstown v. Virginia, 76 Ill. 42; Sneed v. Com. 6 Dana, 339; Fitzpatrick v. Gebhart, 7 Kan. 47.

What is termed "the policy of the government" with reference to any particular legislation is generally a very uncertain thing, upon which all sorts of opinions, each variant from the other, may be formed by different persons. It is a ground much too unstable upon which to rest the judgment of the court in the interpretation of statutes.

Hadden v. Barney (Hadden v. The Collector), 72 U. S. 5 Wall. 111, 112 (18: 519); St. Paul, M. & M. R Co. v. Phelps, 137 U. S. 533 (34: 769); Vidal v. Philadelphia, 43 U. S. 2 How. 198 (11: 234).

The motives of the legislators, considered as the purposes they had in view, will always be presumed to be to accomplish that which follows as the natural and reasonable effect of their enactments.

Soon Hing v. Crowley, 113 U. S. 710 (28: 1147).

What the legislative intention was can be derived only from the words they have used, and we cannot speculate beyond the reasonable import of those words. The spirit of the act must be extracted from the words of the act, and not from conjectures aliunde.

Gardner v. Collins, 27 U. S. 2 Pet. 93 (7: 359); Minor v. Mechanics' Bank, 26 U. S. 1 Pet. 64 (7: 55); Smith v. State, 66 Md. 217.

It is never very safe ground, in the construction of a statute, to give weight to views of its policy which are themselves open to doubt and controversy.

Municipal Permanent Invest. Bldg. Soc. v. Kent, L. R. 9 App. Cas. 273; King v. Barham, 8 Barn. & C. 104.

Courts cannot imagine an intent and bind the letter of the act to it.

Maxwell v. State, Baldwin, 40 Md. 293; Hyatt v. Taylor, 42 N. Y. 261, 262; Frye v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 73 Ill. 403.

Mr. Justice Brewer delivered the opinion of the court:

The question must be answered in the negative. Such answer is demanded by the obvious and natural import of the language, giving to it the ordinary grammatical construction. This is practically conceded by counsel for the government, for he says in his brief: "A literal interpretation of the statute favors the importers;" and again, referring to the opinion of District Judge Townsend, he adds: "Strictly speaking, Judge Townsend is correct in saying that this statute contains no ambignity." There are two separate clauses, each prescribing a condition. One is, "shall within ten days after 'but not before' . . . give notice," etc., and the other, "shall pay the full amount of the duties," etc. In the latter no time is mentioned, and the clauses being independent, there is no grammatical warrant for taking the specification of time from the one and incorporating it in the other.

The primary and general rule of statutory construction is that the intent of the lawmaker 103] is to be found in the *language that he has used. He is presumed to know the meaning of words and the rules of grammar. The courts have no function of legislation, and simply seek to ascertain the will of the legislator. It is true there are cases in which the letter of the statute is not deemed controlling, but the cases are few and exceptional, and only arise when there are cogent reasons for believing that the letter does not fully and accurately disclose the intent. No mere omission, no mere failure to provide for contingencies, which it may seem wise to have specifically provided for, justify any judicial addition to the language of the statute. In the case at bar the omission to make specific provision for the time of payment does not offend the moral sense (Holy Trinity Church v. United States, 143 U. S. 457 [36: 226]); it involves no injustice, oppression, or absurdity (United States v. Kirby, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 482 [19: 278]; McKee v. United States, 164 U. S. 287 [41: 437]); there is no overwhelming necessity for applying in the one clause the same limitation of time which is provided in the other. Non constat but that Congress believed it had sufficiently provided for payment by other legislation in reference to retaining possession until payment or security therefor; or that it failed to appreciate the advantages which counsel insists will inure to the importer in case payment does not equally with protest follow within ten days from the action of the collector; or that, appreciating fully those advantages, it was not unwilling that he should enjoy them. Certainly there is nothing which imperatively requires the court to supply an omission in the statute, or to hold that Congress must have intended to do that which it has failed to do. Under these circumstances, all that can be determined is that Congress has not specifically provided that payment shall be made within ten days as one of the conditions of challenging the action of the collector, and hence there is no warrant for enforcing any such condition. An answer in the negative must therefore be certified to the Circuit Court of Appeals.

WILLIAM W. BRAUER and Frederick C. Brauer, Copartners, Doing Business under the Firm Name of W. W. Brauer & Company, and the Reliance Marine Insurance Company, Limited, of Liverpool, Appts.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 104-124.)

Exceptions in bill of lading—negligence of carrier or his servant—question of fact—liability for cattle thrown overboard—on deck at owner's risk—wrongful jettison—barratry.

1. Exceptions in a bill of lading or charter party, inserted by the shipowner for his own benefit, are to be construed most strongly against him.
2. An exception, in a bill of lading, of perils of the sea or other specific perils, does not excuse the carrier from the obligation to use due care and skill in navigating the vessel and in carrying the goods, or exempt him from liability for loss or damage from one of those perils to which the negligence of himself or his servants has contributed.

NOTE.—From what liability a contract that a common carrier is not to be responsible for loss or damage will exonerate, see note to New Jersey Steam Nav. Co. v. Merchants' Bank, 12: 465.

As to liability of common carrier for goods to be transported beyond termination of its line, see note to New York C. R. Co. v. Lockwood, 21: 627.

As to delivery by common carrier by water, see note to Richardson v. Goddard, 16: 412.

As to what is included in baggage for which carrier is responsible, see note to Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. v. Swift, 20: 423.

As to how far consignment of goods vests the property in consignee, and to whom is the carrier responsible for loss or injury, see note to Grove v. Brien, 12: 1142.

As to common carrier of live animals; duty and liability of,—see note to New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. v. Estill, 37: 292.

As to what is barratry, see notes to Waters v.

8. Concurrent decisions of the courts below upon a question of fact are to be followed unless clearly shown to be erroneous.

4. A carrier is liable for the loss of sound and uninjured cattle forcibly thrown or driven overboard in rough weather by order of the master of the ship, from unfounded apprehension on his part, in the absence of any pressing peril to the ship, and without apparent or reasonable necessity for their jettison, or any attempt to separate them from those which had already been injured by perils of the sea, although the bill of lading provides that they shall be carried on deck at the owner's risk, and that the ship is not liable for "accident to or mortality of the animals, from whatever cause arising," or for loss or damage due to perils of the sea, barratry, or by "accidents of navigation, of whatsoever kind, even when occasioned by the negligence or default or error in judgment of the pilot, master, mariners, or other servants of the shipowner."

5. The words in the bill of lading, "on deck at owner's risk," do not cover risks from all causes whatsoever, including negligent or wilful acts of the master and crew.

6. The wrongful jettison of the sound cattle by the act of the carrier's servants is neither an "accident to or mortality of the animals," nor "loss or damage occasioned by causes beyond his control, by the perils of the sea," nor a loss or damage "by collision, stranding, or other accidents of navigation."

7. Intentional fraud or breach of trust, or wilful violation of law, is necessary to constitute barratry.

Argued March 29, 30, 1897. Decided October 25, 1897.

ON A WRIT of certiorari to the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit to review a decree of that court affirming the decree of the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York in favor of William W. Brauer et al., libellants, against Compania de Navigacion la Flecha for the value of cattle cast overboard or negligently suffered to go overboard from the vessel Hugo. Affirmed.

See same case below, 57 Fed. Rep. 403, 61 Fed. Rep. 860, 35 U. S. App. 44.

Statement by Mr. Justice Gray:

This was a libel in admiralty in the district court of the United States for the southern district of New York by William W. Brauer and Frederick C. Brauer, residing and doing business as partners under the name of William W. Brauer & Company at Richmond in the state of Virginia, and by the Reliance Marine Insurance Company, Limited, of Liverpool, a corporation organized under the laws of Great Britain, against the Compania de Navigacion la Flecha, a corporation organized under the laws of Spain, and owner of the steamship Hugo, to recover for the loss of cattle shipped by the partnership October 24, 1891, on deck of the Hugo at New York for Liverpool under a bill of lading, the material parts of which are copied in the margin, the parts there *printed in ordinary type being in print,[105 and those in italics being in writing, in the original.†

The libel alleged that the vessel, having one hundred and*sixty-five head of live cattle[106 on board, sailed for the port of Liverpool on October 24, 1891; that "about October 31, 1891, the said vessel having encountered some rough weather, the master and crew of said vessel †Received in apparent good order and condition, by the Spanish steamer Hugo, from Wm. W. Brauer & Co., to be transported by the good steamship Hugo, now lying in the port of New York, and bound for Liverpool, one hundred and sixty-five live cattle on deck. On deck at owner's risk, steamer not to be held accountable for accident to or mortality of the animals from whatever cause arising; being marked and numbered as per margin (weight, quality, contents, and value unknown), and to be delivered in like good order and condition at the port of Liverpool (or so near thereto as she may safely get) unto shippers' order or to his or their assigns. Freight prepaid in New York. General average payable according to York-Antwerp rules.

It is mutually agreed that the ship shall have liberty to sail without pilots; to tow and assist vessels in distress; to deviate for the purpose of saving life or property; that the carrier shall have the liberty to convey goods in lighters to and from the ship at the risk of the owners of the goods; and, in case the ship shall be put into a port of refuge, or be prevented from any cause from proceeding in the ordinary course of her voyage, to tranship the goods to their destination by any other steamship.

It is also mutually agreed that the carrier shall not be liable for loss or damage occasioned by causes beyond his control, by the perils of the sea, or other waters; by fire from any cause and wheresoever occurring; by barratry of the master or crew; by enemies, pirates, or robbers; by arrest and restraint of princes, rulers, or people, riots, strikes, or stoppage of labor; by explosion, bursting of boilers, breakage of shaft, or any latent defect in hull or machinery or appurtenances; by collisions, stranding, or other accidents of navigation of whatsoever kind (even when occasioned by the negligence, default, or error in judgment of the pilot, master, mariners, or other servants of the shipowner, not resulting, however, in any case, from want of due diligence by the owners of the ship, or any of them, or by the ship's husband or manager); nor by decay, heating, putrefaction, rust, sweat, change of character, drainage, leakage, breakage, or any loss or damage arising from the nature of the goods or the insufficiency of packages nor for land damage; nor for the obliteration, errors, insufficiency, or absence of marks or numbers, address or description; nor for risk of craft, hulk, or transhipment; nor for any loss or damage caused by the prolongation of the voyage.

14. Also, that this contract shall be governed by British law, with reference to which law this contract is made.

And, finally, in accepting this bill of lading, the shipper, owner, and consignee of the goods, and the holder of the bill of lading, agree to be bound by all of its stipulations, exceptions, and conditions, whether written or printed, as fully as if they were all signed by such shipper, owner, consignee, or holder.

became panic stricken, and drove overboard one hundred and twenty-six head of cattle; the said vessel did not incur any extraordinary or unusual stress of weather, and the act of said master and crew in driving overboard said cattle was wholly unnecessary, and the loss of said cattle was due to the incompetency and lack of skill of the master and crew;" that the vessel afterward arrived safely at Liverpool, and delivered to the shippers or their agents thirty-eight of the cattle in good condition, one having died; and that the insurance company, having insured the cattle, paid the partnership for the loss, and took an assignment of its rights of action against the steamer and her owners.

The answer alleged that the receipt, transportation, and delivery of the cattle were subject to the terms and conditions of a contract between the shippers and respondents, dated October 10, 1891 (which is copied in the margin†), 107] and of the *bill of lading; admitted the sailing of the vessel with the cattle on board, and a loss of the cattle; denied the other allegations of the libel; and contained the following averments:

108] *"Further answering the said libel, the respondent avers that by the terms and conditions of the contract and bill of lading, under which the said cattle were received for transportation and delivery it was provided that the carrier should not be liable for loss or damage occasioned by causes beyond his control, by the perils of the seas or other waters, or by other accidents of navigation, even when occasioned by the negligence, default, or error in judgment of the master, mariners, or other servants of the shipowner, and that the cattle were carried on deck at the owner's risk, and under a special provision that the steamer should not be held accountable for accident to or mortality of the animals from whatsoever cause arising. There was a further provision that the contract should be construed and governed by the law as administered in the courts of Great Britain, with reference to which law the contract was stated to be and was made.

"And the respondent avers that the loss of said cattle was due to the perils of the sea encountered upon the said voyage, which broke certain of the cattlehouses and set the cattle adrift, and that during the continuance of the perils, and by reason thereof, certain of the cattle were washed overboard, and others were thrown about the deck, bruised and with broken limbs, and reduced to a dead, dying, or hopeless condition, and that upon such being taken to the gangways, they were washed over by the seas."

"And the respondent avers that the care given to said cattle was according to the best judgment of the master of said steamer, and that if he erred in his judgment or was in any degree negligent, which the respondent denies that still this respondent is absolved from accountability and responsibility by reason of the terms of the bill of lading; and also that, by the law as administered in the courts of Great Britain, the respondent, being itself without fault, is validly, under the terms of the said contract and bill of lading, absolved from all responsibility for any negligent or improper act or conduct on the part of the master, mariners, or other servants of the respondent."

It was stipulated by counsel "that the English judicial *decisions, as contained in [109 the printed decisions of the law or admiralty courts, may be referred to by either party as evidence of the English common or maritime law as administered in the English courts."

†White Star Line. Cattle contract—Memorandum of agreement concluded at New York the 10th day of October, 1891, between H. Maitland Kersey, agent of the Spanish steamer Hugo, and Messrs. William W. Brauer & Co. of Richmond, Virginia.

The agent agrees to let to the said shipper suitable space, as undernoted, for the transportation of live cattle; this is to say:

On the steamer Hugo, intended to sail from New York about Oct. 24, 1891, for Liverpool, England.

For about one hundred sixty live cattle on the upper deck.

No other cattle to be carried this voyage.

The shipper agrees to ship all the cattle, as above mentioned, at the rate of 50 shillings, British sterling, for each animal shipped on open decks.

The shipper especially agrees to prepay freight on the above-mentioned shipments on date of sailing, in current funds at the rate for which prime bankers are selling sight bills on London, on the number of cattle shipped at New York, vessel lost or not lost, and irrespective of the number landed at the port of destination, and the shipper assumes all risk of mortality or accident, however caused, throughout the voyage.

Stalls to be put up at the ship's expense, and to be constructed to the satisfaction of the inspector or underwriters interested, and to the satisfaction of shipper, who will assume all responsibility for same and for various appliances for ventilation after shipment of cattle.

The steamer undertakes to supply sufficient good condensed or fresh water for the use of the animals during the voyage; also, water casks and hose.

Steamer to provide space, free of charge, for corn and strictly compressed fodder for animals, but freight, if demanded, shall be payable on any unusual excess of fodder landed at port of destination. If fodder be supplied that is not strictly compressed, a proportionate quantity may be carried on deck.

Steamer to supply suitable gangways and elevators for loading cattle.

Steamer to give free passage, over and back, and to supply bedding to drovers in charge of animals (not exceeding one man to every thirty cattle), and if not returning direct to port of sailing, to provide free intermediate passage back for foreman, and free steerage passage back for other attendants, by first available steamer of this line.

Steamer to give six running days' notice of her intended departure, and twelve hours' notice of the hour the cattle must be delivered to her, but such notices to be given or received are subject to become inoperative in case of strike or stoppage of labor.

Steamer guarantees to sail as soon after shipment of all the animals as tide and weather permit, or pay expenses of keep of animals at the rate of 50c. per head per day in full.

Steamer has privilege of exceeding her net register of tonnage in grain, upon paying to shippers the extra premium charged by the underwriters with whom the animals are insured.

Shippers to deliver cattle to the vessel between sunrise and sunset, at the dock or in the stream, at their option.

Shippers guarantee to deliver animals by expiry of notice, provided vessel is ready for them, or to pay for detention of steamer at the rate of £50 per day.

In case of nonarrival of vessel in time to sail from New York on or before November 4, 1891, shipper has option of cancelation.

The line form of live-stock bill of lading to be used for cattle shipped under this contract, and its conditions to govern any questions not provided herein, subject to U. S. government inspection.

Any dispute arising under this contract to be settled by arbitration in the usual way.

Dated New York, October 10, 1891.

H. Maitland Kersey.
Wm. W. Brauer & Co.

The conclusions of fact of the district judge were summed up in his opinion as follows:

"During three days from October 30 to November 1 inclusive, the vessel met heavy weather during which there was heavy rolling of the vessel. The cattle were in pens on deck; a few were forward under or near the turtle back, which were saved; the rest were in the vicinity of Nos. 3 and 4 hatches forward and aft of the engine room in pens built in the wings on the port and starboard sides of the ship, all of which were lost. The storm was heaviest on the afternoon and night of Saturday the 31st, the wind and seas coming first and heaviest from the northwest, but on Saturday hauling to the northward and to the east northeast, with cross seas. Some slight damage was done to a few pens on the 30th; more were broken on Saturday the 31st; but these were repaired, and the cattle put in place toward nightfall. About 5 o'clock on that day the after gangways were opened on each side, and about ten or twelve cattle that had become maimed and helpless were sent overboard through those gangways. The chief loss was during that night and the following morning, when, shortly after daylight, the captain gave orders to open the forward gangways also, and the whole deck was cleared of all the cattle, save the thirty-nine under the turtle back."

"Upon the whole testimony in this pitiful case, I am not disposed to pronounce any unfavorable judgment upon the handling of the ship by the master. His record as a master appears to have been good, and on any doubtful question of navigation he is entitled to the benefit of his record. He had some, though not large, experience in the transportation of cattle; and the experts called by each party place so much stress upon the special circumstances of the situation, the quality of the ship, and the necessary determination of the master's own judgment at the time, that, in the 110]circumstances *testified to, I do not find any conclusive proof adverse to the master's judgment as to the navigation of the ship.

"The evidence leaves not the least doubt in my mind, however, that the sacrifice of a considerable number of live cattle that were not maimed or substantially hurt was made on the morning of Sunday, the 1st of November, not from any pressing necessity, but solely from mere apprehension; and I am further persuaded that there was no reasonable or apparent necessity for the sacrifice. It was morning. The night was past. No one testifies to any pressing peril to the ship. The log does not hint of it. No reason appears why such cattle as could go about, and were actually going about, should not have been cared for and preserved. There was plainly no effort made to separate the sound from the unsound. Even the master says in answer to the question, 'Were these cattle standing up that went overboard? Answer. They were down. Some may have been up. I don't know.' His object plainly was to clear the deck of all the cattle from No. 3 aft, with no attempt to discriminate or save any. His state of mind is shown by his concluding words, 'We breathed happy when we saw it open' (No. 3 hatch)."

The district judge was of opinion that the stipulations of the bill of lading, so far as they undertook to exempt the respondent from accountability for the negligence of the master or crew, though valid by the law of England, were invalid by our law; and therefore decreed "that the libellants recover damages for such of the oxen as were of any market value and not fatally wounded or maimed at the time when the houses and cleats provided for them were designedly torn up, and which oxen were cast overboard or negligently suffered to go overboard through the open gangways on the morning of November 1st, and on the evening of the night previous;" and referred the case to a commissioner to ascertain and report the amount of such damage. 57 Fed. Rep. 403.

The commissioner reported that sixty-three of the cattle were thus voluntarily and unnecessarily sacrificed, and assessed damages for that number of cattle. The district court confirmed his report, and entered a decree accordingly for the libellants. 61 Fed. Rep. 860.

*Both parties appealed to the circuit [111 court of appeals, which adopted the conclusions of fact of the district court, and affirmed the decree upon the ground that the case was not within the exceptions in the bill of lading. 35 U. S. App. 44.

The respondent applied for and obtained a writ of certiorari from this court.

Mr. Wilhelmus Mynderse and Messrs. Butler, Notman, Joline, & Mynderse, for Compania de Navigacion la Flecha:

The action is prosecuted in the courts of the United States in attempted evasion of the agreement "that the contract shall be governed by British law."

The libellants, attracted apparently by the decision in the case of The Brantford City, 29 Fed. Rep. 373, have sought to build a similar case against the respondent, and have come far out of their way to bring suit in the same jurisdiction.

Liverpool was the port of destination. It was there that the insurance company, the principal libellant herein, and the only libellant that profits by the decree, had its principal offices, and it was there that the claim should have been presented and pressed, if presented and pressed at all.

Apparently no claim was presented there. But six months later the insurance company came to New York and instituted this suit.

They did not even have the excuse of coming here to enforce a lien upon the Hugo. The Hugo was not here. Jurisdiction over the respondent was obtained by attaching the steamer Enrique.

The libellants did not make proper provision for the cattle.

By the terms of the contract the steamer was to supply space, stalls, water for the cattle, and free transportation for the drovers in charge, not exceeding one man for every thirty cattle. The stalls were to be put up at the expense of the steamer to the satisfaction of the shippers, who agreed to assume all responsibility. There is no dispute that the stalls were properly constructed.

The shippers sent six men with their cattle only two of these men have been produced as witnesses.

So conspicuously did the cattlemen abandon their posts and leave the burden of caring for the cattle upon the seamen, that the seamen claimed wages for performing the duties of the cattlemen.

The storm encountered by the Hugo was one of notable severity, and the losses of the cattle were due to the perils incident to the storm.

The steamer was intelligently and prudently managed and navigated during the storm

The opinion of the district judge and the opinion delivered by the majority of the judges of the circuit court of appeals are in error as to facts.

The proofs establish that efforts to preserve the cattle were made as long as efforts were in any way reasonable or practicable

But with the storm then raging and threatening to become worse, we submit that the judges below had no right to impose upon the master the duty of separating "the sound from the maimed." Such a requirement goes beyond the bounds of the practicable.

Who was to determine whether a beast was sound or injured? How was such person to measure the extent of the injuries? Was he bound to go among the struggling beasts on a wave swept deck?

We urge that it cannot be held that a single sound beast, or a beast with any commercial value, was lost negligently

The loss of those who went through the gangway was not a negligent loss; it was a loss incident to the gangways being open, open that the vessel might be freed from the dead and wrecked cattle.

The fact that the loss was a large one does not carry any presumption that it was a negligent loss.

Losses of cattle are incident to the business of transporting live cattle at sea They are losses that the libellant insurance company should be content to bear.

The law of Great Britain should be applied to the construction of the contract as set forth in the bill of lading, and the courts have erred in omitting to apply such law.

In the bill of lading the following provisions are found:

This contract shall be governed by the British law, with reference to which law this contract is made.

On October 10, 1891, two weeks before the bill of lading was issued, a contract had been made for the shipment of cattle "on the upper deck." That contract provided that this very bill of lading should be used, and specifically provided that the shipper "assumed all risks of mortality or accident, however caused, throughout the voyage."

In a recent case, it was held by this court that a similar preliminary contract was a mere memorandum between the parties, and that the relations of the parties were to be governed by the provisions of the bill of lading.

The Caledonia, 157 U. S. 124, 139 (39: 644, 649).

The general rule that the nature, the obligation, and the interpretation of a contract are to be governed by the law of the place where it is made, unless the parties at the time of making it have some other law in view, requires a contract of affreightment made in one country between citizens or residents thereof, and the performance of which begins there, to be governed by the law of that country, unless the parties, when entering into the contract, clearly manifest a mutual intention that it shall be governed by the law of some other country.

Liverpool & G. W. Steam Co. v. Phenix Ins. Co. (The Montana), 129 U. S. 397, 458 (32: 788, 798).

The court held in that case that there was nothing to indicate that the contracting parties looked to any other law than the law of the United States.

In the case under consideration, however, it is apparent that the parties did look to the law of England, that they deliberately chose it; that it was not an exaction from a shipper by a carrier, but that it was in accord with a preliminary contract, freely made and unobjected to

The cattle were destined to an English port. It was fitting that reference should be made to the law of that port. Any differences between shippers and shipowners would naturally be submitted to the law of the place where their relations terminated.

Moreover, the Reliance Marine Insurance Company (Limited), which represents the entire interest of the libellants, is a British corporation having its principal office in Liverpool, the port of the Hugo's destination.

The validity of the provisions of the bill of lading should be determined by the standard of what is "just and reasonable in the eye of the law"

New York C. R. Co v. Lockwood, 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 357, 380, 382 (21. 627, 640, 641).

It is just and reasonable to apply the British law—the law of the port of destination

The district judge declined to enforce the English law upon the ground that the stipulation in the bill of lading providing for the application of the British law was invalid as against the public policy of the United States.

A similar provision has, however, been sustained in the district court of Maryland.

The Oranmore, 24 Fed. Rep. 922, 927

The United States circuit court of appeals avoided any discussion of the application of the British law, disregarding certain of the exemption clauses, and holding in respect to others that the facts did not render the question of applying the British law material.

The case of Oscanyan v. Winchester Repeating Arms Co. 103 U. S. 261 (26: 539), which has been cited in opposition, is not pertinent, for the reason that the suit was founded on a turpis causa, arising and performed wholly within the United States; nor is the case of Rousillon v. Rousillon, L. R. 14 Ch. Div. 351, for the reason that the contract there sued upon was in fact enforced.

The provision in the bill of lading that the contract be governed by British law is not invalid.

It cannot be fairly said that there is a question in the case whether or not it is against the public policy of this country to permit a carrier by sea to exempt himself from the consequences of his servants' negligence or error. The real question is whether it is against the public policy of this country to permit shipowner and shipper to agree in New York that their contract for a shipment of cattle from New York to England shall be construed according to the place where the final performance of the contract takes place, and where, if anywhere, differences as to the performance by the carrier of his engagements would naturally arise.

It is especially proper that where a contract relates to transportation on the high seas from one nation to another, the entire transaction not being under the jurisdiction of any one nation, the parties shall declare in their contract the jurisdiction by the laws of which they intend their contract to be governed.

With such declaration made, it is against public policy and against commercial integrity to permit either party, and especially the party with whom the right to select the forum rests, to insist that the law of the forum, and not the law stipulated in the contract, should be applied to the construction of the contract.

It has been said by this court that it is against public policy to permit a carrier to exempt himself from the consequences of the negligence of his servants.

New York C. R. Co. v. Lockwood, 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 357, 378 (21: 627, 639).

The rule has been extended from the strict obligations resting upon a carrier by land to cover those of a carrier by sea.

Liverpool & G. W. Steam Co. v. Phenix Ins. Co. (The Montana), 129 U. S. 397 (32: 788).

At the time this latter decision was made there was no legislative distinction between the obligations and rights of a carrier by sea and of a carrier by land.

Nor, indeed, was there any such distinction at the time these cattle were shipped upon the Hugo. But Congress, with whom certainly rests the right to declare the public policy of a country, have since that date passed an act which provides in terms that:

"If the owner of any vessel transporting merchandise or property to or from any port in the United States of America shall exercise due diligence to make the said vessel in all respects seaworthy and properly manned, equipped, and supplied, neither the vessel, her owner or owners, agent or charterers shall become or be held responsible for damage or loss resulting from faults or errors in navigation or in the management of said vessel, nor shall the vessel, her owner or owners, charterers, agent, or master be held liable for losses arising from dangers of the sea or other navigable waters," etc.

The owners of the Hugo exercised "due diligence" in the selection of a master.

If, therefore, this loss had occurred subsequent to July 1, 1893, there would have been no recovery for the libellants under the laws of the United States.

Prior to July 1, 1893, there could be no recovery for the libellants according to the laws of Great Britain, and to those laws they should be remitted.

If this court will not re-examine the facts, and accepts the facts as found by a majority of the judges of the circuit court of appeals, still no liability rests upon the shipowner for the loss of libellants' cattle under the contract of shipment, such contract being covered by the law of Great Britain.

There are several exemption clauses to be considered.

It was recited in the bill of lading that the cattle were shipped "on deck at owner's risk."

That such a provision should be made respecting a shipment of live animals to be transported on the deck of a freight steamer across the Atlantic, at a tempestuous season of the year, was eminently proper, and due allowance for the risks assumed by the owner of the cattle was undoubtedly made in the rate of freight at which the cattle were accepted for carriage.

In the case of Burton v. English, a similar clause "The steamer shall be provided with a deck cargo if required at full freight, but at merchant's risk" was considered by the judges of the Queen's bench division, who substantially held that it relieved the shipowner from all responsibility for the acts of his servants, except responsibility to contribute in general average in case of lawful jettison or other lawful sacrifice.

Burton v. English, L. R. 12 Q. B. Div. 218, 219, 220.

Justice Bowen said, respecting the clause: "Now, that clearly is a stipulation in favor of the shipowners, and prima facie it seems to me meant to relieve them from the responsibility of some act of their servants by which they would otherwise be bound, and from the incidents of some risk which otherwise would fall upon them as carriers and under their contract of carriage. It would, I think, clearly cover improper jettison, also it would cover negligence of the captain or crew, occasionally stranding or collision, and any other acts, if any there be, of the servants of the shipowners for which they would otherwise be responsible."

Burton v. English, L. R. 12 Q. B. Div. 218, 223; Lewis v. Great Western R. Co. L. R. 3 Q. B Div. 195; McCawley v. Furness R. Co. L. R. 8 Q. B. 57.

A further clause of exemption is contained in the words: "Steamer not to be held accountable for accident to or mortality of the animals, from whatever cause arising."

The Caledonia, 157 U. S. 124, 139 (39: 644, 649).

That such an exemption is reasonable is now recognized by our own statutes.

27 Stat. at L. 445, chap. 105, § 3.

Barratry in a contract of carriage bears a different meaning than does the same word in a contract of insurance.

Carver, Carriage by Sea, 2d ed. pp. 107–109, §§ 99, 100.

If the immediate cause of loss is to be deemed an accident of navigation, the shipowner is freed from liability, even though such accident was remotely due to the negligence, default, or error in judgment of the pilot, master, or mariners of the ship.

Carver, Carriage by Sea, 2d ed. p. 110, § 101; The Duero, L. R. 2 Adm. & Eccl. Rep. 393; Grill v. General Iron Screw Collier Co. L. R. 1 C. P. 600; The Cressington, [1891] P. 152.

It is a matter of peculiar interest that this court should declare the effect of a clause which provides that the bill of lading should be governed by a law other than the law of the place of issue.

The question has arisen in numerous cases, but there is as yet no authoritative decision in any appellate tribunal.

The clause has been sustained as valid in the district court of the United States for the district of Maryland.

The Oramore, 24 Fed. Rep. 922.

It has been rejected as invalid in the district court of the United States for the southern district of New York, and in the district court of the United States for the district of Massachusetts.

The Brantford City, 29 Fed. Rep. 373, 396; The Guildhall, 58 Fed. Rep. 796; The Iowa, 50 Fed. Rep. 561.

No appellate tribunal has passed upon the validity of the clause, and no certainty can be felt by the enormous commercial and shipping interests using bills of lading until the question has been adjudicated in this court.

There is not involved any question as to abandoning the declarations of public policy already made by this court respecting the exemption of a carrier from the consequences of his servants' negligence.

There is not involved even the question of a modification of such declarations, because of the provisions of the Harter act.

27 Stat. at L. 445, chap. 105.

There is not involved any question of introducing the law of a foreign country for the construction of the terms of contracts made and performed here.

The question is whether a shipper and a shipowner may, in contracting here for the transportation of cargo from this country to a foreign country, validly stipulate that any disputes or differences under the contract shall be determined by the law of the country where the shipment is to be delivered.

We submit that it is "reasonable and just in the eye of the law" for the parties to agree to submit their rights to the law of the place where their relations will naturally terminate. If the court holds that such a stipulation is "reasonable and just in the eye of the law," then the contract must be sustained, even though such foreign law does differ from the law of the United States.

New York C. R. Co. v. Lockwood, 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 357, 380, 384 (21: 627, 640, 642).

No question has ever been raised in either pleadings or proofs as to the regularity of the clause in the bill of lading.

Mr. W. W. MacFarland and Messrs. MacFarland & Parkin, for Brauer et al.:

The burden of proof was upon the ship to justify the nondelivery of the cattle according to the contract for carriage. As to this point there is not understood to be any contention, the rule is perfectly well settled.

Wheeler, Carriers, 252, 253; The E. M. Norton, 15 Fed. Rep. 686; Marx v. Britannia, 34 Fed. Rep. 906; Speyer v. The Mary Belle Roberts, 2 Sawy. 1; Cumming v. Barracouta, 40 Fed. Rep. 498; The Newark, 1 Blatchf. 203; The Sloga, 10 Ben. 316; The Shand, 10 Ben. 300; The Mangalore, 23 Fed. Rep. 462; The Juniata Paton, 1 Biss. 17; The Tangier, 82 Fed. Rep. 230; The Mascotte, 48 Fed. Rep. 119.

It is equally well settled that those provisions of the bill of lading which purport to exempt the carrier from the negligence or misconduct of master and mariners are void, and that the device of referring the validity and construction of such provisions to a foreign law does not make them valid. The courts of no country give effect to terms in a contract which are contrary to the public policy of their own jurisdiction.

Liverpool & G. W. Steam Co. v. Phenix Ins. Co. (The Montana), 129 U. S. 397 (32: 788); The Iowa, 50 Fed. Rep. 561; The Energia, 56 Fed. Rep. 124; Lewisohn v. National S. S. Co. 56 Fed. Rep. 602.

These pens were built according to the regulations prescribed under the act of 1891. The corner stanchions, inside the rail underneath the turtle back, were 4×6. They were fastened by 2-inch stuff on the forward end as a bulkhead. The floors were composed of 2-inch spruce.

A copy of the regulations is handed up with this brief, and it will be seen that the pens are so constructed as to resist the severest storms and protect the cattle from injury from the seas.

Cattle pens are intended to be strong enough to withstand any sea known to experience, and if any sea were violent enough to break them down, it would have devastated the deck if it did not sink the ship; but they say it spared everything but the pens.

The storm was not severe enough to do any material damage either to cattle or ship.

It is conclusively established by the evidence for the libellants, confirmed by the evidence for the respondents, that when the engine was stopped on the afternoon of the 31st at 2:30, and as late as least as 5 P. M., the sea had done no substantial damage to ship or cattle pens; that what damage had been done had been repaired, and the cattle put back in their pens. And having safely reached this point the rest of the journey to the conclusion is very short and easy.

The burden is on the respondent, and it must pay for all cattle not shown to have been dead when thrown overboard. It does not relieve itself from liability by showing that some were destroyed by sea perils, unless it shows how many.

Cumming v. The Barracouta, 40 Fed. Rep. 498; Speyer v. The Mary Belle Roberts, 2 Sawy. 1.

Mr. Justice Gray delivered the opinion of the court:

The contract sued on was made in October, 1891, more than a year before the passage of the Harter act, and the case is unaffected by its provisions. Act of February 13, 1893, chap. 105 (27 Stat. at L. 445).

By the law of this country, before that act, as declared upon much consideration by this court, common carriers, by land or sea, could not, by any form of contract with the owner of property carried, exempt themselves from responsibility for loss or damage arising from negligence of their own servants; and any stipulation for such exemption was contrary to public policy and void. New York C. Railroad Co. v. Lockwood, 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 357 [21: 627]; Liverpool & G. W. Steam Co. v. Phenix Ins. Co. 129 U. S. 397 [32: 788].

By the modern decisions in England, on the other hand, made since it has become to us a foreign country, common carriers, except so far as controlled by the provisions of the railway and canal traffic act of 1854, were permitted to exempt themselves by express contract for responsibility for losses occasioned by negli-

In the case at bar, the decision of the district judge proceeded upon the ground that any stipulation directly exempting the carrier from all liability for negligence of his servants being void by our law as against public policy, the equivalent stipulation that the contract should be governed by the law of England was equally void, and could not be enforced in the courts of the United States. That decision is in accordance with the previous decision of the same judge in The Brantford City, 29 Fed. Rep. 373, and with several subsequent decisions of his. The Energia, 56 Fed. Rep. 124; The Guildhall, 58 Fed. Rep. 796; Botany Worsted Mills v. Knott, 76 Fed. Rep. 582. The like view has been taken by Judge Nelson in the district of Massachusetts in The Iowa, 50 Fed. Rep. 561; by Judge Benedict in the eastern district of New York in Lewisohn v. National Steamship Co. 56 Fed. Rep. 602; and by Judge Butler in the eastern district of Pennsylvania in The Glenmavis, 69 Fed. Rep. 472. See also Oscanyan v. Winchester Repeating Arms Co. 103 U. S. 261 [26: 539]; Hamlyn v. Talisker Distillery, [1894] A. C. 202, 209, 214; Rousillon v. Rousillon, L. R. 14 Ch. Div. 351, 369.

But it is unnecessary to express a decisive opinion upon the validity of the contract, because, assuming it to be valid and to govern the case, this court concurs with the circuit court of appeals in the opinion that the respondent was liable for the loss in question.

Exceptions in a bill of lading or charter party, inserted by the shipowner for his own benefit, are unquestionably to be construed most strongly against him. The Caledonia, 157 U. S. 124, 137 [39: 644, 648]; The Majestic, 166 U. S. 375, 386 [41: 1039, 1043]; Norman v. Binnington, L. R. 25 Q. B. Div. 475, 477; Baerselman v. Bailey [1895] 2 Q. B. 301, 305.

By the laws of both countries, the ordinary contract of a common carrier by sea involves an obligation on his part to use due care and skill in navigating the vessel and in carrying the goods; and an exception, in the bill of lad-119] ing, of perils *of the sea, or other specified perils, does not excuse him from that obligation, nor exempt him from liability for loss or damage from one of those perils, to which the negligence of himself or his servants has contributed.

This rule of construction was fully established in this court before it had occasion to decide the question whether it was within the power of the carrier by express stipulation to exempt himself from all responsibility for the negligence of himself or his servants.

In the leading case of New Jersey Steam Navigation Co. v. Merchants' Bank, 47 U. S. 6 How. 344 [12: 465], a crate of William F. Harnden, in which was money belonging to the bank, was shipped upon a steamboat of the navigation company under an agreement stipulating that "the said crate, with its contents, is to be at all times exclusively at the risk of the said William F. Harnden; and the New Jersey Steam Navigation Company will not, in any event, be responsible, either to him or his employers, for the loss of any goods, wares, merchandise, money, notes, bills, evidences of debt, or property of any and every description, to be conveyed or transported by him in said crate, or otherwise, in any manner, in the boats of the said company." This court held that the navigation company was not thereby exonerated from loss by fire arising from the negligence of that company or its servants; and the reasons for the decision were stated by Mr. Justice Nelson as follows: "The special agreement, in this case, under which the goods were shipped, provided that they should be conveyed at the risk of Harnden; and that the respondents were not to be accountable to him or to his employers, in any event, for loss or damage. The language is general and broad, and might very well comprehend every description of risks incident to the shipment. But we think it would be going farther than the intent of the parties, upon any fair and reasonable construction of the agreement, were we to regard it as stipulating for wilful misconduct, gross negligence, or want of ordinary care, either in the seaworthiness of the vessel, her proper equipments and furniture, or in her management by the master and hands. . . . If it is competent at all for the carrier *to stipu-[120 late for the gross negligence of himself, and his servants or agents, in the transportation of the goods, it should be required to be done, at least, in terms that would leave no doubt as to the meaning of the parties." 84 U. S. 6 How. 383, 384 [12: 482]. See also The Hornet [Lawrence v. Minturn], 58 U. S. 17 How. 100 [15: 58]; Western Transportation Co. v. Downer, 78 U. S. 11 Wall. 129 [20: 160]; The Syracuse, 79 U. S. 12 Wall. 167 [20: 382]; Liverpool & G. W. Steam Co. v. Phenix Ins. Co. 129 U. S. 397, 438 [32: 788, 791].

In England, likewise, it has long been recognized as a settled rule that under a contract to carry goods, containing an exception such as of "breakage or leakage," or of "barratry of the master or mariners," or of "perils of the sea," there still rests upon the carrier, not merely the duty to carry the goods if not prevented by the excepted perils, but also the obligation that he and his servants shall use due care and skill and shall not be negligent in carrying the goods. Phillips v. Clark, 2 C. B. N. S. 156; The Helene, L. R. 1 P. C. 231; Lloyd v. General Iron Screw Collier Co. 3 Hurlst. & C. 284; Grill v. Same, L. R. 1 C. P. 600, and L. R. 3 C. P. 476; Czech v. General Steam Navigation Co. L. R. 3 C. P. 14; Steel v. State Line Steamship Co. L. R. 3 App. Cas. 72, 87, 88; Manchester, S. & L. Railway v. Brown,

L. R. 8 App. Cas. 703, 709, 710; The Xantho, L. R. 12 App. Cas. 503, 510, 515.

The English case most resembling in its circumstances the case at bar is Leuw v. Dudgeon, briefly reported in L. R. 3 C. P. 17, note, and more fully in 17 L. T. N. S. 145, by which it appears to have been as follows: Cattle were shipped, some of them on deck, under a bill of lading containing these clauses: "Ship free in case of mortality and from all damage arising from the act of God, the Queen's enemies, fire, accidents from machinery, or boilers, steam, or other dangers of the seas, rivers, roadsteads, or steam navigation whatsoever." "The ship not liable for accident, injury, mortality, or jettison, whether shipped on deck or in the hold." On the vessel putting out to sea, she experienced fine weather and the sea was smooth, but there was a ground swell, and after she had been out some time she suddenly rolled over on her beam ends; the cattle pens gave way, and the cattle fell over to the starboard side, and in 121] order to save the vessel it was *necessary to throw those on deck overboard. It was held that if the accident was owing to the vessel putting to sea with insufficient ballast, the owners were liable, notwithstanding the exemptions in the bill of lading, which included "jettison" as well as "accidents from dangers of the seas."

In that case, indeed (as in the case in this court of The Caledonia, above cited), the fault of the shipowner consisted in sending the ship to sea in an unseaworthy condition. But Mr. Justice Willes, who delivered the leading opinion, laid down the general rule that "the exceptions were intended to save the shipowner from liability for the effects of accident, and not to absolve him from the duty of exercising reasonable diligence." 17 L. T. N. S. 146. And he treated the case as coming within the principle of that rule as affirmed in the cases, above cited, of Phillips v. Clark and Grill v. General Iron Screw Collier Co., in the one of which the clause "not to be accountable for leakage or breakage," and in the other the clause "accidents or dangers of the seas, rivers, or navigation, of whatever nature or kind soever, excepted," was held not to cover a loss, otherwise within the exception caused by the negligence of the master or crew. So, in Steel v. State Line Steamship Co., above cited, Lord Blackburn said, in the House of Lords, that in construing such exceptions in a bill of lading exactly the same considerations would arise as to the duty of the shipowner to furnish a ship really fit for the purpose, as had been applied, in the series of cases of which Phillips v. Clark was the leading one, to the duty of himself and his servants to use due care and skill in carrying the goods.

In Notara v. Henderson, L. R. 7 Q. B. 225, 236, the court of exchequer chamber, in a considered judgment delivered by Mr. Justice Willes, held that the words "loss or damage arising from collision or other accidents of navigation occasioned by default of the master or crew, or any other accidents of the seas, rivers, and steam navigation, of whatever nature or kind, excepted," did not exempt the owner from negligence in omitting to take out and dry the cargo at a port of distress, because the authorities *(specially mentioning 122 Grill v. General Iron Screw Collier Co. above cited), "and the reasoning upon which they are founded, are conclusive to show that the exemption is from liability for loss which could not have been avoided by reasonable care, skill, and diligence, and that it is inapplicable to the case of a loss arising from the want of such care, and the sacrifice of the cargo by reason thereof."

In Gill v. Manchester, S. & L. Railway, L. R. 8 Q. B. 186, the court of Queen's bench, applying the same rule of construction, held that a provision in a contract for the carriage of cattle by railway, by which the railway company was not to be responsible for any loss or injury to the cattle "in the receiving, forwarding, or delivering, if such damage be occasioned by the kicking, plunging, or restiveness of the animal," did not relieve the company from liability for negligence of its servants in delivering a restive cow.

In Lloyd v. General Iron Screw Collier Co. above cited, Lord Bramwell said that the words "accident or damage from machinery, boilers, steam," could not apply to an explosion caused by the wilful act of the engineer. 3 Hurlst. & C. 292.

The passages quoted by the respondent from Burton v. English, L. R. 12 Q. B. Div. 218, 220, 223, as showing that the words "on deck at owner's risk" exempt the carrier from liability for unlawful jettison or for negligence of the master and crew, were obiter dicta, the only point decided being that those words did not exclude the right of the owner of the goods to recover in general average for a lawful jettison. See Ralli v. Troop, 157 U. S. 386, 396 [39: 742, 748]. The two other cases cited by the respondent were cases in which railway companies were held not to be responsible for the negligence of their servants under contracts essentially different from that now in question. One was an action by a passenger traveling as a drover accompanying cattle under a free pass, one of the terms of which was that he should travel at his own risk. McCawley v. Furness Railway, L. R. 8 Q. B. 57. The other was an action by a person who, knowing that the defendant had two rates of carriage, a higher rate when it took the ordinary liability of a carrier, and a lower rate when it was relieved *from all liability except that aris 123 ing from the wilful misconduct of its servants, delivered goods to be carried at the lower rate under a contract in which the only words defining the carrier's liability were "owner's risk." Lewis v. Great Western Railway, L. R. 3 Q. B. Div. 195.

Upon consideration of the conflicting testimony, with the aid of the careful arguments of counsel, no ground is shown for reversing or modifying the conclusions of fact reached by both courts below. Their concurrent decisions upon a question of fact are to be followed, unless clearly shown to be erroneous. Morewood v. Enequist, 64 U. S. 23 How. 491 [16: 516]; The Richmond, 103 U. S. 540 [26: 313], and cases cited; The Conqueror, 166 U. S. 110, 136 [41 937, 948].

By the facts so found, it appears that the cattle, for the loss of which a recovery has been permitted, were sound and uninjured animals, forcibly thrown or driven overboard, in rough weather, by order of the master, from unfounded apprehension on his part, in the absence of any pressing peril to the ship, and with no apparent or reasonable necessity for a jettison of the sound cattle, and no attempt to separate them from those which had already been injured by perils of the sea.

The clauses of the bill of lading (other than the reference to British law), on which the respondent relies, are those in the first paragraph, "on deck at owner's risk; steamer not to be held accountable for accident to or mortality of the animals, from whatever cause arising;" and those in the third paragraph, by which "it is also mutually agreed that the carrier shall not be liable for loss or damage occasioned by causes beyond his control, by the perils of the sea, or other waters;" by barratry of the master or crew;" or "by collisions, stranding, or other accidents of navigation, of whatsoever kind, even when occasioned by the negligence, default, or error in judgment of the pilot, master, mariners, or other servants of the shipowner."

The bill of lading itself shows that all the cattle to be carried under this contract were to be on deck. The words "on deck at owner's risk" 124] cannot have been intended by *the parties to cover risks from all causes whatsoever, including negligent or wilful acts of the master and crew. To give so broad an interpretation to words of exception, inserted by the carrier and for his benefit, would be contrary to settled rules of construction, and would render nugatory many of the subsequent stipulations of the bill of lading.

The wrongful jettison of the sound cattle by the act of the carrier's servants cannot reasonably, or consistently with the line of English authorities already cited, or with our own decisions, be considered either as an "accident to or mortality of the animals," or as a "loss or damage occasioned by causes beyond his control, by the perils of the sea, or other waters," or yet as a loss or damage "by collisions, stranding, or other accidents of navigation." There having been no collision, stranding, or other accident of navigation, there was nothing to which the only stipulation in the bill of lading against the consequences of negligence, default, or error in judgment of the master and crew could apply.

There was no barratry, because there was neither intentional fraud or breach of trust, nor wilful violation of law, one of which, at least, is necessary to constitute barratry. Patapsco Ins. Co. v. Coulter, 28 U. S. 3 Pet. 222 [7: 659]; Lawton v. Sun Mut. Ins. Co. 2 Cush. 500; Grill v. General Iron Screw Collier Co. above cited.

The facts of the case, therefore, do not bring it within any exceptions of the bill of lading, assuming them to be valid.

Decree affirmed.

v.
STATE OF WASHINGTON and W H. Moyer, Sheriff of King County, Washington.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 124-131.)

Complaint in habeas corpus—verdict in capital case—appointment of another day for execution of death penalty.

1. A complaint in habeas corpus alleging invalidity of process or proceedings under which the party is held in custody must set out copies of such process or proceedings, or the essential parts thereof, and mere averments of conclusions of law are inadequate.
2. A verdict of "guilty as charged" is sufficient under the Washington statutes, to sustain a sentence of murder in the first degree, where the indictment charged that degree as well as lower degrees.
3. The appointment of another day for the execution of the death penalty, in accordance with a statute, when the day first appointed has passed during the pendency of an appeal, is not in denial of due process of law or in violation of the Federal Constitution.

APPEAL from an order of the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Washington refusing a writ of habeas corpus applied for by Henry Craemer. On motions to dismiss or affirm. Affirmed.

Statement by Mr. Chief Justice Fuller:

This was an appeal from a final order of the circuit court of the United States for the district of Washington refusing a writ of habeas corpus on the face of the petition therefor. The petition averred that Henry Craemer, the petitioner, was a citizen of the United States, residing in the county of King in the state of Washington; that he was unlawfully held in custody by the sheriff of that county, who was about to take his life, under certain alleged process and authority, "wholly without authority of law, without the jurisdiction of any court, contrary to the law, and contrary to the rights of your petitioner as a citizen of the United States under the Constitution of the United States."

"That on or about the 23d day of August,

1894, he was charged by the state of Washington by information of three separate crimes in one count, to wit, the crime of murder in the first degree, to which the penalty of death attached upon conviction; murder in the second degree, to which a penalty of not less than ten nor more than twenty years' imprisonment in the penitentiary attached, and the offense of manslaughter, to which not less than two nor more than ten years' imprisonment in the penitentiary attached.

"That your petitioner was tried upon the said information upon issue joined in the superior court of King county.

"That to said issue a jury trying your petitioner did return him guilty of no greater offense than the offense of murder in the second degree, and by legal construction granting inferences and all presumptions in favor of your 126] petitioner as *accused, finding your petitioner guilty of no higher offense than that of manslaughter.

"That the said jury in no wise found your petitioner guilty of murder in the first degree, to which the sentence and penalty of death could be inflicted.

"That the said verdict was rendered about the 12th day of September, 1894.

"That your petitioner appealed from the decision finding your petitioner guilty of murder in the second degree or of manslaughter to the supreme court of the state of Washington upon errors assigned, and the said judgment was affirmed.

"And, further, upon the validity of the process under which your petitioner was charged, to wit, as to whether or not your petitioner could be tried upon an information for his life, your petitioner appealed to the Supreme Court of the United States upon that point and that point alone, and the said Supreme Court dismissed said appeal, returning the said cause and all process to the supreme court of the state of Washington, to be dealt with as in manner and form of the law was both just and proper."

That no death warrant had been issued while the cause was on appeal, and that there had been no opportunity or occasion to complain in the supreme court of the state, or in any other court, as to the right to issue such warrant; that the cause was tried before Judge Humes, one of the judges of the superior court of the county of King; "that after the said cause had been disposed of in the supreme court of the state of Washington, and the Supreme Court of the United States, and returned to the superior court of the state of Washington for the execution of such process as would be legal in the premises," Judge Humes had been succeeded by Judge Jacobs; that on February 6, 1897, the state of Washington moved that petitioner be brought up for judgment and other process against him and that Judge Jacobs issue a warrant of death, and that petitioner duly objected to Judge Jacobs passing sentence of death upon him and issuing a death warrant to the sheriff, and insisted that the court was without jurisdic- 127] tion *to make such an order; and that such order would be in denial of due process of law and in violation of article 6 and of article 14 of the Federal Constitution; but, notwithstanding his objections, petitioner was ordered to be executed on April 23, 1897.

That under the laws of the state of Washington, there was no time allowed further to appeal from that order to the supreme court of the state; that the governor of the state respited petitioner and stayed the execution of the death sentence until July 23, 1897; "that the next term of the supreme court of the state of Washington is not until the month of October, 1897, in which there would be any authority on the part of the court by any proceedings to review the unauthorized act of the said Judge Jacobs and of his honor the judge of the superior court," and the only remedy left petitioner as a citizen of the United States was application to the circuit court.

Petitioner prayed for the writ of habeas corpus and for the writ of certiorari to the superior court of the county of King ordering the record of the cause to be certified to the circuit court "for information, particularly the alleged information, the verdict, the judgments and the death warrant made in the premises, and all other journal entries and orders in the cause."

The appeal came before this court on motions to dismiss or affirm.

Messrs. W. C. Jones, James F. McElroy, and Patrick Henry Winston for appellees, in favor of motion.

Messrs James Hamilton Lewis, Charles A. Riddle, and John W. Pratt for appellant, opposed to motion.

Mr. Chief Justice Fuller delivered the opinion of the court:

Under existing statutory provisions appeal may be taken to this court from final decisions of the circuit courts in *habeas corpus, [128 in cases, among others, where the applicant for the writ is alleged to be restrained of his liberty in violation of the Constitution or of some law or treaty of the United States, and if the restraint is by any state court or by or under the authority of any state, further proceedings cannot be had against him pending the appeal. Rev. Stat. §§ 763, 764, 766; act of March 3, 1885 (23 Stat. at L. 437, chap. 353).

Such being the law, it has happened in numerous instances that applications for the writ have been made, and appeals taken from refusals to grant it, quite destitute of meritorious grounds, and operating only to delay the administration of justice.

From the petition in this case it appeared that petitioner was held by the sheriff of King county, Washington, to be executed in pursuance of a judgment and sentence of death rendered by the superior court of that county, and warrant issued thereon; that that judgment had been affirmed by the supreme court of the state; and that this court had heretofore determined that it had no jurisdiction to interfere in revision of that judgment. See also State v Cramer, 12 Wash. 217; Cramer v. State, 164 U. S. 704 [41: 1183].

Nevertheless, petitioner insisted that the judgment against him was void because in contravention of the Constitution of the United States, and that the judgment of this court in dismissing his writ of error was not to be regarded, as he had not in fact seen fit to raise in maintenance of that writ the particular point on which he now relied.

That point seems to be that the verdict returned against him on the information on which he was tried was either so uncertain that judgment could not be entered thereon, or amounted to no mere than a verdict finding him guilty of murder in the second degree, or of manslaughter, in respect of either of which crimes the punishment of death was not denounced."

By § 754 of the Revised Statutes it is provided that the complaint in habeas corpus shall set forth "the facts concerning the detention of the party restrained, in whose custody he is detained, and by virtue of what claim or authority, if known." The general rule is un-129]doubted that if the detention *is claimed to be unlawful by reason of the invalidity of the process or proceedings under which the party is held in custody, copies of such process or proceedings must be annexed to or the essential parts thereof set out in the petition, and mere averments of conclusions of law are necessarily inadequate. Whitten v. Tomlinson, 160 U. S. 231 [40:406]; Kohl v. Lehlbach, Id. 293 [40: 432]; Church, Habeas Corpus, 2d ed. § 91, and cases cited.

Copies of the information, the verdict, and the judgment thereon were not attached to this petition, nor the essential parts thereof stated, nor any cause assigned for such omission. In that regard the petition was wholy insufficient.

But reference was made to the record of the case in the superior court of King county, in the supreme court of the state, and in this court. The record here, to which we may properly refer (Butler v. Eaton, 141 U. S. 240 [35: 713]) shows that the information charged Craemer with the crime of murder in the first degree; that the jury "found him guilty as charged;" that he was adjudged guilty of the crime of murder in the first degree, and sentenced to death; that the judgment was affirmed; and that the writ of error to the state court was dismissed.

If the point now suggested was not in fact specifically raised in the supreme court of the state on appeal, or in this court on writ of error, it must not be assumed that any point on which the jurisdiction might have been sustained was overlooked.

Moreover, the settled law of the state was adverse to petitioner's contention as urged before the circuit court, and no ground existed which could justify that court in refusing to accept it.

The statutes of Washington define murder in the first degree, and prescribe the punishment of death upon conviction; the crime of murder in the second degree, and punishment by imprisonment in the penitentiary for a term not less than ten nor more than twenty years; and the crime of manslaughter, and punish-130]ment by like imprisonment not less than one year nor more than twenty years, and a fine in any sum not *exceeding $5 000. 2 Hill's Codes, pp. 642, 644, 646; Wash. Penal Code, §§ 1, 3, 7, and 11. On an indictment or information charging an offense consisting of different degrees a jury may find the defendant not guilty of the degree charged, but guilty of any degree inferior thereto, and in all other cases defendant may be found guilty of an offense the commission of which is necessarily included within that with which he is charged. The form of the verdict is also prescribed as follows: "We, the jury, in the case of the state of Washington, plaintiff, against ———, defendant, find the defendant (guilty or not guilty, as the case may be)." 2 Hill's Codes, 509; Penal Code, §§ 1319, 1320, and 1325; Laws Wash. 1891, 60, chap. 28, §§ 75, 76. The Code of the territory was to the same effect. §§ 786, 790, 793, 798, 1097, 1098, and 1103.

In Timmerman v. Territory of Washington, 3 Wash. Terr. 445, the defendant was indicted for the crime of murder in the first degree, and the jury returned a verdict in the statutory form. It was argued, on error, that the verdict was defective in that the defendant might have been found guilty of murder in the first or second degree, or of manslaughter, and that, therefore, the verdict was uncertain and sentence could not be pronounced upon him; but the supreme court of the territory held upon consideration of §§ 1097, 1098, and 1103 of the Code, which are §§ 1319, 1320, and 1325, as numbered in Hill's Code of the state, that if the jury found the defendant guilty of an offense of an inferior degree to that charged, the verdict must specify it, but if the verdict was intended to be guilty of the degree charged, there would be no necessity for so specifying it, and that the jury having used the statutory form there was no uncertainty as to the fact thus found; and that the objection was untenable.

In this case the verdict was "guilty as charged," and judgment of condemnation to death thereon was affirmed by the supreme court of the state, as has been said. 12 Wash. 217. The time appointed for execution having passed, the subsequent appointment of another day and the issue of the death warrant were in accordance with statute. Hill's Codes, §§ 1351, 1354.

*A part, then, from the insufficiency of [131 the petition and the legal effect of the previous judgment of this court, the final order of the circuit court must be held to have been properly entered, in that the rendition of the judgment complained of involved no violation of the Constitution of the United States.

Order affirmed.

Argued October 13, 1897. Decided November 1, 1897.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of Pennsylvania to review a judgment of that court affirming the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas of Lebanon County, Pennsylvania, in favor of the defendant, the Cornwall Railroad Company, in an action brought by Lewis Miller for damages for personal injuries from the company's negligence. Dismissed.

See same case below, 154 Pa. 473.

Statement by Mr. Chief Justice Fuller:

Lewis Miller brought his action against the Cornwall Railroad Company in the court of common pleas of Lebanon county, Pennsylvania, to recover damages for personal injuries sustained through the company's negligence [132]while he was *being carried on one of its trains. At the trial, the case was left to the jury, but the court reserved "the question as to whether there is any evidence of the defendant's negligence to go to the jury." A verdict was returned in plaintiff's favor, notwithstanding which judgment was entered for defendant on the point reserved. The decision turned on the conclusion that Miller was to be treated as if he was, at the time of the accident, an employee of defendant, because, though not in fact such employee, he came within the terms of the 1st section of an act of the general assembly of Pennsylvania, approved April 4, 1868 (Laws Pa. 1868, p. 58, No. 26, § 1), which reads as follows:

"Sec. 1. That when any person shall sustain personal injury or loss of life while lawfully engaged or employed on or about the roads, works, depots, and premises of a railroad company, or in or about any train or car therein or thereon, of which company such person is not an employee, the right of action and recovery in all such cases against the company shall be such only as would exist if such person were an employee: Provided, That this section shall not apply to passengers."

The court was asked by plaintiff to instruct the jury, among other points, as follows: "1. Lewis Miller, the plaintiff, was a passenger on the train when he received his injury." "2. The act of April 4, 1868, is unconstitutional and void." "3. The right of the plaintiff to have remedy for his injury was a well-known and clearly defined common-law right, one of the inherent indefeasible rights guaranteed to all citizens by the Constitution. The act of April 4, 1868, can therefore not be invoked by the defendant against the plaintiff. And it is not remedy by the due course of law." But the court refused to do so. The case was taken by appeal to the supreme court of Pennsylvania and the first, second, and third errors assigned were to the refusals to give the foregoing points, in their order. The words "inherent indefeasible rights" and "remedy by the due course of law" were placed in quotation in point three, as given in the third assignment. The judgment was affirmed by the supreme court, on February 27, 1893, at the January term of that year. 154 Pa. 473. On *January 8, 1894, appellant Miller filed [133 a motion for reargument on these grounds:

"1. Because of material errors of fact into which the court fell, in the consideration of the case, and which, we believe, led to the affirmance of the judgment of the court below.

"2. Because the plaintiff desires to present the case for review on the point raised, by the second assignment of error, as to the constitutionality of the act of April 4, 1868, under 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States. The question was not orally argued for want of time and the judgment is not in shape for such a review.

"3. General reargument."

A reargument was refused, and this writ of error th sued out.

Messrs. A. Frank Seltzer and Benjamin Morris Strouse for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. Wayne MacVeagh and Howard C. Shirk for defendant in error.

Mr. Chief Justice Fuller delivered the opinion of the court:

The contention of plaintiff in error is that the 1st section of the act of April 4, 1868, is invalid because in contravention of the 14th Amendment, in that it deprives him of due process of law and denies him the equal protection of the laws.

The validity of a statute is drawn in question whenever the power to enact it, as it is by its terms, or is made to read by construction, is fairly open to denial, and is denied. Baltimore & Potomac Railroad Co. v. Hopkins, 130 U. S. 210, 224 [32: 908, 913]. And under § 709 of the Revised Statutes if the ground on which the jurisdiction of this court is invoked is that the validity of a state law was drawn in question as in conflict with the Constitution of the United States, and the decision of the state court was in favor of its validity, this must appear *on the face of the rec[134 ord, before the decision below can be re-examined here. Dibble v. Bellingham Bay Land Company, 163 U. S. 63, 70 [41: 72, 74].

The record in this case discloses no attempt to question the validity of the particular statute, in the state courts, as in contravention of the Federal Constitution, unless in the points requested to be given in the trial court and the refusal to give them, for even if it could be held that such question was raised on the ap-tion, see notes to Martin v. Hunter, 4: 97; Matthews v. Zane, 2: 654; and Williams v. Norris, 6: 571.

As to jurisdiction of United States Supreme Court to declare state law void as in conflict with state Constitution; to revise decrees of state courts as to construction of state laws,—see notes to Jackson, Hart, v. Lamphire, 7: 679, and Commercial Bank v. Buckingham, 12: 169.

plication for reargument, nearly a year after the judgment of the common pleas was affirmed by the supreme court, the suggestion came too late. Texas & Pacific Railway Co. v. Southern Pacific Company, 137 U. S. 48 [34: 614]; Loeber v. Schroeder, 149 U. S. 580 [37: 856]; Pim v. St. Louis, 165 U. S. 273 [41; 714].

We have no jurisdiction on a writ of error to a state court to declare a state law void on account of its collision with a state Constitution, and it was long ago held that where it was objected in the state courts that an act of the state was "unconstitutional and void," the objection was properly construed in those courts as raising the question whether the state legislature had the power under the state Constitution to pass the act, and not as having reference to any repugnance to the Constitution of the United States. Porter v. Foley, 65 U. S. 24 How. 415 [16: 740].

By the Constitution of Pennsylvania it has always been declared that all men "have certain inherent and indefeasible rights, among which are those of enjoying and defending life and liberty, of acquiring, possessing, and protecting property and reputation, and of pursuing their own happiness;" and also "that all courts shall be open, and every man, for an injury done him in his lands, goods, person, or or reputation, shall have remedy by the due course of law, and right and justice administered without sale, denial, or delay." Const. Pa. 1790, art. 9, §§ 1, 11; Const. Pa. 1838, art. 9, §§ 1, 11; Const. Pa. 1873, art. 1, §§ 1, 11.

The presumption as to point two is that it referred to the state Constitution, and this was made certain by point three, which quotes from that instrument.

From the report of this case in 154 Pa. 473, it [135 is apparent *that the state supreme court assumed that it was dealing under the assignments of error only with the state Constitution, as was also the fact in Kirby v. Pennsylvania Railroad Co. 76 Pa. 506, where the question of the constitutionality of the 1st section of the act in question was directly passed upon, and the section sustained.

We agree with counsel in the statement, made on the application for reargument, in respect of a review of this judgment by this court because thereby the state supreme court had decided in favor of the validity of the act when drawn in question as repugnant to the Constitution of the United States, that "the judgment is not in shape for such a review."

Writ of error dismissed.

RICHARD H. FLETCHER, Plff. in Err.,
v.
BALTIMORE & POTOMAC RAILROAD COMPANY.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 135-144.)

Negligence, when a question of fact—duty of railroad company—injury from throwing wood from a moving train—persons on the street.

1. The negligence of a railroad company in allowing employees habitually to throw off pieces of firewood near their homes, from a moving train on which they were returning from work, without any caution except that they should be careful not to hurt anyone, is a question for the jury.
2. A railroad company is bound to use ordinary care and caution to avoid injuring persons and property which may be near its track.
3. Knowingly permitting employees to continue the habit of throwing sticks of wood from a moving repair train for their own use when returning from work, although the act is beyond the scope of their employment and totally disconnected therewith, renders a railroad company liable for any injury caused by such an act, if such injury might have been reasonably feared.
4. A railroad company owes to the general public or to individuals who may be in the streets through which its tracks are laid the duty of using reasonable diligence to see to it that those persons who are on its trains shall not be guilty of any act which may reasonably be called dangerous and liable to result in injuries to persons on the street.

Argued October 20, 21, 1897. Decided November 1, 1897.

IN ERROR to the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia to review a judgment of that court affirming a judgment of the Supreme Court of that District in favor of the defendant, the Baltimore & Potomac Railroad Company, in an action brought by Richard H. Fletcher, plaintiff, to recover damages for personal injuries received by reason of the negligence of defendant's agents and servants. Reversed, and cause remanded with directions to reverse the judgment and for a new trial.

See same case below, 6 App. D. C. 385.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Franklin H. Mackey for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. William Henry Dennis and Enoch Totten for defendant in error.

Mr. Justice Peckham delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought by the plaintiff in error to recover damages from the defendant corporation for personal injuries which he alleged he received by reason of the negligence of its agents and servants.

The evidence given upon the trial upon the part of the plaintiff tended to show that on or about the 16th day of May, 1890, the defendant was a railroad corporation *doing busi- [137 ness in the District of Columbia, and that on the day above mentioned, at the city of Washington in that District, the plaintiff was in the employment of the defendant and had been working at its workshop; that he had finished his work for the day at about a quarter of six in the evening, and leaving the shop he started for his home. When he reached the intersection of South Capitol street and Virginia avenue he stopped for a moment, and while standing on the pavement on the south side of the railway track, which was in the middle of Virginia avenue, a repair train of the defendant corporation passed by him on its return from work for the day. Some of the testimony showed that the train was passing at the rate of 20 miles an hour, while other testimony showed a much less rate of speed. As the train passed the plaintiff one of the workmen on board threw from the car on which he was standing a stick of bridge timber about 6 inches square and about 6 feet long. It struck the ground and rebounded, striking the plaintiff and seriously and permanently injuring him. The defendant had been in the daily habit for several years of running out of Washington and Alexandria a repair train of open flat cars loaded with its employees, and the train returned every evening about 6 o'clock and brought the workmen back to their homes. These men were allowed the privilege of bringing back with them, for their own individual use for firewood, sticks of refuse timber left over from their work after repairing the road, such as old pieces of bridge timber, cross ties, etc. It was the constant habit of the men during all these years to throw off these pieces of firewood while the train was in motion at such points on the road as were nearest their homes where the wood was picked up and carried off by some of the members of their families or other person waiting there for it. The only caution given the men on the part of the servants or agents of the company was that they should be careful not to hurt anyone in throwing the wood off. The foreman of the gang was the man who usually gave such instruction.

This evidence having been given, the plaintiff rested, and the defendant then moved for the di-138 rection of a verdic in its *favor, which motion was granted, and the judgment entered on the verdict, having been affirmed by the court of appeals (6 App. D. C. 385), is now before us for review.

In this ruling of the courts below we think there was error.

We are not called upon to say that the defendant was in fact guilty of negligence. The courts below have held, as matter of law, that the company was not liable, and hence a verdict in its favor was directed. On the contrary, we think the question whether the defendant was negligent was one which should have been submitted to the jury.

The plaintiff at the time of the accident had finished his employment for the day, and had left the workshop and grounds of the defendant, and was moving along a public highway in the city with the same rights as any other citizen would have. The liability of the defendant to the plaintiff for the act in question is not to be gauged by the law applicable to fellow servants, where the negligence of one fellow servant by which another is injured imposes no liability upon the common employer. The facts existing at the time of the happening of this accident do not bring it within this rule A railroad company is bound to use ordinary care and caution to avoid injuring persons or property which may be near its track. This is elementary. (Shearman & Redfield on Negligence [3d ed.] § 477, and cases cited in notes.) The duty to use ordinary care and caution is imposed, as we think, upon the company to the extent of requiring from it the use of reasonable diligence in the conduct and management of its trains, so that persons or property on the public highway shall not be injured by a negligent or dangerous act performed by anyone on the train, either a passenger or an employee acting outside and beyond the scope of his employment. The company does not insure against the performance of such an act, but it rests under an obligation to use reasonable diligence to prevent its occurrence. An act of such a nature, either by a passenger or by an employee outside the scope of his duties and employment, is not to be presumed, and therefore negligence on the part of the company in failing to prevent the act could not probably be shown by proof of a *single act of that [139 kind, even though damage resulted, where there was nothing to show the company had any reason to suppose the act would be committed. Negligence on the part of the company is the basis of its liability, and the mere failure to prevent a single and dangerous act as above stated would not prove its existence. The persons on this train were employees, in fact, and were being transported to their homes by the company which had, during the time of such transportation, full control over their actions. Whether or not they were through with their work is not material.

If the act on the car were such as to permit the jury to find that it was one from which, as a result, injury to a person on the street might reasonably be feared, and if acts of a like nature had been and were habitually performed by those upon the car to the knowledge of the agents or servants of the defendant, who with such knowledge permitted their continuance, then in such case the jury might find the defendant guilty of negligence in having permitted the act, and liable for the injury resulting therefrom, notwithstanding the act was that of an employee and beyond the scope of his employment and totally disconnected therewith. Knowledge on the part of the defendant, through its agents or servants, that passengers or employees upon its trains were in the habit of throwing out of the windows newspapers, or other light articles, not in their nature dangerous, would not render the company liable on the ground of negligence, although on some one occasion an individual might be injured by such act. The result in that case would be so unexpected, so extraordinary, and so unnatural, that a failure to prevent the custom could not be said to be mate cause as distinguished from "the" proximate cause; right to consider relative negligence; liability exists where master's negligence was an essential element; cases where the negligence of the master was the efficient cause.—see note to Lutz v. Atlantic & P. R. Co. (N. M.) 16 L. R. A. 819.

As to combined negligence of master and coservants, see note to Huss v. Michigan C. R. Co. (Mich.) 7 L. R. A. 500.

As to damages for personal injury from negligence, see note to Pennsylvania Co. v. Roy, 26: 141.

negligence. But if a passenger upon a train or an employee of the company upon one of its cars should supply himself with a quantity of stones for the purpose of throwing them off the train as it passed through a city, can it be possible that under such circumstances, if this intended use of the stones came to the knowledge of those who had the conduct of the train, it would not be their duty to prevent the act? And would it be any answer for the company, when charged with negligence in knowingly or 140] negligently permitting such *passenger or employee to throw the stones, to say that the person throwing them was a passenger, or, if an employee, that he had completed his work for the day and was being transported to his home on the car of the company, and that the act was without the scope of his employment? Surely not. It is not a question of scope of employment or that the act of the individual is performed by one who has ceased for the time being to be in the employment of the company. The question is, Does the company owe any duty whatever to the general public, or, in other words, to individuals who may be in the streets through which its railroad tracks are laid, to use reasonable diligence to see to it that those who are on its trains shall not be guilty of any act which might reasonably be called dangerous and liable to result in injuries to persons on the street, where such act could by the exercise of reasonable diligence on the part of the company have been prevented? We think the company does owe such a duty, and if, through and in consequence of its neglect of that duty, an act is performed by a passenger or employee which is one of a series of the same kind of act and which the company had knowledge of and had acquiesced in, and if the act be in its nature a dangerous one, and a person lawfully on the street is injured as a result of such an act, the company is liable. Any other rule would in our opinion be most disastrous, and would be founded upon no sound principle.

We feel quite clear that, from the evidence in this case, it was for the jury to say whether the custom was sufficiently proved, and whether the act was of a nature from which injury to a person on the street might reasonably be expected, and also whether such acts had theretofore been performed with the knowledge and consent of the agents and servants of the defendant, and whether the company was guilty of an omission of the duty which it owed to the plaintiff as one of the public lawfully using the street where the track was. We do not say that the jury should be instructed to find that the defendant was guilty of negligence in case they found from the evidence that this custom was known to its officers or agents, but we do say that the custom being known, whether 141] *it was negligence or not for the company to permit it under all the circumstances was a question to be decided by the jury and not by the court. The company of course is not an insurer of the safety of the public in the highway along or near which its road may run, but it is bound, as we have stated, to use reasonable diligence to see to it that no dangerous acts which may result in injury to persons lawfully on the highway shall be committed by persons who are on its trains, whether as passengers or employees. If it neglect that duty, then there is a liability on its part to respond in damages for the injury resulting from that neglect.

The fact that this custom had existed for some time without any injuries having been received by anyone is not a legal bar to the liability. It may be addressed to the jury as an argument upon the question whether the act was in its nature dangerous, and whether under all the circumstances the company was guilty of any negligence in permitting its continuance; but if the character of the act complained of is such that a jury might upon the evidence fairly say that injury to others might reasonably be apprehended, the fact that none such had theretofore occurred is not an answer, as matter of law, to the charge of negligence in continuously permitting acts of that nature. As against the contention that this act was not in its nature dangerous it might be urged to the jury that the caution given to be careful showed that there might be danger in the performance of the act itself. It would be for the jury to answer the question.

We are not able to see the bearing upon this case of the case of Walton v. New York Central Sleeping Car Company, 139 Mass. 556. In that case there was but a single act, that of throwing the bundle from the train by the porter of the parlor car; there was no evidence that any officer of the company on the train had the least reason to suppose the porter intended to do the act or that it had been habitually done before; no evidence of any custom known to the defendant by which at that or any other particular point the porter of the car habitually and frequently threw bundles from the moving train. Acquiescence on the part of the defendant *after knowledge of the custom could[142 not from the one act be imputed to it. Very probably, a single act so performed by the porter without the knowledge or assent of the defendant—performed for his own purposes and not in the scope of his employment, unexpected and wholly disconnected from his duties—would not render the defendant liable for the injuries resulting to a third person from such act. If, however, it had been proved in that case that it was the custom on the part of the porters on that car to throw these bundles off while the train was in motion, and that this custom was known to the officers of the company, and was permitted by them, with the simple injunction that the porters should take care and not hurt anybody, and if the jury found that the act was one dangerous in its nature, we think there is no doubt that the defendant would be liable for the injuries resulting from any one of such acts.

The court in the case cited, while holding the defendant not responsible, said: "The defendant is not responsible if the injury to the plaintiff was done by Maxwell, the servant of the defendant, without the authority of the defendant, and not for the purpose of executing defendant's orders or doing the defendant's work, and not while acting as such servant in the scope of his employment." The important point was, it is to be observed, that the act of Maxwell, although the servant of the defendant, was without its authority, knowledge, or acquiescence. In this case, upon the evidence submitted, the jury might be asked to infer knowledge on the part of the defendant of the existence of the custom and acquiescence on its part in such custom, and that therefore the acts of the individuals in throwing the timber were acts which were performed with the authority of the defendant. The act would be performed with the authority of the defendant, if, being aware of the custom, the defendant or its agents permitted such acts and made no effort to prevent their performance and issued no orders forbidding them. If the jury should also find that the act was one of a dangerous nature, from which injury to an individual on the roadside might reasonably be expected, then the jury might find the defendant 143]*guilty of a neglect of duty in permitting its performance.

We do not think the case of Snow v. Fitchburg Railroad, 136 Mass. 552 [49 Am. Rep. 40], can be distinguished from this case by reason of the simple fact that the person injured was a passenger who was at the station and upon the platform where the mail bag was thrown. It may be true the defendant owes a higher duty to its passengers, in the shape of a greater degree of care, than it does to the public generally, but it is a question only of degree. It owes a duty to the public not to injure anyone negligently, and the facts in this case make it a question for the jury to say whether it has not been guilty of negligence resulting in plaintiff's injury.

Considerable stress was laid upon the case of Walker v. Hannibal & St. Jo. Railroad Company, 121 Mo. 575 [24 L. R. A. 363], as an authority against the principle which we have above referred to. We have examined that case and regard the facts therein set forth as so materially different that the case cannot be regarded as opposed to the views we have stated. The baggagemaster in gratuitously taking in his car the drills (not properly baggage), which he threw out at the station as he passed through, was held not to have been acting within the scope of his employment, and as there was no proof of knowledge on the part of the railroad authorities, it was held that the railroad company was not responsible for this act of the baggagemaster not done in the scope of his employment and of which they had no notice. It is stated in the opinion that the trainmaster, the superintendent of the defendant, and also the general agent were all ignorant that the drills were being carried by the baggageman on the passenger train, and, in speaking of the act and the arrangement under which it was performed, the court said: "The arrangement seems to have been one between plaintiff, for the lime company, and James, the train baggageman, with reference to something not in the line of his employment, and of which his employer had no knowledge and gave no consent."

Upon the whole, we think it was a question for the jury to say whether the custom was 144] proved; whether, if proved, it *was known to and acquiesced in by those in charge of the train as servants of the company; whether it was a dangerous act, from which injury to a person on the street might reasonably be apprehended, and if so, whether there was a failure on the part of the defendant to exercise reasonable care, in view of all the circumstances, to prohibit the custom and prevent the performance of the act.

For these reasons we are of the opinion that the judgment should be reversed, and the cause remanded to the court of appeals of the District of Columbia, with directions to reverse the judgment of the supreme court of the District of Columbia and to remand the case to that court with directions to grant a new trial.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION, Appt.,
v.
ALABAMA MIDLAND RAILWAY COMPANY et al.

Power of Interstate Commerce Commission to prescribe rates—competition, when to be considered—application to such Commission—questions of fact—review by the courts.

1. Congress has not conferred upon the Interstate Commerce Commission the legislative power of prescribing rates, either maximum or minimum or absolute, nor has it authorized the Commission to obtain from the courts a peremptory order that in the future the railroad companies should follow the rates which it has determined to have been in the past reasonable and just.
2. Competition between rival routes, which affects rates, is a fact to be considered in determining whether property transported to a competitive point for less rates than are charged for property to an intermediate point on the same line is carried under "substantially similar circumstances and conditions," as that phrase is found in § 4 of the Act to Regulate Commerce; but such competition is not applicable to § 2 of the act.
3. An application to the Interstate Commerce Commission for relief from the operation of § 4 of the Act to Regulate Commerce is not necessary in order to entitle the carrier to adjust its rates with reference to the dissimilarity of circumstances and conditions, including the existence of competition, and to justify such rates in the courts when complained of.
4. Whether there has been an undue or unreasonable prejudice or preference, or whether the circumstances and conditions of carriage have been substantially similar or otherwise, is a ques-

The decision of the Interstate Commerce Commission on a charge that rates are unjust and unreasonable or make unjust discriminations and preferences in violation of § 3 of the Act to Regulate Commerce is subject to review in the courts on a consideration of the allegations and evidence of the parties, giving effect, however, to the findings of fact by the Commission as prima facie evidence of the matters therein stated.

APPEAL from a decree of the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit affirming the decree of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Middle District of Alabama dismissing a suit in equity brought by the Interstate Commerce Commission against the Alabama Midland Railway Company et al., to compel their obedience of certain orders made by said Commission requiring said defendants to cease and desist from charging or collecting any greater compensation for services than is specified in said orders. Affirmed.

See same case below, 74 Fed. Rep. 715 [5 Inters. Com. Rep. 685].

Statement by Mr. Justice Shiras:

On the 27th day of June, 1892, the Board of Trade of Troy, Alabama, filed a complaint before the Interstate Commerce Commission at Washington, District of Columbia, against the Alabama Midland Railway Company and the Georgia Central Railroad Company and their connections, claiming that in the rates charged for transportation of property by the railroad companies mentioned and their connecting lines there is a discrimination against the town of Troy, in violation of the terms and provisions of the Interstate Commerce Act of Congress of 1887.

The general ground of complaint is, that Troy being in active competition for business with Montgomery, the defendant lines of railway unjustly discriminate in their rates against the former, and give the latter an undue preference or advantage in respect to certain commodities and classes of traffic. The specific charges insisted on at the hearing, and to which the testimony relates, are:

1. That the Alabama Midland Railway and the defendant roads forming lines with it from Baltimore, New York, and the east to Troy and Montgomery charge and collect a higher rate on shipments of class goods from those cities to Troy than on such shipments through Troy to Montgomery; the latter being the longer distance point by 52 miles.

2. That the Alabama Midland Railway and Georgia Central Railroad and their connections unjustly discriminate against Troy and in favor of Montgomery in charging and collecting $3.22 per ton to Troy on phosphate rock shipped *147 from the South Carolina and Florida fields and only $3 per ton on such shipments to Montgomery, the longer distant point by both of said roads; and that all phosphate rock carried from said fields to Montgomery over the road of the Alabama Midland has to be hauled through Troy.

3. That the rates on cotton, as established by said two roads and their connections, on shipments to the Atlantic seaports, Brunswick, Savannah, and Charleston, unjustly discriminate against Troy and in favor of Montgomery, in that the rate per hundred pounds from Troy is 47 cents, and that from Montgomery, the longer distance point, is only 40 cents, and that such shipments from Montgomery over the road of the Alabama Midland have to pass through Troy.

4. That on shipments for export from Montgomery and other points, within the so-called "jurisdiction" of the Southern Railway & Steamship Association to the Atlantic seaports, Brunswick, Savannah, Charleston, West Point, and Norfolk, a lower rate is charged than the regular published tariff rate to such seaports, and that Montgomery and such other points are allowed by the rules of said association to ship through to Liverpool via any of these seaports at the lowest through rates on the day of shipment, which may be less than the sum of the regular published rail rate and the ocean rate via the port of shipment; that this reduction is taken from the published tariff rail rate to the port of shipment; that this privilege being denied to Troy is an unjust discrimination against that town in favor of Montgomery and such other favored cities, and that it is also a discrimination against shipments which terminate at such seaports in favor of shipments for exports.

5. That Troy was unjustly discriminated against in being charged on shipments of cotton via Montgomery to New Orleans the full local rate to Montgomery by both the Alabama Midland and Georgia Central.

6. That the rates on "class" goods from western and northwestern points, established by the defendants forming lines from those points to Troy, are relatively unjust and discriminatory *as against Troy when compared [148 with the rates over such lines to Montgomery and Columbus.

The Commission, having heard this complaint on the evidence theretofore taken, ordered, on the 15th day of August, 1893, the roads participating in the traffic involved in this case "to cease and desist" from charging, demanding, collecting, or receiving any greater compensation in the aggregate for services rendered in such transportation than is specified, as follows, to wit:

1. On class goods shipped from Louisville, Kentucky, St. Louis, Missouri, or Cincinnati, Ohio, to Troy aforesaid, no higher rate of charge than is now charged and collected on such shipments to Columbus, Georgia, and Eufaula, Alabama.

2. On shipments of cotton from Troy aforesaid through Montgomery, Alabama, to New Orleans, Louisiana, no higher rate of charge than 50 cents per hundred pounds.

3. On shipments of cotton from Troy aforesaid for export through the Atlantic seaports, to wit, Brunswick, Savannah, Charleston, West Point, or Norfolk, no higher rate of charge to these ports than is charged and collected on such shipments from Montgomery aforesaid.

4. On shipments of cotton from Troy aforesaid to the ports of Brunswick, Savannah, or Charleston, no higher rate of charge than is charged and collected on such shipments from Montgomery aforesaid through Troy to said ports.

5. On shipments of class goods from New York, Baltimore, or other northeastern points to Troy aforesaid, no higher rate of charge than is charged and collected on such shipments through Troy to Montgomery aforesaid.

6. On shipments of phosphate rock from South Carolina and Florida fields to Troy aforesaid, no higher rate of charge than is charged and collected on such shipments through Troy to Montgomery aforesaid.

The defendants having failed to heed these orders, the Commission thereupon filed this bill of complaint in the circuit court of the United States for the middle district of Alabama, in equity, to compel obedience to the same. On the hearing in said court the bill of 149]complaint was dismissed, *and complainant, the Interstate Commerce Commission, appealed the cause to the United States circuit court of appeals for the fifth judicial circuit, at New Orleans, Louisiana. And, thereupon, in said last-named court, on the 2d day of June, 1896, the decree of the said circuit court of the United States for the middle district of Alabama was in all things duly affirmed; and from this judgment and decree the appellant has appealed to this court.

Messrs.* L. A. Shaver, Edward B. Whitney Assistant Attorney General, and George F. Edmunds, for appellant:

Brief by Mr. George F. Edmunds, on behalf of the appellant, on the question of the jurisdictional power of the Interstate Commerce Commission to make the order it did in this case, that the charge exacted by the carriers in respect of the particular goods in question should not exceed a certain named sum which the Commission, upon complaint, answers, issues, proofs, and hearing, found to be reasonable and just.

It is submitted with respectful confidence that the interstate commerce law is in all its civil aspects a remedial one.

At the time of its passage the railway carriers were the absolute and irresponsible masters of all interstate commerce. The several states in trying to break up, or at least to mitigate, the unjust tryanny of these great corporations and combinations that held the largest part of the intercourse of the people in their grasp (and which in many instances undertook to control political as well as commercial affairs), found themselves baffled and practically defeated in their efforts by the national constitutional provision that only Congress could regulate interstate commerce. In this state of affairs, and to redress such enormous grievances, the Interstate Commerce Act was passed for the intended benefit of the whole body of the citizens of the Republic having a common grievance and a common interest in the vast commercial intercouse between all the states. This legislation was, therefore, in the very highest sense, and to the last degree, remedial.

Being thus remedial, the statute ought to be construed liberally to the attainment of the ends in view. Instead of being given the narrowest possible application and construction, it should, it is humbly submitted, be applied and construed by the judiciary in the largest latitude fairly consistent with its language. It ought not to be frittered away by the refinements of criticism, or made ineffectual because it does not possess all the inclusive and exclusive qualities of a plea in abatement, and may not be "certain to a certain intent in every particular." It is, perhaps, questionable taste for the bar to cite authority for this proposition, but it may be permitted to refer to a few of the vast number of the authorities on the subject.

Wilkinson v. Leland, 27 U. S. 2 Pet. 627 [7: 542]; Silver v. Ladd, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 219 [19: 138]; Beaston v. Farmers Bank, 37 U. S. 12 Pet. 102 [9: 1017]; United States v. Bank of North Carolina, 31 U. S. 6 Pet. 29 [8: 308]; Bank of United States v. Lee, 38 U. S. 13 Pet. 107 [10: 81]; Broom, Legal Maxims, 5th Am. ed. from 3d London ed. p. 80.

But the contention on the other side is that, while the Commission has power to decide what shall not be done, it has no power in the very same case to do complete justice by declaring what shall be done by the carriers in the given matter. We may well quote here the language of Broom's Legal Maxims: "Again, in construing an act of Parliament, it is a settled rule of construction that cases out of the letter of a statute, yet within the same mischief or cause of the making thereof, shall be within the remedy thereby provided; and, accordingly, it is laid down, that for the sure and true interpretation of all statutes (be they penal or beneficial, restrictive or enlarging, of the common law) four things must be considered: First, what was the common law before the making of the act; second, what was the mischief for which the common law did not provide; third, what remedy has been appointed by the legislature for such mischief; and fourth, the true reason of the remedy, and then the duty of the judges is to put such a construction upon the statute as shall suppress the mischief, and advance the remedy—to suppress subtle inventions and evasions for continuing the mischief pro privato commodo, and to add force and life to the cure and remedy, according to the true intent of the makers of the act pro bono publico. In expounding remedial laws, then, the courts will extend the remedy so far as the words will admit." It is submitted that the words of the statute in question do not require the application of the foregoing rules, being too plain for their application. If they are not, then the rule should be applied.

What, then, is the statute? At the risk of reiteration, I quote the crucial parts of some of the sections bearing on the subject of this brief:

"Sec. 1. . . . All charges made for any services rendered or to be rendered in the transportation of passengers or property as aforesaid, or in connection therewith, or for the receiving, delivering, storage, or handling of such property, shall be reasonable and just; and every unjust and unreasonable charge for such service is prohibited and declared to be unlawful.

"Sec. 2. That if any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act shall, directly or indirectly, by any special rate, rebate, drawback, or other device, charge, demand, collect, or receive from any person or persons a greater or less compensation for any service rendered or to be rendered in the transporation of passengers or property, subject to the provisions of this act, than it charges, demands, collects, or receives from any other person or persons for doing for him or them a like and contemporaneous service in the transporation of a like kind of traffic, under substantially similar circumstances and conditions, such common carrier shall be deemed guilty of un just discrimination, which is hereby prohibited and declared to be unlawful.

"Sec. 3 That it shall be unlawful for any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act to make or give any undue or unreasonable preference or advantage to any particular person, company, firm, corporation, or locality, or any particular description of traffic, in any respect whatsoever, or to subject any particular person, company, firm, corporation, or locality, or any particular description of traffic to any undue or unreasonable prejudice or disadvantage in any respect whatsoever.

"Sec. 4. That it shall be unlawful for any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act to charge or receive any greater compensation in the aggregate for the transportation of passengers or of like kind of property under substantially similar circumstances and conditions for a shorter than for a longer distance over the same line in the same direction," etc.

Sections 6 and 7 control the regulation of through rates, and provide against devices to break up continuous transportation, and for a general control of the Commission over that subject

Section 9 provides that persons claiming to be damaged in respect of the matters embraced in the acts may complain to the Commission.

Section 11 establishes the Commission, and secures to it a nonpartisan character and a freedom from private interest or bias.

"Sec. 12 (as amended). That the Commission hereby created shall have authority to inquire into the management of the business of all common carriers subject to the provisions of this act, and shall keep itself informed as to the manner and method in which the same is conducted; and shall have the right to obtain from such common carriers full and complete information necessary to enable the Commission to perform the duties and carry out the objects for which it was created; and the Commission is hereby authorized and required to execute and enforce the provisions of this act . . and for the purposes of this act the Commission shall have power to require by subpœna the attendance and testimony of witnesses, and the production of all books, papers, tariffs, contracts, agreements, and documents relating to any matter under investigation. . . .

"Sec. 13. That any person, firm, corporation, or association, or any mercantile, agricultural, or manufacturing society, or any body politic or municipal organization complaining of anything done or omitted to be done by any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act in contravention to the provisions thereof, may apply to said Commission by petition which shall briefly state the facts; whereupon a statement of the charges thus made shall be forwarded by the Commission to such common carrier, who shall be called upon to satisfy the complaint, or to answer the some in writing within a reasonable time, to be specified by the Commission. If such common carrier, within the time specified, shall make reparation for the injury alleged to have been done, said carrier shall be relieved of liability to the complainant only for the particular violation of law thus complained of. If such carrier shall not satisfy the complaint within the time specified, or there shall appear to be any reasonable ground for investigating said complaint, it shall be the duty of the Commission to investigate the matters complained of in such manner and by such means as it shall deem proper.

"Sec 14. That whenever an investigation shall be made by said Commission, it shall be its duty to make a report in writing in respect thereto, which shall include the findings of fact upon which the conclusions of the Commission are based, together with its recommendation as to what reparation, if any, should be made by the common carrier to any party or parties who may be found to have been injured; and such findings so made shall thereafter, in all judicial proceedings, be deemed prima facie evidence as to each and every fact found. . . .

"Sec. 15. That if in any case in which an investigation shall be made by said Commission it shall be made to appear to the satisfaction of the Commission, either by the testimony of witnesses or other evidence, that anything has been done or omitted to be done in violation of the provisions of this act, or any law cognizable by said Commission, by any common carrier, or that any injury or damage has been sustained by the party or parties complaining, or by other parties aggrieved in consequence of any such violation, it shall be the duty of the Commission to forthwith cause a copy of its report in respect thereto to be delivered to such common carrier, together with a notice of said common carrier to cease and desist from such violation, or to make reparation for the injury so found to have been done, or both . . .

"Sec. 16. That whenever any common carrier, as defined in and subject to the provisions of this act, shall violate or refuse or neglect to obey or perform any lawful order or requirement of the Commission created by this act it shall be lawful for the Commission, or for any company or person interested in such order or requirement, to apply in a summary way by petition to the circuit court of the United States sitting in equity, . . . alleging such violation or disobedience, as the case may be; and the said court shall have power to hear and determine the matter, on such short notice to the common carrier complained of as the court shall deem reasonable; . . . and said court shall proceed to hear and determine the matter speedily as a court of equity, . . . in such manner as to do justice in the premises; and to this end such court shall have power, if it think fit, to direct and prosecute in such mode and by such persons as it may appoint, all such inquiries as the court may think needful to enable it to form a just judgment in the matter of such petition."

These sections, by general, comprehensive, and specific language (only short, possibly, of the inclusive and exclusive strictness and fullness required in pleas in abatement at common law), place within the jurisdictional power and duty of the Interstate Commerce Commission the investigation, hearing, and determination of all questions of dispute between the public and its component citizens and localities and the carriers. There is no limitation of the clear phrases of these various sections. The duty of the carrier is set forth in all its aspects, both of affirmative duty and of prohibition. The 1st section requires that "all charges shall be reasonable and just." The 2d section prohibits special personal favoritism by secret devices. The 3d section prohibits preferences between persons or localities and kinds of traffic. The 4th section prohibits charging more for a shorter than for a longer distance. The 12th section provides that the Commission shall have authority to "inquire into the management of the business of all common carriers," and that "the Commission is hereby authorized and required to execute and enforce the provisions of this act." There is no part of it that the statute does not expressly require the Commission to cause to be completely executed. The method of this execution is pointed out by the prescribed modes of procedure provided for in §§ 13, 14, 15, and 16. And all this to be done on due application, under due procedure of notice, evidence, and hearing of all the parties. How, then, can it be said by the most hypercritical refiner that the Commission has no jurisdiction to decide, for instance, what is "reasonable and just" as provided in § 1? Has the Commission only the power to repeat the words of the statute, and say to the carrier proved to be guilty of extortion: "You must desist from extortion, and be reasonable and just?" Would not that be a palpable mockery of either administrative or judicial justice?

If the statute had contained only the 1st and 12th sections with the procedure sections, could this court doubt the power of the Commission to decide the matter, and require the very conduct on the part of the carrier that the Commission had found to be "reasonable and just?" To hold otherwise would be to ignore and flout the plainest possible use of language, if the statute be within the competence of Congress to pass.

But the rightful power of Congress to enact the law is not disputed. That the legislative department of any government, state or national, has power to regulate the conduct of any full or quasi public business, is too obvious for discussion. State legislatures, in respect of their internal commerce and polity, possess, and have always exercised, the power of controlling all such business through agents (by whatever names they may be called), to whom is deputed the execution of the sovereign will according to the principles and rules laid down by the legislative power. The innumerable instances of this need not be cited. Indeed, government could not be, and it has never been, carried on in any other way.

Again: § 2 prohibits the unjust discrimination between persons, i. e., between the traffic that citizens may be engaged in, or between citizens engaged in the same traffic. The Commission is, by the proper methods of procedure, to "enforce" this provision. Is the power of the Commission exhausted in saying to the discriminating carrier, "You shall not discriminate," and stop there? Must it not say, if it does its duty in enforcing the act and redressing the grievances found to exist, that it will enforce the law by deciding what the nature and degree of the discrimination is and by requiring that such degree of discrimination shall be effaced altogether by affirmative conduct of equality, or by a charge of no more than the ascertained rightful sum to the parties aggrieved?

Without referring in detail to the other provisions of the statute above quoted, it is safe to say that the plain purpose, and clear, comprehensive language, of the act show that the whole and all of the duties and obligations of the carrier to its customers and toward localities, etc., are to be enforced by the Commissioner; not a part of them, not a half of any of them, but all and every part of all of them. It is like algebra, in which neither side of the equation can possibly be considered or worked without the other. A complaint may be filed before the Commission (as in this case) alleging that the carrier ought not to charge for a described service more than the just and reasonable sum of 50 cents the 100 pounds, while in fact it is exacting $1 the 100 pounds. Suppose the carrier appears and confesses that 50 cents per 100 is a reasonable and just price, and that it does exact $1, but insists that the Commission has no jurisdiction to require the confessed reasonable charge to be made, and that it only has jurisdiction to require the cessation of the $1 exaction, thus leaving the carrier to continue to plunder its customers of 49 cents per 100 with absolute impunity, as far as the Commission is concerned, until a new complaint shall have been instituted and the 49-cent charge again declared to be unreasonable. That this is shocking to all our natural sense of justice no one can dispute. Why, then, should the broad, comprehensive, and specific language of the statute be "cabined, cribbed, confined" to produce such a state of the law? The citation from Broom may be well remembered in this connection.

The statute certainly requires the carrier to refrain from exacting more than a reasonable price (§ 1); to refrain from drawbacks, rebates, etc., and all other unjust discriminations (§ 2); to refrain from giving preferences or unequal advantages to persons or localities (§ 3); to refrain from exacting more for a short than for a long haul (§ 4); to refrain from all devices to break up continuous passage from road to road (§ 7). I repeat in this connection that § 12 provides that the Commission shall have authority to "inquire into the management of the business," etc., and to obtain "full and complete information necessary to perform the duties and carry out the objects for which it was created." And I repeat the inquiry, What were the duties and objects for which it was created? The same section answers the question in terms so clear that neither cavil nor sophistry can confuse or obscure them.

But it is said that the commission is not a judicial body and cannot exercise judicial powers. Granted in the strict sense of the terms; but, in every civilized country, administrative officers have always lawfully exercised many powers in every department of government which are in their nature judicial; for every power which involves the exercise of judgment, opinion, and decision is of that nature. Such are the powers exercised by the Secretary of the Interior as to many land questions; the Secretary of the Treasury and some of his subordinates, as to customs, etc.; the various commissions that have existed from time to time for nearly a century to settle land claims; and many others.

That Congress had the power to establish interstate "rates" in the largest sense of the word cannot be doubted. And that it had the power to establish a Commission to do the same thing is, it is submitted, equally clear. It is assumed, for the purpose of this case, that it did neither in the sense to which I am now referring. It adopted a policy short of this, and provided clear descriptions and requirements concerning the duties of the carriers in all the aspects that touch their conduct toward their patrons and toward the localities and sections of the country; and established the Commission to execute and enforce all these provisions—not a part of them, and not a part of any one of them; not negatively merely, but affirmatively and fully, to the end that real conformity by the carrier to the requirements of the act should be obtained, and, as the act declares, obtained speedily, by procedure formal and ceremonious, in which all parties in interest were to be heard, and it provided for a decision of the particular question and the particular grievance thus brought to the attention of the Commission and examined by it; and in case of refusal to obey the act provided for a suit to be brought in a judicial court of "equity," which court is required to hear and determine "the matter speedily as a part of equity," with all that the phrase implies. The Commission is to inquire into "anything done or omitted to be done" by any common carrier subject to the provisions of the act in contravention to the provisions thereof; and it authorized the Commission to require the carrier to "satisfy the complaint" or answer; and then, after hearing, to require the carrier "to cease and desist from such violation, or to make reparation, or both." How can this be done short of a decision upon the whole matter? To again illustrate, let it be supposed that the sole complaint was that the carrier was exacting double what was just and reasonable for a particular service, and that this, on due notice to both sides, was found to be true. This would be a palpable violation of the act. But the Commission is authorized to require the carrier to cease and desist from doing that very wrong. Does the carrier do so unless and until he reduces his exaction to the true point of justice and reason? To hold otherwise it would be, it is submitted, trifling both with grammar and common justice. If the statute had conferred the very same power, and in the very same words, upon a court of equity instead of the Commission, could the power of the court to redress the whole grievance be doubted? But the admitted power of the Commission to command the desistance from a charge of 100 cents per 100 pounds is no less "judicial" than a requirement not to charge more than the sum found to be reasonable and just. And the two things are precisely the same in principle and legal effect, and are inseparable.

On the subject of "reparation" provided for in § 3, I observe again that this section is to be enforced by the Commission. How is this possibly to be done otherwise than by commanding action by the carriers suited to the nature of the case, so as to obliterate the whole undue preference, etc., and how possibly otherwise can reparation be made to a locality? Reparation means "restoration" of the right. No such exercise of the power by the Commission is either "fixing rates" or prejudging a matter, as referred to by Mr. Justice Shiras in the Social Circle Case.

The words "lawful order" mean an order the Commission has jurisdiction to make. An order may be lawful and at the same time erroneous, so that if the Commission made an order in a matter over which they had jurisdiction, which was merely an error of judgment as to precisely the degree of reparation, for instance, the carrier ought to make, the order would still be lawful. In such a case the court is to "hear and determine the matter," that is, the whole subject, as a court of equity, . . . in such manner as to do justice in the premises:" that is, complete justice in the whole premises. "Premises" is not merely the particular order that the Commission has made, but it is the whole subject that had been duly brought before the Commission and on due notice and hearing had been acted upon. It is that duty which rested with the circuit court and is now imposed upon this court.

All the preceding action described is not "fixing rates" in the sense that state commissioners of railways are authorized by legislature to establish general rates for all classes and for all railways, as is contended for by the defendants. We make no such claim. The action of the Commission and the action of this court, on what is really an appeal from and a review of its judgment, is the trial and determination of a particular case, and determining for that particular case what the conduct of the carrier shall be in respect of the particular dispute involved in it. It is the exertion of no general power to prejudge or to fix rates, nor is it the exertion of any power to fix rates in general. If this distinction be observed, there is no difficulty whatever. This is precisely in accord with what Mr. Justice Shiras said. After stating what had happened before the Commission, and stating that in the circuit court evidence was introduced which had not been laid before the Commission, showing that the rate to Birmingham had been forced down by the coming in of a new competitive road, and that the circuit court had thereupon found that the evidence was sufficient to overcome the findings of the Commission, and that the rate complained of was not unreasonable; and after stating that the circuit court of appeals had adopted the views of the circuit court in respect to the reasonableness of the rate from Cincinnati to Atlanta, and "as both courts found the existing rate to have been reasonable, we do not feel disposed to review their finding on the matter of fact," he then condemned the conduct of the carriers in lying by. He then says: "Whether Congress intended to confer upon the Interstate Commerce Commission the power to itself fix rates was mooted in the courts below and is discussed in the briefs of counsel." He says: "We do not find any provision in the act which expressly or by necessary implication confers such power" and so forth. He then says: "The reasonableness of the rate in a given case depends on facts, and the function of the Commission is to consider these facts and give them the proper weight. If the Commission, instead of withholding judgment in such a matter until an issue shall be made and the facts found, itself fix a rate, that rate is prejudged by the Commission to be reasonable." In this proposition we entirely concur, but in this case the identical question was raised by the petitions, and an issue was made, evidence was taken on both sides, and the facts found, so that the sum fixed as reasonable by the Commission was not prejudged. And he adds that, "subject to the two leading prohibitions that their charges shall not be unjust and unreasonable, and that they shall not unjustly discriminate so as to give undue preference or advantage, or subject to undue prejudice or disadvantage persons or traffic similarly circumstanced, the Act to Regulate Commerce leaves common carriers as they were at common law." Here again it will be seen that reasonableness and unreasonableness, justice and injustice, preference, advantage, prejudice, disadvantage are the very subjects that he says are within the competence of the Commission to determine. If the Supreme Court had been of opinion that the action of the Commission in its decision in regard to the Atlanta rate was beyond its jurisdictional power, they would have so said, and affirmed the judgment on that ground; but in distinct terms they affirm the judgment of the circuit court and the court of appeals upon the express ground that the Commission is in error in its finding of fact.

The judiciary of the United States have recently been able, without the special aid of any act of Congress, to preserve the interstate carriers from being despoiled by unlawful interference with their operations. It is to be hoped for the good name of Congress and for the public welfare and contentment that the same judiciary will find that Congress has adequately provided for protecting the people from being despoiled by the carriers, and that it is within the clear competence of the Commission and the courts to make these provisions effectual.

Messrs. Edward Baxter and E. A. Wiley, for appellees:

In order to constitute an unjust discrimination under § 2, the carrier must charge or receive directly from one person a greater or less compensation than from another, or must accomplish the same thing indirectly by means of a special rate, rebate, or other device; but in either case it must be for a "like and contemporaneous service in the transportation of a like kind of traffic, under substantially similar circumstances and conditions."

Mr. Justice Shiras delivered the opinion of the court:

Several of the assignments of error complain of the action of the circuit court of appeals in not rendering a decree for the enforcement of those portions of the order of the Interstate Commerce Commission which prescribed rates, to be thereafter charged by the defendant companies, for services performed in the transportation of goods.

Discussion of those assignments is rendered unnecessary by the recent decisions of this court, wherein it has been held, *after [162 elaborate argument, that Congress has not conferred upon the Interstate Commerce Commission the legislative power of prescribing rates, either maximum, or minimum, or absolute; and that, as it did not give the express power to the Commission, it did not intend to secure the same result indirectly by empowering that tribunal, after having determined what, in reference to the past, were reasonable and just rates, to obtain from the courts a peremptory order that in the future the railroad companies should follow the rates thus determined to have been in the past reasonable and just. Cincinnati, New Orleans, & Texas Pacific Railway v. Interstate Commerce Commission, 162 U. S. 184 [40: 935]; Interstate Commerce Commission v. Cincinnati, New Orleans, & Texas Pacific Railway Company, 167 U. S. 479 [42: 243].

Errors are likewise assigned to the action of the court in having failed and refused to affirm and enforce the report and opinion of the Commission, wherein it was found and decided, among other things, that the defendant common carriers which participate in the transportation of class goods to Troy from Louisville, St. Louis, and Cincinnati, and from New York, Baltimore, and other northeastern points, and the defendant common carriers which participate in the transportation of phosphate rock from South Carolina and Florida to Troy, and the defendant common carriers which participate in the transportation of cotton from Troy to the ports of New Orleans, Brunswick, Savannah, Charleston, West Point, or Norfolk, as local shipments or for export, have made greater charges, under substantially similar circumstances and conditions, for the shorter distance to or from Troy than for longer distances over the same lines in the same direction, and have unjustly discriminated in rates against Troy, and subjected said place and dealers and shippers therein to undue and unreasonable prejudice and disadvantage in favor of Montgomery, Eufaula, Columbus, and other places and localities and dealers and shippers therein, in violation of the provisions of the Act to Regulate Commerce.

Whether competition between lines of transportation to Montgomery, Eufaula, and Columbus justifies the giving to *those cities a[163 preference or advantage in rates over Troy, and, if so, whether such a state of facts justifies a departure from equality of rates without authority from the Interstate Commerce Commission under the proviso to the 4th section of the act, are questions of construction of the statute, and are to be determined before we reach the question of fact in this case.

It is contended, in the briefs filed on behalf of the Interstate Commission, that the existence of rival lines of transportation, and, consequently, of competition for the traffic, are not facts to be considered by the Commission, or by the courts, when determining whether property transported over the same line is carried under "substantially similar circumstances and conditions," as that phrase is found in the 4th section of the act.

Such, evidently, was not the construction put upon this provision of the statute by the Commission itself in the present case, for the record discloses that the Commission made some allowance for the alleged dissimilarity of circumstances and conditions, arising out of competition and situation, as affecting transportation to Montgomery and Troy respectively, and that, among the errors assigned, is one complaining that the court erred in not holding that the rates prescribed by the Commission in its order made due allowance for such dissimilarity.

So, too, in case Re Louisville & Nashville R. R. Co. 1 I. C. C. Rep. 77 [1 Inters. Com. Rep. 287], in discussing the long and short haul clause, it was said by the Commission, per Judge Cooley, that "it is impossible to resist the conclusion that in finally rejecting the 'long and short haul clause' of the House bill, which prescribed an inflexible rule, not to be departed from in any case, and retaining in substance the 4th section as it had passed the Senate, both Houses understood that they were not adopting a measure of strict prohibition in respect to charging more for the shorter than for the longer distance; but that they were, instead, leaving the door open for exceptions in certain cases, and among others in cases where the circumstances and conditions 164 of the traffic were affected by the *element of competition, and where exceptions might be a necessity if the competition was to continue. And water competition was beyond doubt especially in view."

It is, no doubt, true that in a later case, Railroad Commission of Georgia v. Clyde Steamship Co. et al. 5 I. C. C. Rep. 327 [4 Inters. Com. Rep. 120], the Commission somewhat modified their holding in the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company Case, just cited, by attempting to restrict the competition that it is allowable to consider to the cases of competition with water carriers, competition with foreign railroads, competition with railroad lines wholly in a single state; but the principle that competition in such cases is to be considered is affirmed.

That competition is one of the most obvious and effective circumstances that make the conditions under which a long and short haul is performed, substantially dissimilar, and as such must have been in the contemplation of Congress in the passage of the Act to Regulate Commerce, has been held by many of the circuit courts. It is sufficient to cite a few of the number: Ex parte Koehler, 31 Fed. Rep. 319 [1 Inters. Com. Rep. 317]; Re Missouri P. Ry. Co. 31 Fed. Rep. 862 [4 Inters. Com. Rep. 434]; Interstate Commerce Commission v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. 50 Fed. Rep. 306 [4 Inters. Com. Rep. 323]; Interstate Commerce Commission v. Cincinnati, New Orleans, & Tex. Pac. R. Co. 56 Fed. Rep. 943 [4 Inters. Com. Rep. 332]; Behlmer v. Louisville & Nashville R. Co. 71 Fed. Rep. 835; Interstate Commerce Commission v. Louisville & Nashville R. Co. 73 Fed. Rep. 409.

In construing statutory provisions, forbidding railway companies from giving any undue or unreasonable preference or advantage to or in favor of any particular person or company, or any particular description of traffic, in any respect whatever, the English courts have held, after full consideration, that competition between rival lines is a fact to be considered, and that a preference or advantage thence arising is not necessarily undue or unreasonable. Denaby Main Colliery Company v. Manchester, S. & L. Rw. Co. L. R. 11 App. Cas. 97; Phipps v. London & North Western Railway, [1892] 2 Q. B. 229.

But the question whether competition as affecting rates is an element for the Commission and the courts to consider *in applying [165 ing the provisions of the Act to Regulate Commerce is not an open question in this court.

In Interstate Commerce Commission v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 145 U. S. 263 [36: 699 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 92], it was said, approving observations made by Jackson, circuit judge (43 Fed. Rep. 37 [3 Inters. Com. Rep. 192]), that the Act to Regulate Commerce was "not designed, . . . to prevent competition between different roads, or to interfere with the customary arrangements made by railway companies for reduced fares in consideration of increased mileage, where such reduction did not operate as an unjust discrimination against other persons traveling over the road; . . . [that] it was not intended to ignore the principle that one can sell at wholesale cheaper than at retail; [that] it is not all discriminations or preferences that fall within the inhibition of the statute; only such as are unjust or unreasonable;" and, accordingly, it was held that the issue by a railway company, engaged in interstate commerce, of a "party-rate ticket" for the transportation of ten or more persons from a place situated in one state or territory to a place situated in another state or territory, at a rate less than that charged to a single individual for a like transportation on the same trip, does not thereby make "an unjust or unreasonable charge" against such individual within the meaning of the 1st section of the Act to Regulate Commerce; nor make "an unjust discrimination" against him within the meaning of the 2d section; nor give "an undue or unreasonable preference or advantage" to the purchasers of the party-rate ticket within the meaning of the 3d section.

In Texas & Pac. Railway v. Interstate Commerce Commission, 162 U. S. 197 [40:940], it was held that "in passing upon questions arising under the act, the tribunal appointed to enforce its provisions, whether the Commission or the courts, is empowered to fully consider all the circumstances and conditions that reasonably apply to the situation, and that, in the exercise of its jurisdiction, the tribunal may and should consider the legitimate interests as well of the carrying companies as of the traders and shippers, and in considering whether any particular locality is subjected to an undue preference or disadvantage the welfare of the communities occupying the localities where the goods 166] *are delivered is to be considered as well as that of the communities which are in the locality of the place of shipment. That among the circumstances and conditions to be considered, as well in the case of traffic originating in foreign ports as in the case of traffic originating within the limits of the United States, competition that affects rates should be considered, and in deciding whether rates and charges made at a low rate to secure foreign freights which would otherwise go by other competitive routes are or are not undue and unjust, the fair interests of the carrier companies and the welfare of the community which is to receive and consume the commodities are to be considered."

To prevent misapprehension, it should be stated that the conclusion to which we are led by these cases, that, in applying the provisions of the 3d and 4th sections of the act, which make it unlawful for common carriers to make or give any undue or unreasonable preference or advantage to any particular person or locality, or to charge or receive any greater compensation in the aggregate for the transportation of passengers or of like kind of property, under substantially similar circumstances and conditions, for a shorter than for a longer distance over the same line, in the same direction, competition which affects rates is one of the matters to be considered, is not applicable to the 2d section of the act.

As we have shown in the recent case of Wight v. United States, 167 U. S. 512 [42: 258], the purpose of the 2d section is to enforce equality between shippers over the same line, and to prohibit any rebate or other device by which two shippers, shipping over the same line the same distance, under the same circumstances of carriage, are compelled to pay different prices therefor, and we there held that the phrase "under substantially similar circumstances and conditions," as used in the second section, refers to the matter of carriage, and does not include competition between rival routes.

This view is not open to the criticism that different meanings are attributed to the same words when found in different sections of the act; for what we hold is that, as the purposes of the several sections are different, the phrase under 167]*consideration must be read, in the second section, as restricted to the case of shippers over the same road, thus leaving no room for the operation of competition, but that in the other sections, which cover the entire tract of interstate and foreign commerce, a meaning must be given to the phrase wide enough to include all the facts that have a legitimate bearing on the situation—among which we find the fact of competition when it affects rates.

In order further to guard against any misapprehension of the scope of our decision it may be well to observe that we do not hold that the mere fact of competition, no matter what its character or extent, necessarily relieves the carrier from the restraints of the 3d and 4th sections, but only that these sections are not so stringent and imperative as to exclude in all cases the matter of competition from consideration in determining the questions of "undue or unreasonable preference or advantage," or what are "substantially similar circumstances and conditions." The competition may in some cases be such as, having due regard to the interests of the public and of the carrier, ought justly to have effect upon the rates, and in such cases there is no absolute rule which prevents the Commission or the courts from taking that matter into consideration.

It is further contended, on behalf of the appellant, that the courts below erred in holding, in effect, that competition of carrier with carrier, both subject to the Act to Regulate Commerce, will justify a departure from the rule of the 4th section of the act without authority from the Interstate Commerce Commission, under the proviso to that section.

In view of the conclusion hereinbefore reached, the proposition comes to this, that, when circumstances and conditions are substantially dissimilar, the railway companies can only avail themselves of such a situation by an application to the Commission.

The language of the proviso is as follows:

"That upon application to the Commission appointed under the provisions of this act, such common carrier may, in special cases, after investigation by the Commission, be authorized to *charge less for longer than shorter [168 distances for the transportation of persons or property, and the Commission may from time to time prescribe the extent to which such designated common carrier may be relieved from the operation of this section of this act."

The claim now made for the Commission is that the only body which has the power to relieve railroad companies from the operation of the long and short haul clause on the account of the existence of competition, or any other similar element which would make its application unfair, is the Commission itself, which is bound to consider the question, upon application by the railroad company, but whose decision is discretionary and unreviewable.

The first observation that occurs on this proposition is that there appears to be no allegation in the bill or petition raising such an issue. The gravamen of the complaint is that the defendant companies have continued to charge and collect a greater compensation for services rendered in transportation of property than is prescribed in the order of the Commission. It was not claimed that the defendants were precluded from showing in the courts that the difference of rates complained of was justified by dissimilarity of circumstances and conditions by reason of not having applied to the Commission to be relieved from the operation of the 4th section.

Moreover, this view of the scope of the proviso to the 4th section does not appear to have ever been acted upon or enforced by the Commission. On the contrary, in the case of Re Louisville & Nashville R. R. Company v. Interstate Commerce Commission, 1 I. C. C. Rep. 57 [1 Inters. Com. Rep. 280], the Commission, through Judge Cooley, said, in speaking of the effect of the introduction into the 4th section of the words "under substantially similar circumstances and conditions," and of the meaning of the proviso: "That which the act does not declare unlawful must remain lawful if it was so before; and that which it fails to forbid the carrier is left at liberty to do without permission of anyone. The charging or receiving the greater compensation for the shorter than for the longer haul is seen to be forbidden only when both are under substantially similar circumstances *and conditions; and, there- [169 fore, if in any case the carrier, without first obtaining an order of relief, shall depart from the general rule, its doing so will not alone convict it of illegality, since if the circumstances and conditions of the two hauls are dissimilar the statute is not violated. . . . Beyond question the carrier must judge for itself what are the 'substantially similar circumstances and conditions' which preclude the special rate, rebate, or drawback, which is made unlawful by the 2d section, since no tribunal is empowered to judge for it until after the carrier has acted, and then only for the purpose of determining whether its action constitutes a violation of law. The carrier judges on peril of the consequences; but the special rate, rebate, or drawback which it grants is not illegal when it turns out that the circumstances and conditions were not such as to forbid it; and as Congress clearly intended this it must also, when using the same words in the 4th section, have intended that the carrier whose privilege was in the same way limited by them should in the same way act upon its judgment of the limiting circumstances and conditions."

The view thus expressed has been adopted in several of the circuit courts Interstate Commerce Commission v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. R. Co. 50 Fed. Rep. 300 [4 Inters. Com. Rep. 323]; Interstate Commerce Commission v. Cincinnati, New Orleans, & Tex. Pac. Ry. Co. 56 Fed. Rep. 942; Behlmer v. Louisville & Nashville R. Co. 71 Fed. Rep. 839; and we do not think the courts below erred in following it in the present case. We are unable to suppose that Congress intended, by the 4th section and the proviso thereto, to forbid the common carriers, in cases where the circumstances and conditions are substantially dissimilar, from making different rates until and unless the Commission shall authorize them so to do, much less do we think that it was the intention of Congress that the decision of the Commission, if applied to, could not be reviewed by the courts. The provisions of § 16 of the act, which authorizes the court to "proceed to hear and determine the matter speedily as a court of equity, and without the formal pleadings and proceedings applicable to ordinary suits in equity, but in such manner as to do justice in 170]*the premises, and to this end, such court shall have power, if it think fit, to direct and prosecute in such mode and by such persons as it may appoint, all such inquiries as the court may think needful to enable it to form a just judgment in the matter of such petition," extend as well to an inquiry or proceeding under the 4th section as to those arising under the other sections of the act.

Upon these conclusions, that competition between rival routes is one of the matters which may lawfully be considered in making rates, and that substantial dissimilarity of circumstances and conditions may justify common carriers in charging greater compensation for the transportation of like kinds of property for a shorter than for a longer distance over the same line, we are brought to consider whether, upon the evidence in the present case, the courts below erred in dismissing the Interstate Commerce Commission's complaint.

As the 3d section of the act, which forbids the making or giving any undue or unreasonable preference or advantage to any particular person or locality, does not define what, under that section, shall constitute a preference or advantage to be undue or unreasonable, and as the 4th section, which forbids the charging or receiving greater compensation in the aggregate for the transportation of like kinds of property for a shorter than for a longer distance over the same line, under substantially similar circumstances and conditions, does not define or describe in what the similarity or dissimilarity of circumstances and conditions shall consist, it cannot be doubted that whether, in particular instances, there has been an undue or unreasonable prejudice or preference, or whether the circumstances and conditions of the carriage have been substantially similar or otherwise, are questions of fact depending on the matters proved in each case. Denaby Main Colliery Company v. Manchester, S. & L. Railway Co. 3 Railway & Canal Traffic Cases, 426; Phipps v. London & North Western Railway [1892] 2 Q. B. 229; Cincinnati, N. O. & Tex. Pac. R. Co. v. Interstate Commerce Commission, 162 U. S. 184, 194 [40: 935, 937]; Texas & Pacific Railway v. Interstate Commerce Commission, 162 U. S. 197, 235 [40: 940, 953].

*The circuit court, after a consideration[171 of the evidence, expressed its conclusion thus:

"In any aspect of the case, it seems impossible to consider this complaint of the Board of Trade of Troy against the defendant railroad companies, particularly the Midland and Georgia Central railroads, in the matter of the charge upon property transported on their roads to or from points east or west of Troy, as specified and complained of, obnoxious to the 4th or any other section of the interstate commerce act. The conditions are not substantially the same, and the circumstances are dissimilar, so that the case is not within the statute. The case made here is not the case as it was made before the Commission. New testimony has been taken; and the conclusion reached is that the bill is not sustained; and that it should be dismissed; and it is so ordered." 69 Fed. Rep. 227 [5 Inters. Com. Rep. 308].

The circuit court of appeals in affirming the decree of the circuit court, used the following language:

"Only two railroads, the Alabama Midland and Georgia Central, reach Troy. Each of these roads has connections with other lines, parties hereto, reaching all the long distance markets mentioned in these proceedings. The Commission finds that no departure from the long and short haul rule of the 4th section of the statute as against Troy as the shorter-distance point, and in favor of Montgomery as the longer distance point, appears to be chargeable to the Georgia Central. The rates in question, when separately considered, are not unreasonable or unjust. As a matter of business necessity they are the same by each of the railroads that reach Troy. The Commission concludes that as related to the rates to Montgomery, Columbus, and Eufaula, the rates to and from Troy unjustly discriminate against Troy; and, in the case of the Alabama Midland, violate the long and short haul rule.

"The volume of population and of business at Montgomery is many times larger than it is at Troy. There are many more railway lines running to and through Montgomery connecting with all the distant markets. The Alabama river, open all the year, is capable, if need be, of bearing to Mobile on the sea the burden of 172 all the goods of every class that *pass to or from Montgomery. The competition of the railway lines is not stifled but is fully recognized, intelligently and honestly controlled and regulated, by the traffic association in its schedule of rates. There is no suggestion in the evidence that the traffic managers who represent the carriers that are members of that association are incompetent, or under the bias of any personal preference for Montgomery or prejudice against Troy that has led them, or is likely to lead them, to unjustly discriminate against Troy. When the rates to Montgomery were higher a few years ago than now, actual, active, water-line competition by the river came in, and the rates were reduced to the level of the lowest practicable paying water rates, and the volume of carriage by the river is now comparatively small; but the controlling power of that water line remains in full force, and must ever remain in force as long as the river remains navigable to its present capacity. And this water line affects to a degree less or more all the shipments to or from Montgomery from or to all the long-distance markets. It would not take cotton from Montgomery to the south Atlantic ports for export, but it would take the cotton to the points of its ultimate destination, if the railroad rates to foreign marts through the Atlantic ports were not kept down to or below the level of profitable carriage by water from Montgomery through the port of Mobile. The volume of trade to be competed for, the number of carriers actually actively competing for it, a constantly open river present to take a large part of it whenever the railroad rates rise up to the mark of profitable water carriage, seem to us, as they did to the circuit court, to constitute circumstances and conditions at Montgomery substantially dissimilar from those existing at Troy, and to relieve the carriers from the charges preferred against them by its Board of Trade. We do not discuss the third and fourth contention of the counsel for the appellant further than to say that within the limits of the exercise of intelligent good faith in the conduct of their business and subject to the two leading prohibitions that their charges shall not be unjust or unreasonable, and that they shall not unjustly discrimi-173 nate so as to give undue preference *or advantage to persons or traffic similarly circumstanced, the act to regulate commerce leaves common carriers as they were at the common law, free to make special rates looking to the increase of their business, to classify their traffic, to adjust and apportion their rates so as to meet the necessities of commerce and of their own situation and relation to it, and generally to manage their important interests upon the same principles which are regarded as sound and adopted in other trades and pursuits. The carriers are better qualified to adjust such matters than any court or board of public administration, and, within the limitations suggested, it is safe and wise to leave to their traffic managers the adjusting of dissimilar circumstances and conditions to their business." 21 C. C. A. 51 [41 U. S. App. 453, 74 Fed. Rep. 715, 5 Inters. Com. Rep. 685].

The last sentence in this extract is objected to by the Commission's counsel, as declaring that the determination of the extent to which discrimination is justified by circumstances and conditions should be left to the carriers. If so read, we should not be ready to adopt or approve such a position. But we understand the statement, read in the connection in which it occurs, to mean only that, when once a substantial dissimilarity of circumstances and conditions has been made to appear, the carriers are, from the nature of the question, better fitted to adjust their rates to suit such dissimilarity of circumstances and conditions than courts or commissions; and when we consider the difficulty, the practical impossibility, of a court or a commission taking into view the various and continually changing facts that bear upon the question, and intelligently regulating rates and charges accordingly, the observation objected to is manifestly just. But it does not mean that the action of the carriers, in fixing and adjusting the rates, in such instances, is not subject to revision by the Commission and the courts, when it is charged that such action has resulted in rates unjust or unreasonable, or in unjust discriminations and preferences. And such charges were made in the present case, and were considered, in the first place by the Commission and afterwards by the circuit court and by the circuit court of appeals.

*The first contention we encounter, [174 upon this branch of the case, is that the circuit court had no jurisdiction to review the judgment of the Commission upon this question of fact; that the court is only authorized to inquire whether or not the Commission has misconstrued the statute and thereby exceeded its power; that there is no general jurisdiction to take evidence upon the merits of the original controversy; and, especially, that questions under the 3d section are questions of fact and not of power, and hence unreviewable.

We think this contention is sufficiently answered by simply referring to those portions of the act which provide that, when the court is invoked by the Commission to enforce its lawful orders or requirements, the court shall proceed, as a court of equity, to hear and determine the matter and in such manner as to do justice in the premises.

In the case of Cincinnati, N. O. & Texas Pacific R. Co. v. Interstate Commerce Commission, 162 U. S. 184 [40: 935], the findings of the Commission were overruled by the circuit court after additional evidence taken in the court, and the decision of the circuit court was reviewed in the light of the evidence and reversed by the circuit court of appeals, and this court, in reference to the argument that the Commission had not given due weight to the facts that tended to show that the circumstances and conditions were so dissimilar as to justify the rates charged, held that as the question was one of fact, peculiarly within the province of the Commission, and as its conclusions had been accepted and approved by the circuit court of appeals, and as this court found nothing in the record that made it our duty to draw a different conclusion, the decree of the circuit court of appeals should be affirmed. Such a holding clearly implies that there was power in the courts below to consider and apply the evidence and in this court to review their decisions.

So, in the case of Texas & Pacific Railway Company v. Interstate Commerce Commission, 162 U. S. 197 [40: 940], the decision of the circuit court of appeals, which affirmed the validity of the order of the Commission, upon the ground that, even if ocean competition should be regarded as creating a dissimilar condition, 175] yet that, *in the case under consideration, the disparity in rates was too great to be justified by that condition, was reversed by this court, not because the circuit court had no jurisdiction to consider the evidence and thereupon to affirm the validity of the order of the Commission, but because that issue was not actually before the court, and that no testimony had been adduced by either party on such an issue; and it was said that the language of the act authorizing the court to hear and determine the matter as a case of equity, "necessarily implies that the court is not concluded by the findings or conclusions of the Commission."

Accordingly our conclusion is that it was competent, in the present case, for the circuit court, in dealing with the issues raised by the petition of the Commission and the answers thereto, and for the circuit court of appeals on the appeal, to determine the case upon a consideration of the allegations of the parties and of the evidence adduced in their support, giving effect, however, to the findings of fact in the report of the Commission as prima facie evidence of the matters therein stated.

It has been uniformly held by the several circuit courts and the circuit courts of appeal, in such cases, that they are not restricted to the evidence adduced before the Commission, nor to a consideration merely of the power of the Commission to make the particular order under question, but that additional evidence may be put in by either party, and that the duty of the court is to decide, as a court of equity, upon the entire body of evidence.

Coming at last to the questions of fact in this case, we encounter a large amount of conflicting evidence. It seems undeniable, as the effect of the evidence on both sides, that an actual dissimilarity of circumstances and conditions exists between the cities concerned, both as respects the volume of their respective trade and the competition, affecting rates, occasioned by rival routes by land and water. Indeed, the Commission itself recognized such a state of facts by making an allowance in the rates prescribed, for dissimilarity resulting from competition, and it was contended on behalf of the 176] Commission, *both in the courts below and in this court, that the competition did not justify the discriminations against Troy to the extent shown, and that the allowance made therefor by the Commission was a due allowance.

The issue is thus restricted to the question of the preponderance of the evidence on the respective sides of the controversy. We have read the evidence disclosed by the record, and have endeavored to weigh it with the aid of able and elaborate discussions by the respective counsel.

No useful purpose would be served by an attempt to formally state and analyze the evidence, but the result is that we are not convinced that the courts below erred in their estimate of the evidence, and that we perceive no error in the principles of law on which they proceeded in the application of the evidence.

The decree of the Circuit Court of Appeals is accordingly affirmed.

Mr. Justice Harlan dissenting:

I dissent from the opinion and judgment in this case. Taken in connection with other decisions defining the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission, the present decision, it seems to me, goes far to make that Commission a useless body for all practical purposes, and to defeat many of the important objects designed to be accomplished by the various enactments of Congress relating to interstate commerce. The Commission was established to protect the public against the improper practices of transportation companies engaged in commerce among the several states. It has been left, it is true, with power to make reports, and to issue protests. But it has been shorn, by judicial interpretation, of authority to do anything of an effective character. It is denied many of the powers which, in my judgment, were intended to be conferred upon it. Besides, the acts of Congress are now so construed as to place communities on the lines of interstate commerce at the mercy of competing railroad companies engaged in such commerce. The judgment in this case, if I do not misapprehend its scope and effect, *proceeds [177 upon the ground that railroad companies, when competitors for interstate business at certain points, may, in order to secure traffic for and at those points, establish rates that will enable them to accomplish that result, although such rates may discriminate against intermediate points. Under such an interpretation of the statutes in question, they may well be regarded as recognizing the authority of competing railroad companies engaged in interstate commerce—when their interests will be subserved thereby—to build up favored centers of population at the expense of the business of the country at large. I cannot believe that Congress intended any such result, nor do I think that its enactments, properly interpreted, would lead to such a result.

Spanish grant—insufficient exception thereto.

1. A Spanish grant on a petition by twenty persons "in unison," which is made on the express condition that it is to be settled by at least twenty citizens and the lands to be distributed in equal parts, and under which judicial possession is given by delivering to each one of the twenty settlers 300 varas of land, is not subject to an exception by a so called certificate of the alcalde to the effect that after the allotments had been made eighteen of the twenty allottees assented to be deprived of any right or title to lands which had just been assigned to them because of a claim of the other two that they had been previously in possession under a former grant, as such an exception would be repugnant to the grant.

2. An ex parte correspondence between the Mexican governor and an alcalde, in which the latter presents the claim by two of several allottees under a grant to twenty, to the effect that they had title under an earlier grant, when the other settlers had no knowledge of this correspondence and when the governor's reply expressly declined to adjudicate the matter for lack of jurisdiction in respect of documents "sanctioned by former governors," cannot affect the rights of such other allottees, although the governor gives his individual opinion that the land actually occupied by the claimants under a former grant could not be claimed by the other allottees.

APPEAL from a decree of the Court of Private Land Claims dismissing a petition filed by heirs and legal representatives of Francisco Garcia de Noriega et al. for the confirmation of an alleged Spanish grant in the county of Bernalillo, New Mexico. Affirmed.

Statement by Mr. Chief Justice Fuller:

This was a petition filed by heirs and legal representatives of Francisco Garcia de Noriega and José Antonio Garcia de Noriega for the confirmation of an alleged grant made by Governor Concha January 27, 1788, of 9,752.57 acres, called the cañon de San Diego, situated in the county of Bernalillo, New Mexico, and included within a grant of 116,288.89 acres by Governor Chacon, March 6, 1798, alleged in the petition to have been to the "town of the cañon de San Diego."

The granting papers of 1788 were produced and placed in the archives of the government by claimants in 1879. As translated by the government, they read as follows:

Señor Governor Don Fernando de la Concha:

We, Francisco Garcia de Noriega, interpreter for the Navajos, and José Antonio Garcia de Noriega, with the most profound respect appear before your Excellency and state, sir, that a cañon which is called San Diego being found vacant, having seen that cultivation may be had and some animals pastured therein, we prostrate ourselves at the royal feet of your Excellency's grandeur solely to ask and pray that you deign in the name of his Majesty to favor us by giving us the said cañon for the purposes mentioned, on account of finding ourselves lacking land for planting, and deserving that his Majesty should favor us we ask as a grant the said cañon; on account of all which we ask and pray that your Excellency be well pleased to command that what we request be done, that by your so doing we shall receive great benefit and favor, etc.

Santa Fé, January 27, 1788.

I grant, in the name of the King, the cultivation and working of the land which the petitioners ask for, the chief alcalde of the Queres, Don Antonio Armenta, placing them *in[179 possession thereof, provided that no prejudice results to the Indians and residents settled in that vicinity, and it having been so done, following this decree he shall place the said taking of possession without prejudice to a third party, in order to copy it in the government book, and to write it out on stamped paper when the same shall reach this province.

Concha. (Scroll.)

At this cañon of San Diego on the sixth day of the month of February, of the year one thousand, seven hundred and eighty-eight, I, Don Antonio de Armenta, chief alcalde and war captain of the jurisdiction of the Queres, by virtue of the authority that is conferred upon me by Señor Don Fernando de la Concha, Knight Commander of Mora in the Order of Santiago, lieutenant colonel of the royal armies, civil and military governor of this province of New Mexico, being at the said cañon, having cited the natives of the pueblo of Jemez, who are the adjoining owners to said land, and having designated to them that which was their own they were well suited on account of receiving no injury by the giving of said cañon, and also knowing that it is the will of our Sovereign that his lands be peopled by his vassals in whatever surplus there may be, and finding no obstacle whatever that could interfere with it, and exercising the authority that is conferred upon me, I went to said cañon of San Diego, and no one appearing who had a better right, nor there being any prejudice to a third party who might make objection, and said Indians, Francisco Garcia de Noriega, interpreter for the Navajos, and his brother, José Antonio Garcia de Noriega, being present and understanding it all, I took them by the hand, I conducted them over said lands, they pulled up grass, threw stones to the four cardinal points, and we all said together three times, "Long live the King, our Lord (whom may God preserve)," as evidence of true possession, which they received quietly and peaceably without any opposition, their boundaries being the following: On the north side, the waterfall (salto del aqua); on the south side, the junction of the rivers and also a point of a red table land (una mesa*colorada), and lands[180 of said Indians. With respect to the east and the west there is nothing more than some very high table lands on both sides of the cañon, which (table lands) serve as boundaries. And, there resulting no prejudice whatever, they were satisfied with them (the boundaries); and in order that it may so appear I, said chief alcalde, Don Antonio de Armenta, signed it, together with my two attending witnesses with whom I act for lack of a public or royal notary, of which there is none of any kind in all this government, to all of which I certify.

The interlineation "river" is valid.

There are some differences between petitioners' translations and those of the government, the principal being in the opening words of the alleged grant, which in Spanish were: "Concedo en nombre del Rey el cultivo y labor de la tierra que solicitan los Supplicantes," etc. These words are translated by petitioners: "I grant in the name of the King, for cultivation and working, the land that the petitioners solicit;" and by the government: "I grant, in the name of the King, the cultivation and working of the land which the petitioners ask for."

The granting papers of the grant of 1798 were as follows:

Seal Third. [Seal.] Two Rials.
For the years one thousand, seven hundred and ninety-eight and ninety-nine.
To the Lieutenant Colonel and Governor of this Province:

Francisco and Antonio Garcia, brothers, and interpreters of the Navajo nation, in unison with Miguel Garcia, Joaquin Montoya, Salvador Garcia, José Manuel Garcia, Juan José Gutierez, Juan de Aguilar, Blas Nepumuceno Garcia, Bartholomew Montoya, José Montoya, Tomas Montoya, Juan Domingo Martin, José [181] Gonzales, Salvador Lopes, Antonio *Abad Garcia, Miguel Gallego, Marcos Apodaca, José Miguel Duran, and José Maria Jaramillo, appear before your excellency in the most approved manner the law requires and may be necessary, and state that a quantity of vacant and uncultivated land lies in the cañon of San Diego, adjoining the boundaries of the land belonging to the Indians of the town of Jemez; and whereas the settlement thereof would be beneficial to the provinces, and advantageous to our present families and descendants to be settling upon these lands with our property and cultivating the same, we pray your excellency to be pleased to grant this aid and settlement that we petition for to the persons herein mentioned; being pleased at the same time to order, in the name of his Majesty (whom may God preserve), that we may receive from the boundaries beyond the land granted to the Indians of the pueblo, our petition calling for from east to west to the middle arroyo called Los Torreones, and the line running from north to south to the Valleeelo de la Cueva which is in front of the waterfall, and in a transverse line from said middle arroyo to the Rito de la Jara. We also protest that we will not injure with our persons or stock a few trees which the Indians claim as their own, although they are planted beyond the limit of the lands which belong to them. Therefore we humbly pray your excellency to be pleased to order our request to be complied with, granting us the vacant land asked for; by doing which we will receive grace, and we swear, in due form, that our petition is not made through malice; and one signed, the others not knowing how.

José Miguel Garcia.

Decree.

In view of the foregoing petition made by José Miguel Garcia and other citizens therein mentioned, in regard to settling in the cañon known as San Diego de Jemez, where the interpreters of the Navajo nation were temporarily stationed, I grant to them the aforesaid land in the name of the King, our sovereign, with the express condition that it is to be settled by at least twenty citizens; that the lands are to be *distributed in equal parts, and [182] that they are not allowed or authorized, for themselves or their heirs, to sell or dispose of the lands granted to them. It being his Majesty's will, according to his last orders, that the lands should descend from father to son, or his heirs in a direct line; and if any colonist, to suit his own conscience, should desire to remove, under any pretext whatever, his possession or share shall remain for the benefit of the one taking his place, in which case the residents of the same place, or persons marrying there, shall be preferred, and for which no remuneration whatever shall be exacted by the person voluntarily absenting himself, or expelled or banished by the authorities on account of his bad conduct; that besides the subdivision above mentioned, a sufficient amount of land is to be left for pastures and watering places as well as to allow for the increase of the settlement, if such may be the case (which is likely to occur)—(torn)—order of the chief justice of that jurisdiction, Don Antonio Armenta, to place the parties in possession under the rules prescribed by law. Chacon.

Possession.

In the cañon de San Diego de los Jemez, on the fourteenth day of the month of March, in the year one thousand, seven hundred and ninety-eight, I, Don Antonio Armenta, chief justice of the pueblo of Jemez, by virtue of the authority conferred upon me by my superior, Don Fernando Chacon, gentleman of the order of Santiago, lieutenant colonel of the royal armies, political and military governor of this province of New Mexico, being at the aforesaid place, and having summoned the natives of said pueblo of Jemez, to whom, having measured the league belonging to them, I found a surplus of 2,100 varas, which they had before arriving at the cañon de San Diego, all of which they claimed as their own, without having any right to them in any manner; and believing that it is the wish of our sovereign that his land be settled upon by his subjects wherever a surplus may be found, and finding no impediment whatever, and using the authority in me vested, I proceeded to the surplus lands, and finding no one with a better title, and Francisco Garcia, *Antonio [183] Garcia, Navajo interpreters, Miguel Garcia, Joaquin Montoya, Salvador Garcia, José Manuel Garcia, Juan José Gutierrez, Juan de Aguilar, Juan Blas Pumuceno Garcia, Bartolome Montes, Tomas Montoya, José Montoya, Juan Domingo Sangil, Salvador Lopez, José Gonzales, Antonio Abad Garcia, Miguel Geallgos, Marcos Apodaca, José Miguel Durán, and José Jaramillo, being present, all interested and well-informed in regard to the matter. I took them by the hand, walked them over said lands, they pulled up grass, threw stones towards the four winds, and we all cried at once, three times, Live the King our sovereign (whom may God preserve), in proof of legal possession, which they received quietly and peaceably without any opposition whatever, because, after concluding all these ceremonies, I delivered to each one of the said settlers three hundred varas, with which they were well satisfied, leaving the remainder for the benefit of all, and without any other lands being left for any person to enter; and in order to prevent any other from coming to meddle and create difficulties between the citizens, as well as the Indians, I gave time to understand which were their boundaries, which are: On the north, the Vallecito de la Cueva; on the south the termination of the Indian league. On the east, the boundary of Vallecito; and on the west, the opening towards the middle arroyo and the Rito de la Jara; and no injury resulting to anyone they were all satisfied, and in order that it may so appear, I, the said chief justice, signed with my two attending witnesses in the absence of a public or royal notary, there being none within the limits of all this government, to which I certify.

Antonio de Armenta.

In 1879, when the documents of 1788 were produced by claimants and filed in the archives, the following certificate was also brought forward by them and put on file:

In the cañon de San Diego de Jemez on the fourteenth day of the month of March, year [184] 1798, before me, Antonio *de Armenta, and there being assembled all the citizens who took possession of the said cañon, together with Francisco Garcia de Noriega and Antonio Garcia de Noriega, two brothers of the first possessors, said Garcias declared in a loud and clear voice, which all heard, because they shouted it with much distinctness, and they all unanimously agreed to abide by what was said by the said Garcias, and their reasons were these: Friends and brothers, now each of you is about to take the lands, which His Majesty has granted and donated to you; but you are all notified that the lands, which we first and in our first grant, we have been possessing, be all of you aware that I and my brother are going to enjoy the same freely, without any of those present, nor their children nor anybody else shall desire to interpose obstacles, and because as first possessors we have the right to enjoy said lands and to cultivate them with full title, as well ourselves, our children, and our successors; and so that none of those who are present may plead ignorance we have so spoken to-day, there being no one absent. The said Garcias having made all the remarks, all unanimously replied that they asked reasonable justice and that neither by themselves, their children, nor successors would there be interposed any suit or demand against them at any time, and if they perchance should wish to do so they would take the case until leaving them in peace concerning the said land which they had been so justly possessing.

All here set forth I, said chief justice, witness, for all of the citizens declared that it was not to them any imposition that the Messrs. Garcias should enjoy the lands which they were heretofore cultivating, and that it may so appear whenever requisite I will make this document in favor of the said two Garcias, I sign the same with those of my attendance in the aforesaid cañon in said day, month, and year, to which I certify. Anto. de Armenta.

It also appeared that there were among the old archives the following:

*Governor: The interpreter of the Na-[185] vajos, Antonio Garcia, has presented to me a document executed to him by the former alcalde of this jurisdiction, Antonio de Armenta, under the decree of Don Fernando de la Concha, as appears from the grant itself, and the whole of the Jemez cañon, having been settled under an order of Don Fernando Chacon in a royal grant made to them and in which it embraced the lands granted to the Garcias, whence results contention between the one and the others the latter grantees alleging title to all the land; and I, deeming that the title claimed by Antonio Garcia is founded in law, he having been the prior settler for the period of ten years, with the condition that at the time they were given possession all the new settlers gave their consent, as said Garcia makes appear by a document which the alcalde executed to the two brothers and which I inclose to you, together with the grant of the Garcias, so that after seeing you may order whatever you shall deem proper, and may, if Garcia has a right to the land claimed, confirm and approve the same, to obviate all questions which will necessarily result if the latter be not decided by your superiority that the land of the Garcias is included or not in the grant of the last settlers and whether a copy of this grant be taken so that the original, which is the one I inclose, may remain in the archives of the government confirmed by you, and the same to be done with a copy, subject to what you may direct, which will be the best and most correct, your ordering what I shall do to avoid proceedings annoying your attention. God preserve you many years. Ignatio Sanchez Vergara.

Santa Ana, 1st of December, 1808.
Lieutenant Colonel José Manrique.

Advised of your official communication of the first instant and documents you accompany.

I will state to you that the subject does not require any decision of mine inasmuch as the grant of the Garcias makes their right clear, which grant being the older always has a preference. *The last settlers cannot deny to[186] the Garcias a better title and so these should always remain on the same grant which they have held hitherto; and if the said new settlers do not coincide you will not permit them recourse for and such which they may possess, they will not have the royal audience of Guadalajara, as the documents referred to were sanctioned by former governors of this province and the said royal audience alone can annul them; with which I answer your official communication before mentioned. I return to you the documents mentioned that you may deliver them to the party interested. God preserve you many years.

Santa Fé, 13th of December, 1808.
To the alcalde of Jemez.

On the 4th day of June, 1859, certain claimants for themselves and in the name of the actual settlers petitioned the surveyor general of New Mexico, Pelham, for a confirmation of the grant of March 6, 1798, who took action thereon. In the proceedings it appeared from the evidence that a town existed on the grant some sixty years before and was in existence when the United States took possession, and the testimonio of the original granting papers, heretofore given, certified to as correct and genuine by the alcalde, Don Antonio Armenta, with his attending witnesses, on March 16, 1798, in due form, "at the verbal request of the parties," which was then on file in the office of the surveyor general, was considered and acted on by him. The surveyor general made his report to Congress, under date June 10, 1859, approving the grant, and stating that "the evidence shows that the town has been in continuous occupation of the claimants, and was in existence when the United States assumed sovereignty over the country." The grant was thereupon confirmed by Congress June 21, 1860 (12 Stat. at L. 71, chap. 167, § 3). The patent for this grant was issued October 21, 1881, to the original twenty grantees and those claiming under or through them.

In 1879 Amado Chaves, for himself and the other heirs of the two Garcias, petitioned the then surveyor general Atkinson, for the approval and confirmation of the grant of 1788, 187] *and in the proceedings before him the papers of that date, together with the certificate of Alcalde Armenta of March 14, 1798, were produced and filed, and considered with the correspondence of 1808 and sundry depositions. The surveyor general approved the grant March 22, 1880, and transmitted a certified transcript of the papers for the action of Congress, but the grant was not confirmed.

The evidence tended to show that Francisco and Antonio Garcia were two Spanish brothers who were interpreters for the Navajos; that Francisco was killed in 1807, and that Antonio died in 1835.

The depositions of two witnesses, one of them the great grandson of Francisco Garcia, born in 1827, and the other the grandson of Antonia Garcia, born in 1807, were taken by Surveyor General Atkinson in January, 1880. Both gave the south boundary of the tract sued for as the junction of the San Diego and the Guadalupe rivers, "and the lands of the Indian pueblo of Jemez." Both testified that the tract was reputed to belong to the heirs of the two Garcias; that Francisco was reputed to have lived thereon; and that Antonio, who survived until 1835, lived there to their knowledge.

In addition to these depositions, petitioners called as a witness another great grandson of Francisco, born in 1850, who testified that his grandmother was born on the tract, and that "she said the land was occupied and cultivated by them," the two Garcias. What particular part of the tract she was born on and the particular place of occupancy and cultivation did not appear.

The evidence on behalf of the government was to the effect that Antonio Garcia occupied land several hundred varas in extent, running north from the north boundary line of the Indian pueblo, which was subsequently sold by Antonio's grandson to one of the witnesses, who thereupon took up his residence in Antonio's house; that Antonio said that he had "lands in the Indian's league;" "from the Pueblo Indian league up north;" that the ranches were in the cañon and divided into portions of 300 varas each; that heirs of the original grantees or persons claiming under them still held *original allotments north of the [188 junction of the rivers; and that the smaller grant was not generally known.

The survey of May 18, 1880, was as follows:

Plat of the Cañon de San Diego Grant, surveyed by Rob't G. Marmon, U. S. Deputy Surveyor, May, 1890. Scale 80 chains—1 in.

The court of private land claims, two members dissenting, held that the claim under the grant of 1788 had been abandoned, and dismissed the petition.

Mr. Henry M. Earle for appellants.

Messrs. Matthew G. Reynolds, Special Assistant to the Attorney General, and John K. Richards, Solicitor General, for appellees.

By the Spanish law in force at the time of the alleged grant of 1788 lots and lands were distributed to those who were intending to settle, and it was provided that "when said settlers shall have lived and labored in said settlements during the space of four years, they are hereby empowered, from the expiration of said term, to sell the same, and freely to dispose of them at their will as their own property." But confirmation by the audiencia, or the governor, if recourse to the audiencia was impracticable, after the four years had elapsed, was required in completion of the legal title. Laws Indies, lib. IV., tit. 2, law 1; Royal Order of 1754; 2 White's New Recop. 48, 62. This is admitted except that it is said that confirmation was not needed, and was not usually had, until the settler sought to exercise the power of disposition.

It was also provided that it should "not be lawful to give or distribute lands in a settlement to such persons as already possess some in another settlement, unless they shall leave their former residence and remove themselves to the new place to be settled, except where they shall have resided in the first settlement during the four years necessary to entitle them to fee-simple right, or unless they shall relinquish their title to the same for not having fulfilled their obligation." Lib. IV., tit. 12, law 2; 2 White's New Recop. 49.

190] *We are of opinion that the granting papers in this record taken together do not justify the presumption of settlement and working by the two Garcias on the tract contained in the grant of 1788, for the ten years prior to 1798, or for four years thereof, or any confirmation of the grant thereupon; but that the contrary is to be inferred from the testimony in respect of possession; and that Armenta's certificate of 1798 and the correspondence of 1808 conduct to no other result.

The two Garcias were interpreters to the Indians and they may not unreasonably be supposed to have resided, in that capacity, at the pueblo, or on lands claimed by the Indians as appurtenant thereto. The language of the petition and decree of 1788 was perhaps somewhat peculiar, and it is manifest that Governor Chacon regarded "the cultivation and working of the land" by them as not permanent in character, for when the petition for the grant of 1798 was presented to him on behalf of the two Garcias and eighteen others, he referred in his decree to the interpreters as "temporarily stationed" on the tract solicited, and must be assumed to have been aware of the nature of their occupation.

The petition of 1798 was a petition for settlement, and it nowhere intimates that the two Garcias, petitioners "in unison" with the other eighteen proposing to settle, claimed an independent interest in the cañon de San Diego by virtue of the alleged grant of 1788, but on the contrary it states that "a quantity of vacant and uncultivated land lies in the cañon of San Diego, adjoining the boundaries of the land belonging to the Indians of the town of Jemez," and that "the settlement thereof would be beneficial to the provinces and advantageous to our present families and descendants." The terms of the decree are entirely inconsistent with the recognition of such a claim, and so is the act of judicial possession. In that act the alcalde, Armenta, states that in the cañon de San Diego de los Jemez, having summoned the natives of the pueblo of Jemez, to whom was measured the league belonging to them, he found a surplus of 2,100 varas, which the Indians had, before arriving at the cañon de San Diego, and were claiming as their own, but to which he *says they had no right in any manner; [191 and believing that it was the wish of the sovereign that his lands be settled by his citizens wherever a surplus was found, finding no impediment, and using the authority in him vested, and finding no one with a better title, and Francisco Garcia and Antonio Garcia, the Navajo interpreters, and the eighteen other petitioners (naming them), being present, "all interested and well informed in regard to the matter," he took them over the lands, performing the usual formal acts in proof of legal possession, "which they received quietly and peaceably without any opposition whatever, because, after concluding all these ceremonies, I delivered to each one of the said settlers 300 varas, with which they were well satisfied, leaving the remainder for the benefit of all, and without any other lands being left for any person to enter;" and he gave them time to understand the boundaries, which were: "On the north, the Vallecito de la Cueva; on the south, the termination of the Indian league. On the east, the boundary of Vallecito; and on the west, the opening towards the middle arroyo and the Rito de la Jara;" adding: "and no injury resulting to anyone, they were all satisfied." Of these boundaries the southern was the north boundary of the Indian pueblo, and in making the subdivision Armenta apparently started from that boundary, and, after reaching the junction of the Guadalupe and the San Diego, followed up the San Diego, which flowed through the cañon. He made the distance from the north boundary of the pueblo to the south boundary of the cañon 2,100 varas, and, therefore, if he subdivided that space, must have allotted at least 3,900 varas within the alleged grant of 1788, for he certified that he delivered to "each one of the said settlers 300 varas," which would be 6,000 varas in all for twenty settlers. The government survey shows that distance to have been something short of 3,400 varas. If Armenta meant by the "said settlers" the eighteen co-petitioners, and left to the interpreters as contra-distinguished from these settlers what they were cultivating between the two boundaries, then 5,400 varas were allotted to the eighteen within the grant of 1788.

In any view, allotments were made north of the south *boundary of the grant now [192 claimed, which was entirely embraced by the grant of 1798.

The evidence for the petitioners did not show where the two interpreters were located and what the particular tract was that was reputed to belong to them in fee, but the evidence for the government tended sufficiently to establish that they did not actually cultivate any part of the grant of 1788 prior to 1798. It must be conceded that wherever the interpreters were, they were together, and it is quite clear from the testimony that Antonio Garcia, who survived until 1835, when one of the witnesses was twenty years old, cultivated and claimed ownership of land not within the boundaries of the grant of 1788, but between the south boundary of that tract and the north boundary of the Indian pueblo; and the presumption is that this was so in respect of Francisco.

It is true that when Armenta gave juridical possession under the grant of 1788 he described the south boundary as "the junction of the rivers and also a point of a red table land and lands of said Indians." But at that time the Indians claimed to the junction of the two rivers, and no attempt was then made by Armenta to determine the boundary of the pueblo, as it would seem would have been the case if the grant had been of land for settlement with the intention of acquiring the legal title.

When the proceedings were had before the surveyor general in 1879–80, the original papers of 1788 were produced by claimants, and also an independent paper purporting to have been signed by Armenta on the 14th day of March, 1798, at the cañon, stating "there being assembled all the citizens who took possession of the said cañon, together with Francisco Garcia de Noriega, and Antonio Garcia de Noriega, two brothers of the first possessors;" and that "the said Garcias declared in a loud and clear voice, which all heard, because they shouted it with much distinctness, and they all unanimously agreed to abide by what was said by the said Garcias, and their reasons were these: Friends and brothers, now each of you is about to take the lands, which His Majesty has granted and donated to you; but you are all notified that the [193] *lands, which we first and in our first grant, we have been possessing, be all of you aware that I and my brother are going to enjoy the same freely, without any of those present, nor their children nor anybody else shall desire to interpose obstacles, and because as first possessors we have the right to enjoy said lands and to cultivate them with full title, as well ourselves, our children, and our successors." And "all unanimously replied that they asked reasonable justice and that neither by themselves, their children, nor successors would there be interposed any suit or demand against them at any time;" and that they should be left "in peace concerning the said land which they had been so justly possessing." And to this Armenta bore witness, because "all of the citizens declared that it was not to them any imposition that Messrs. Garcias should enjoy the lands which they were heretofore cultivating."

There is nothing to show and we think the presumption cannot be indulged that this so-called certificate was brought to the attention of Governor Chacou, and the alcalde certainly had no authority in himself to make an exception to the grant.

The grant of 1798 was a grant for settlement, and by the allotments contemplated to be made and which were made, so many parcels, of 300 varas each, specifically situated in whole or in part within the cañon and the alleged grant of 1788, were set off, so that if an exception could have been created by this independent paper it involved the proposition that after the allotments had been made, eighteen of the twenty allottees assented to be deprived of any right or title to the lands which had just been assigned to them, and would have been repugnant to the grant.

Again, there was no intimation of such an exception in the petition, the decree, or the act of juridical possession, nor any mention of the execution of this paper in that act, nor does it appear that it was placed in the archives with the title papers, and when Armenta certified to the testimonio on the 16th of March, 1798, he did not include nor make any mention of this certificate. Moreover, it was not attested by witnesses, as required in the instance of official documents, in the *ab- [194] sence of a public or royal notary, of which there was "none within the limits of all this government," as Armenta certified in the act of juridical possession. It is impossible to treat this paper as of legal validity as an exception, and to give it the same force and effect as the act of juridical possession or as if it were a direct reconveyance.

But treating the paper as genuine and entitled to consideration as evidence, it amounts to nothing more than the statement of an assent on the part of the eighteen that the Garcias should not be disturbed as to the particular land they were cultivating, which we are satisfied from the evidence was not within the grant of 1788 at all. It furnishes no basis for permitting the Garcias to repudiate the official action of the alcalde in making the allotments to their copetitioners, they having been present, participating in the proceedings, and parties to the transaction from the beginning.

This brings us to consider the papers of 1808, which consist of a communication of Alcalde Vergara to Governor Manrique and an unsigned note purporting to be the governor's reply thereto. The alcalde states that "the interpreter of the Navajos, Antonio Garcia," has presented to him a document in his favor, executed by the former alcalde, Armenta, under the decree of Governor Concha, "as appears from the grant itself, and the whole of the Jemez cañon having been settled under an order of Don Fernando Chacon in a royal grant made to them, and in which it embraced the lands granted to the Garcias, whence results contention between the one and the others, the latter grantees alleging title to all the lands; and I, deeming that the title claimed by Antonio Garcia is founded in law, he having been the prior settler for the period of ten years, with the condition that at the time they were given possession all the new settlers gave their consent, as said Garcia makes appear by a document which the alcalde executed to the two brothers and which I inclose to you, together with the grant of the Garcias, so that after seeing you may order whatever you shall deem proper and may, if Garcia has a right to the land claimed, confirm and approve of the same, to obviate all questions which will necessarily result if the *latter be not decided by your superiority [195] that the land of the Garcias is included or not in the grant of the last settlers."

It will be perceived that the controversy is asserted to be, not whether the Garcias' land included that of the other settlers, but whether the land of the latter embraced that of the Garcias. It is this question which the governor is asked to determine. The "others" are plainly the eighteen settlers, and they are the grantees who are said to be alleging title to all the lands. The reply of the governor stated that the subject did not require his decision, "inasmuch as the grant of the Garcias makes their right clear, which grant being the older always has a preference;" and that the last settlers could not deny to the Garcias a better title, and so these "should always remain on the same grant which they have held hitherto." And he added that "if the said new settlers do not coincide," he should not permit them recourse, for "as the documents referred to were sanctioned by former governors of this province," the royal audiencia of Guadalajara alone could annul them.

This correspondence was entirely ex parte and without the knowledge of the other settlers, and was in no respect judicial action. The reply signified the individual opinion of the governor, not that the new settlers could be driven from their own holdings, but that they could not claim the land actually occupied by the Garcias. And he expressly declined to adjudicate in the premises because unable to take jurisdiction in respect of documents "sanctioned by former governors." Now what had been sanctioned in 1798 by Governor Chacon was the grant and allotments of that date, and it does not appear that in 1808 the validity of those allotments was questioned. The communication of Vergara related to the land that had been formerly cultivated by the Garcias and to which they were given a preferred right by Armenta at the time of delivering juridical possession in 1798; and Vergara stated that the whole of the cañon had, when he wrote, been settled under the grant of that year.

The court of private land claims held that 196] Governor *Chacon was justified in regarding the petition to him as in the nature of a request on the part of the Garcias to make to the twenty petitioners a grant of the whole tract within the boundaries specified and as an offer of release of all claims to any part of the land by virtue of the grant of 1788; that the act of juridical possession showed that the twenty petitioners, including the Garcias, were placed in possession and each received 300 varas of land, leaving the remainder to be held in common; that the certificate of Armenta of 1798 was probably signed before the act of juridical possession, and reasonably bore the construction that the petitioners had agreed, in pursuance of an original understanding, that a colony of twenty persons should be formed, of which the two Garcias should be members, to settle in the cañon and that the Garcias should surrender all claim under the grant of 1788, and accept their proportion of the new grant with the new settlers, share and share alike; that the Garcias accepted the agreement of their cograntees as a guaranty that in any distribution of the land which might be made their allotments should cover the particular portion which they had theretofore been cultivating; that by thereafter accepting their allotments the Garcias became parties to the official action of the alcalde and were bound by it; and that they each accepted 300 varas as their equal part in compliance with the terms of the grant and of the agreement, and to their entire satisfaction. On the other hand, it might fairly be argued that Armenta in the act of juridical possession in 1798 left to the Garcias all the land which they were actually cultivating south of the south boundary of the grant of 1788, and assigned to the eighteen last settlers 5 400 varas north of that boundary and in the grant itself, and that the certificate of 1798 was merely in authentication of an assent to the allotment to the Garcias, as cosettlers with the eighteen, of lands previously possessed by them south of the grant of 1788, and not to an exception of that grant out of the grant of 1798. Although the Garcias, if they should be regarded as prior settlers, did not "leave their former residence and remove themselves to the new place to be settled," they brought *themselves into connection [197 with it and relinquished whatever rights they had outside of the particular land resided on and cultivated. The 2,100 varas were surplus lands so far as the Indians were concerned, and vacant in the sense that the Indians had no title to them, yet nevertheless the interpreters may have been in occupation thereon as outlying Indian lands, and upon the surplus being ascertained may have asserted a superior right to what they were there cultivating, and demanded that that be conceded in the distribution under the new grant. If this were so, it would satisfactorily explain the certificate of Armenta and the contention referred to by Vergara.

We are not dealing with the rights of the Garcias as between them and other claimants, but with the rights of the Garcias as between them and the government of Spain, and in that regard the question is whether that government conveyed to others what had already been conveyed to the Garcias. Whether, then, the Garcias did or did not take 300 varas each north of the south boundary of the grant of 1788, they would be equally bound by their participation in the grant of 1798, although in the distribution thereunder they were allotted even more than that south of that boundary under the circumstances.

Accepting either construction of the documents and in the light of all the evidence, the conclusion of the court below was correct.

The suggestion that some of the allotments may have been in the cañon Guadalupe finds no such support in the record as to require consideration.

Decree affirmed.

Argued October 12, 1897 Decided November 15, 1897.

ON APPEAL from a decree of the Court of Private Land Claims dismissing the petition of the Puehlos of Zia, Santa Aña, and Jemez for the confirmation of a Spanish grant. Affirmed.

Statement by Mr. Justice Brown:

This was a petition by the pueblos of Zia, Santa Aña, and Jemez for the confirmation of what is known as the Ojo del Espiritu Santo grant, containing about 382,849 acres.

The testimonio, or official copy of the pro-199]ceedings, opens *with the following petition to the governor and captain general, presented in 1766, by Felipe Tafoya, as the agent of these pueblos:

His excellency, the governor and captain general:

I, Felipe Tafoya, lawyer of this town of Santa Fé, appear before your excellency in full legal form, for and in the name of Cristoval, Indian governor of the pueblo of Zia, and Thomas, chief war captain of said pueblo, who come under appointment from their casique, and of the other inhabitants of their Republic, and, sir, in the name of the aforenamed, and of the community of the pueblos of Santa Aña and of Jemez, do state that they, from their foundation, have considered as their pasture ground, in the vicinity of their said pueblos, a valley commonly called the Holy Ghost Spring, and that in some urgent cases, the same, as is known, is used as a pasture ground for the horses of this royal garrison, and the said parties being aware that the said valley has had, in its vicinity, some applicants to acquire the same by grant, which will cause them very great injury, as they have consiclerable cattle, sheep, goats, and horses for the royal service, and not having any other place in which to pasture them, particularly the people of the pueblo of Zia, the greater part of whose fields are upland, and some of them in the glens of said valley, adjoining their said pueblo. In consideration of all of which, I ask and pray that your excellency, in the name of His Majesty (whom may God preserve), be pleased to declare said valley to be the legitimate pasture grounds and pastures of the pueblos, directing that the boundaries thereof be designated to them, that is, on the east, the pueblos aforesaid, on the west, the summits of the Puerco river, on the north, a place called the Ventana, where some Navajo Apaches reside, and on the south, the lands of the citizen settlers of said Puerco river, and, should your excellency order to be done as I have requested, the said parties, my clients, will receive grace with the justice which I ask, and declare in their name that this is not in dissimulation, and so forth.

Felipe Tafoya.

*Upon the receipt of this petition and [200 on June 16, 1766, Velez Cachupin, governor and captain general, made an order commissioning the chief alcalde of said pueblos, Bartolomé Fernandez, "to the end that, having examined the boundaries which they mentioned as of the Holy Ghost Spring, where they state they pasture their stock and horses, he reports to me the leagues the same may embrace from north to south and from east to west, and whether the aforesaid three pueblos have the cattle, sheep, goats, and horses proportional to the boundaries asked for their grazing, and also whether or not any citizen or citizens are damaged by said boundaries under any prior valid grant and possession held by them, which the said chief alcalde will perform with all possible veracity."

Fernandez reported that he proceeded to examine the lands and their boundaries, and after establishing the quantity, found that they were "only suitable for pasturing live stock, which is abundant at said pueblos, though the said three republics have no other lands on which to sustain their stock, and it being, as it is true, that none of the aforementioned boundaries will injure anyone holding or to hold possession of lands within the same, which proceedings I placed on record," etc.

Upon this report the captain general made the following decree:

In the town of Santa Fé, on the sixth day of the month of August, one thousand, seven hundred and sixty-six, I, Thomas Velez Cachupin, governor general of this Kingdom of New Mexico, and in view of what is petitioned for by the three pueblos of Santa Aña, Zia, and Jemez, of the Queres nation, and of the report which their chief alcalde, Bartolomé Fernandez, makes, that they have held said lands for their live stock, which at present is abundant, without having any other places in which to pasture them, except those referred to in their petition, together with the small watering places mentioned in said report, declare that I would grant, and I did grant, in the name of His Majesty (God preserve him), the *aforesaid lands for pas [201 turing the stock and horses of the aforesaid three pueblos of Santa Aña, Zia, and Jemez, with the boundaries, from north to south, from the place Ventana to the stone ford of the Puerco river, the boundaries also of the citizens of the place San Fernando of Nuestra Señora de la Luz: and from east to west, from the pueblo of Zia to the said Puerco river, the eastern edge, the whole of the valley of the Holy Ghost Spring being embraced within the center and within the boundaries of this grant, with the condition and stipulation: that in case of necessity the horses of this royal garrison of Santa Fé may and shall be kept in said valley, the same being a place where they have been accustomed to graze; wherefore the aforementioned three pueblos are to place no obstacle in the way, nor claim damages therefor; and the aforementioned boundaries being for the future considered those of the aforementioned three pueblos, they will hold the same with legitimate title under this royal grant, so that they be not molested by any Spanish citizen or citizens, taking their stock thereupon, decming the pasturage to be common. And I direct the chief alcalde, Bartolomé Fernandez, to go and give to the aforementioned three pueblos royal possession of this grant, and the boundaries therein set forth, taking with him the justices and seniors of each one of them, and placing his proceedings on record, following this my granting decree, which he will return to me, in order to furnish to each pueblo the proper testimonio of the whole, and deposit the original in the archives of this government, where it shall remain.

And I so provided, granted, ordered, and signed, acting with two attending witnesses in the absence of notaries, there being none of any kind in this jurisdiction.

Thomas Velez Cachupin.

Witness: Carlos Fernandez.

Witness: Domingo Sabadia.

In compliance with this decree of the governor and captain general, Bartolomé Fernandez, the alcalde, made report to the governor that he proceeded to the aforementioned pueb-202] los, *and, in company with the governors, casiques, and other authorities, proceeded to the lands asked for by the natives of the said three republics, and summoning the contiguous land holders, took by the hand the aforesaid governors and the magistrates, "and conducted them over said land; and they shouted, 'Long life to the King, our sovereign, whom may God preserve,' and they cast stones, and pulled up grass, in sign of possession, which I gave them, and which they received quietly and peaceably, without any oppositiou whatever, under the conditions mentioned in the aforesaid grant," etc.

The claim was presented to the surveyor general under the law of July 22, 1854, and through the Secretary of the Interior reported to Congress for confirmation, but no action was ever taken. The petitioners also produced evidence tending to show that since the date of the grant they have been continuously and openly in possession of the property, pasturing their cattle upon it and cultivating certain portions, under a claim of exclusive right thereto by virtue of the grant; that they are now in the open and notorious occupation of the same as the owners in fee, except a portion of it which may be in conflict with a certain grant called the Santissima Trinidad Galvana Ignacio Sanchez Veraga tract, in regard to which they admit they have released the same unto the claimants thereof. The continuity and exclusiveness of this possession were denied by the witnesses produced by the govern ment.

In defense it was shown by the government that three subsequent grants were made, one in 1815 to Luis Maria Cabeza de Baca, known also as the Ojo del Espiritu Santo grant; another in 1786, known as the San Isidro grant, and another made 1798, known as the cañon de San Diego grant, in connection with which parol evidence was admitted to show a conflict between these grants and that of the petitioners to a large, if not to the entire, extent of their grant.

Upon this state of facts the court of private land claims made a decree rejecting the grant, and dismissing the petition of petitioners upon the ground that the grant was not in fee, but a license to pasture. From this decree the petitioners appealed to this court:

Mr. Henry M. Earle for appellants.

Messrs. Matthew G. Reynolds, Special Assistant to the Attorney General, and John K. Richards, Solicitor General, for appellees.

Mr. Justice Brown delivered the opinion of the court:

The main question in this case is whether the language of the documents which make up the testimonio indicates anything more than the grant of a right to these pueblos to pasture their cattle upon the lands in question—a right somewhat akin to the right of common under the English law, and one which appears to have been frequently granted under the Spanish law. United States v. Huertas, 33 U. S. 8 Pet. 475 [8: 1015]; United States v. Davenport's Heirs, 56 U. S. 15 How. 1 [14: 575].

The words of the several documents set forth in the testimonio certainly favor this interpretation: Thus, in the petition, there is no application for a grant of vacant land for cultivation and pasturage, as is usual in this class of cases, but a statement that the pueblos "have considered as their pasture ground in the vicinity of their pueblos, a valley commonly called the Holy Ghost Spring" (which, it seems, had been used in some cases as the pasture ground for the horses of the royal garrison), and that some applicants were desirous of acquiring the same by public grant, "which will cause them very great injury, as they have considerable cattle, sheep, goats, and horses for the royal service," and have no other place in which to pasture them. There was no claim of a grant of the lands, such as the other applicants were seeking to acquire, but a request to have them considered as their pasture ground, and as the pasture ground for the horses of the royal garrison. The prayer bears out this construction of the statement of the petition. It asks, not for a grant of the land, but that his excellency will "be pleased to declare said valley to be the legitimate pasture grounds and pastures of the pueblos," directing a designation of their boundaries, etc.

*The order of the captain general upon [204
this petition and the report of the chief alcalde are addressed only to the ascertainment of the boundaries, and to the fact whether there was any other prior grantee in possession, and throw but little light upon the granting act.

The final grant or decree, however, states that the captain general granted the aforesaid lands "for pasturing the stock and horses of the aforesaid three pueblos," designating the boundaries, and with the stipulation that in case of necessity the horses of the royal garrison of Santa Fé might be kept in the valley where they had been accustomed to graze, and decreed that the aforementioned three pueblos "will hold the same, with legitimate title, under this royal grant, so that they be not molested by any Spanish citizen or citizens, taking their stock thereupon, deeming the pasturage to be common." The alcalde was further directed to give royal possession of the grant which he certifies in the act of possession that he did by taking by the hand the governors and war captains of the pueblos with their magistrates, and conducting them over the land, and making a livery of seisin by shouting, "Long life to the King, our sovereign (whom may God preserve)," and casting stones and pulling up grass in sign of possession, "which I gave them and which they received quietly and peaceably without any opposition whatever, under the conditions mentioned in the aforesaid grant," and subsequently attesting these formalities with witnesses.

There is nothing in any of these instruments to indicate that the pueblos desired, or that the governor intended to grant, anything beyond a common, whereon the inhabitants of the pueblos might pasture their stock in conformity with ancient usage. When it is considered that the valley was already used as a pasture ground for the horses of the royal garrison, it is to be inferred that the rights of these pueblos were practically the same as those of the royal garrison, and were not intended to involve a conveyance of a fee of the land. It is true that by the common law of England livery of seisin was only necessary to be made upon the granting of an estate of freehold, either by inheritance or for life (2 205]Bl. Com. 314); *but under Spanish law it seems to have been a feature commonly connected with the delivery of possession of the land, though to what extent is somewhat uncertain.

The granting clause is not in the usual form of a grant of vacant lands to the grantee for cultivation and pasturage upon condition of actual possession for a number of years. Nor are there any words indicating an intention to pass a fee simple, such as found in some of the Spanish grants, para adquirir légitimo derecho de propiedad y señorio, "in order to acquire legitimate right of property and dominion." These words, propiedad y señorio, carry the idea of complete ownership, and seem to be practically the same as the words "fee simple" under the common law.

Upon the contrary, the grant in question provides that the grantees "shall hold the same with legitimate right" of possession (para que lo posean con derecho légitimo) "under this royal grant, so that they be not molested by any Spanish citizen taking their stock thereon, deeming the pasture to be common." It would seem to have been the intention of the governor by these words to vest the pueblos simply with the right to the use of the lands without intending to estop himself, or his successors, from making a subsequent disposition of the same by a grant in fee. This construction is also borne out by the fact that within a few years thereafter a grant was made of the entire tract to other parties. As remarked in the opinion of the court below, "it seems quite unreasonable to suppose that, if this area in controversy had been granted as an estate in fee to the land, the same granting authority would have deliberately granted a portion of the same land to a third party only twelve years after the former grant, repeat a like act in 1815 and afterwards, and that, too, of land situate near the capital, grazed upon by the royal horses of the capital garrison, and the local alcalde directed in every case to report officially whether the land proposed to be granted was unoccupied, or that the grant would be to the injury of third parties. This grant was prayed solely as a pasturage right; it seems to have been granted for that purpose alone, and it appears that the governor afterwards treated it as such, and disposed *of[206 the paramount title to a large part of the land upon the same view."

In the absence of direct testimony it is somewhat difficult to ascertain with precision the laws of Spain with respect to grants of pueblo lands; but in 2 White's New Recopilacion, 254, it is stated by Nicholas Garrido, apparently acting for the Duke of Alagon, in a communication addressed to the governor of Florida, that "the concession of a great extent of land for the rearing and pasture of cattle constitutes no more than the usufruct of it, for the time agreed upon, but the grantee has not, nor never had, the most remote right to solicit the proprietorship, for there is no law or regulation upon which to found it, and consequently the land does not go out of the class of public lands, since it is the same as if it were held on rent. Those who have obtained those concessions as recompense for services are in the same class with the others, and can allege no other right than what is extended to all those who have suffered losses, and faithfully followed the cause of his majesty." From the correspondence, of which this opinion was a part, and which was considered by this court in United States v. Clarke, 33 U. S. 8 Pet. 436, 459 [8: 1001, 1009], it would seem that there was a recognition by the governor and civil authorities of Florida of a distinction between absolute grants of land and "allotments of land made for raising cattle, which may not have titles of proprietorship" (2 White, New Recop. 252), the latter of which did not vest in the grantee the ownership of the lands. Certainly if a grant in these terms were made in a state in which the common law prevails, it would be treated simply as a license to pasture, terminable at the will of either party. Such information as we are able to obtain regarding the law of Spain favors a like interpretation of this grant.

The evidence of possession in this case was perfectly consistent with the grant, which on its face vested the pueblos with such possession, and besides the testimony was of such a vague and contradictory character as to throw but little light upon the nature of the occupation.

The case of United States v. Huertas, 33 U.S. 8 Pet. 475 [8: 1015], relied upon *by the [207 petitioners, seems rather to bear against them. It is said by Chief Justice Marshall, in his brief opinion, that the governor in his decree making the concession states his own knowledge of the facts set forth in the petition, namely, the many and great services rendered to the government in an insurrection. He grants the 10,000 acres with the precise condition to use the same for the purpose of raising cattle, "without having the faculty of alienating the said tract without the knowledge of this government;" but, he adds, that on the 20th of July, 1816, three years after the concession, Governor Coppinger granted a complete title to this land, reciting the decree made by Governor Kindelan, and the boundaries of the land It was this second grant which evidently fixed the title of the grantee, notwithstanding the limitations of the prior grant.

Upon the whole, we are of opinion that the court below was correct in holding that the grant in question did not vest the title to the land in the petitioners, but was a mere license to use them for pasturage, and that such license, if not revoked by the subsequent grants, was revoked by the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, ceding this entire territory to the United States (Wallis v. Harrison, 4 Mees. & W. 538; Cook v. Stearns, 11 Mass. 538; Harris v. Gillingham, 6 N. H. 9 [23 Am. Dec. 701]; Cowles v. Kidder, 24 N. H. 379 [57 Am. Dec. 287]; Blaisdell v. Portsmouth, G. F. & C. Railroad, 51 N. H. 483; Coleman v. Foster, 37 Eng. L. & Eq 489; Prince v. Case, 10 Conn. 375 [27 Am. Dec. 675]); and that in the language of § 13 of the act of March 3, 1891 (26 Stat. at L. 854, chap. 539) creating the court of private land claims, the title to the land in question was not one "lawfully and regularly derived from the government of Spain," or "one that if not then complete and perfect at the date of the acquisition of the territory by the United States, the claimant had a lawful right to make perfect, had the territory not been acquired by the United States."

The decree of the court below is therefore affirmed.

Judicial notice of Mexican laws—power of prefect—allowance of similar grants—adverse possession—length of time.

1. Judicial notice of the laws of Mexico as they existed at the time of an alleged grant of lands must be taken by the Supreme Court of the United States in determining the validity of such grant.
2. A prefect had no power to make a grant of public lands under the laws of Mexico as they existed in 1840.
3. The fact that similar grants have been confirmed by Congress, or received the approval of the Mexican authorities, is not decisive in favor of recognizing the validity of a Mexican grant.
4. Adverse possession since the acquisition of the territory by the United States from Mexico, however exclusive or notorious, cannot be regarded as an element of perfect title to Mexican land which can be confirmed by the court of private land claims, even if there could be in any case a right, as against the Mexican or Spanish government, to a grant by prescription or adverse possession.
5. Six or eight years' possession of Mexican lands prior to the date of the treaty with Mexico is insufficient, under the Spanish or Mexican laws, to constitute a title as against the sovereign.

APPEAL from a decree of the Court of Private Land Claims dismissing the petition of Manuel Crespin et al. for the confirmation of a grant in Bernalillo County, New Mexico. Affirmed.

Statement by Mr. Justice Brown:

This was a petition by Crespin and about forty others for the confirmation of what is commonly known as the San Antonito grant, situated in Bernalillo county, New Mexico, and alleged to contain 32,000 acres.

Plaintiffs claimed as the heirs and legal representatives of the original grantees, and set forth in their petition that, on March 24, 1840, the Republic of Mexico, through Antonio Sandoval, "the prefect or superior political chief of the district of Bernalillo, thereunto duly authorized by the laws, usages, customs, superior orders and decrees of the said Republic, or of its duly constituted and competent authorities," granted and delivered possession of this tract of land unto the grantees therein named; that the original grant or expediente of title remained in the office and formed a part of the archives of the said prefect, and that an official copy or testimonio was at the time delivered to the grantees as a complete and final title in fee.

That the petitioners were unable to find the original expediente, which, with a large part of the other public archives, was lost, destroyed, or stolen, and that the official copy or testimonio has also been stolen; but that, while the expediente was in the archives of the prefecture, a testimonio, or *true copy, there [209 of was made by one Rumaldo Chaves for his own use, and that such copy was prior to 1846 transferred and delivered by said Chaves, by indorsement thereon, unto Gaspar Atencio, one of the grantees of the original grant, for his uses and purposes, and has ever since remained in his possession.

The petitioners further alleged, upon information and belief, that the grant was finally confirmed and approved by Governor Manuel Armijo and the departmental assembly, and that by virtue thereof an allotment was made in severalty to each of the grantees, and juridical possession given to such grantees by José Trujillo, in accordance with the decree of the prefect and the laws then competent and in force in said territory, and that the grantees since then have been in open and notorious possession of the tract. The remaining allegations of the petition are immaterial.

Upon the trial of the case plaintiffs offered in evidence a petition addressed to "Señor Prefect Don Antonio Sandoval" by "Juan José Garcia and Gaspar Atencio, residents of the demarcation of Albuquerque," stating that they and their constituents, finding themselves without tillable land by which to subsist, "and there being back of the Sandia mountain a tract of land called San Antonito, the fertility of which and the increase of whose waters all invite its cultivation, by this means the commendable promotion of agriculture and the progressive benefit of the petitioners will be accomplished," they inform the prefect "that it is fifteen years, a little more or less, since this tract was donated to Cristobal Jaramillo, deceased; yet, moreover, in all this space of time, said land has not been cultivated at all, and if this has been forfeited in accordance with our laws, we humbly beg your honor to be pleased to grant us what we ask, as it is without prejudice to a third party."

In compliance with this petition, the prefect, signing himself simply "Sandoval," made an order, under date of March 21, 1840, that the petition be transmitted to the justice of the peace of Los Ranchos to report in detail the nature of the land and the need of the petitioners.

210] *On the following day, José Trujillo, the justice, filed his report, stating that, after having fully informed himself as to the nature of the lands, "it is fitted for agriculture, very pleasing and very delightful for a life of tranquillity, very favorable to everything for a most comfortable living," and that the petitioners are in need of landed property, with the exception of three persons named, who are known to have land, but do not count upon it because they are in debt and have it secured by said lands, and that all the others have not such property.

Upon this report Sandoval made the following decree:

Barelas, Mar. 24, 1840.

One of the most commendable and beneficial things to a people being the promotion of agriculture, let this petition be transmitted to the justice of the peace of Los Ranchos, in order that with all the customary formalities he give the possession solicited by the parties in interest, without prejudice to a third party, and only for cultivation, the lands necessary, leaving free the pastures and watering places, which under no circumstances ought to be interfered with; and after this is done he shall make a full report to this prefecture.

Sandoval.

Francisco Sarracino, Secretary.

In compliance with this decree, Trujillo, justice of the peace, reported that he had given juridical possession of the lands to the petitioners and their associates to the number of twenty-seven, who were each given 100 varas, except two of the petitioners, who were given 150, in the usual form of livery of seisin under Spanish grants.

The testimonio, or official copy, of these papers, was not made by the secretary of the prefect Sandoval, but by Rumaldo Chaves, the clerk of the justice of the peace Trujillo, and seems to have been made for the personal use of Chaves, and afterwards transferred by indorsement to Gaspar Atencio, who appears, from the document, to have been one of the leading petitioners, and received, according to the allotment, 150 varas.

*Plaintiffs next offered in evidence the[211 following hijuela, or certificate of allotment, executed April 11, 1840, by José Trujillo, purporting to show an allotment of 100 varas of land at San Antonito to Vicente Samora under the decree of the prefect Sandoval:

The citizen José Trujillo, justice of the peace of the jurisdiction of los ranchos de Albuquerque, does hereby certify in form of law that 100 varas of land at San Antonito were donated to Vicente Samora in accordance with and as stated in the general grant made by me, the said justice of the peace, by virtue of the decree of March 24th made by the prefect Don Antonio Sandoval. The foregoing certificate is given at the ranchos this 11th day of April, 1840, I signing it with my two attending witnesses, to which I certify.

José Trujillo [rubric.]

Attending witness:
Rumaldo Chavez. [rubric.]
Attending witness:
Pablo Roman Sisneros. [rubric.]

Plaintiffs further offered to refer to other cases and documents for the purpose of showing that other grants had been made by prefects, which were recognized and confirmed by the proper Mexican authorities, and, also, that several of such grants had been confirmed by the Congress of the United States.

These documents were all objected to by the government, and were admitted subject to these objections. Some further explanatory oral testimony was introduced in support of petitioners' claim, but no evidence was offered on behalf of the government.

Upon this state of facts, the court delivered judgment, dismissing the petition and rejecting the grant, whereupon the plaintiffs appealed to this court.

Mr. Henry M. Earle for appellants.

Messrs. Matthew G. Reynolds, Special Assistant to the Attorney General, and John K. Richards, Solicitor General, for appellee.

Mr. Justice Brown delivered the opinion of the court:

The principal question urged upon the attention of the court in this case is whether, under the laws of Mexico as they existed in 1840, it was within the power of a prefect to make a grant of public lands.

In endeavoring to ascertain what were the laws of Mexico at any particular time, of which we are bound to take judicial notice (Fremont v. United States, 58 U. S. 17 How. 542, 557 [15: 241, 245]; Romero v. United States, 68 U. S. 1 Wall. 721 [17: 627]), we are somewhat embarrassed by the frequency with which the government was changed—usually by revolutionary violence—between the time the Republic gained its independence in 1821 and the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo in 1848, under which the northern provinces of Mexico were ceded to the United States. These changes were sometimes accompanied by decrees annulling the acts of previous governments, canceling grants, and putting new regulations in force with respect to the disposition of public lands. That these difficulties are of long standing is evident from the comments of Chief Justice Marshall in the case of Soulard v. United States, 29 U. S. 4 Pet. 511 [7: 938], in which the court announced itself as unable to form a satisfactory judgment by reason of its inability to obtain proper information with regard to the laws and principles upon which the transfer of Spanish titles depended, and therefore postponed the final disposition of the case until such information could be obtained.

In view of this and similar difficulties, this court, as early as 1832, in United States v. Arredondo, 31 U. S. 6 Pet. 691 [8: 547], laid down as a general proposition that the grant itself was prima facie evidence of its own validity, and that it would be presumed to have been regularly issued until the contrary appeared, or such reasons were offered for doubting its authenticity as were sufficient in law to [213] rebut the legal presumption. *To the same effect are United States v. Clarke, 33 U. S. 8 Pet. 436 [8: 1001]; and United States v. Percheman, 32 U. S. 7 Pet. 51 [8: 604]; Strother v. Lucas, 37 U. S. 12 Pet. 410, 437 [9: 1137, 1147]; Reynolds v. West, 1 Cal. 322, 326; Jones v. Garza, 11 Tex. 186, 207.

The courts of California have carried this principle so far as to hold, though apparently with some fluctuation of opinion, that a grant of a pueblo lot made by an alcalde raises a presumption that the alcalde was a properly qualified officer, that he had authority to make the grant, and that the land was within the boundaries of the pueblo. Reynolds v. West, 1 Cal. 322; Cohas v. Raisin, 3 Cal. 443; Hart v. Burnett, 15 Cal. 530; Payne v. Treadwell, 16 Cal. 220; Leese v. Clark, 18 Cal. 535; Donner v. Palmer, 31 Cal. 500.

In considering their methods of disposing of public lands, this court has had frequent occasion to uphold the validity of grants made by the governors of the Spanish and Mexican provinces, who appear to have been sometimes also called "political chiefs." Indeed, under the regulations for the colonization of the Mexican territories of November 21, 1828, the political chiefs were expressly authorized to grant the public lands of their respective territories. Reynolds's Land Laws, 141; United States v. Workman, 68 U. S. 1 Wall. 745 761 [17: 705, 710]; Hornsby v. United States, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 224, 231 [19: 900]; Vanderslice v. Hanks, 3 Cal. 27; Leese v. Clark, 3 Cal. 17; Same v. Same, 18 Cal. 535, 546. But see Jones v. Garza, 11 Tex. 186. A similar power seems also to have been vested in the Spanish intendants. Reynolds's Land Laws, 59, 60; United States v. Clarke, 33 U. S. 8 Pet. 436, 452 [8: 1001, 1007].

Prefects were functionaries well known in the Roman law, and under the Empire were clothed with extensive powers, both judicial and administrative. With the decline of the empire they seem to have lost their importance and to have finally disappeared; but, after remaining in abeyance for some hundreds of years after its fall, the office was revived in the eighth year of the French Republic (1800), and bestowed upon the heads of the departments into which the country had been divided by the national assembly in 1790. In the performance *of their duties they were [214] aided by a council of prefecture. The prefect was charged with the administration of local affairs, and was practically the representative of the central government in public matters. The title was carried into several states whose legislation was framed upon the model of the Code Napoleon, but, until the establishment of the Republic, was apparently unknown in Mexico. It seems to have been recognized, however, prior to 1836, since by the constitutional law or decree of December 29 of that year, defining the powers of the president and governors, there was given to the latter the authority "to appoint the prefects, to approve the appointment of the subprefects of the department, to confirm that of the justices of the peace, and to remove any of these officials." Reynolds's Land Laws, 205.

By the law of March 20, 1837, for regulating provisionally the interior governments of the departments, it is provided, by article 1, that "the interior government of the departments shall be in charge of the governors, departmental councils (juntas), prefects, subprefects, common councils, alcaldes, and justices of the peace;" that it shall be the duty of the governors to appoint the prefects, etc. The power of the prefects is thus defined: Art. 77: "They shall regulate administratively and in conformity with the laws the distribution of the common lands (tierras comunes) in the towns of the district, provided there is no litigation pending with regard to them, the right being reserved to the parties in interest to apply to the governor, who, without further appeal, shall decide what is most proper, with the concurrence of the departmental council (junta)." Reynolds's Land Laws, 221. This is the only act to which our attention is called which defines their functions.

It is difficult to say exactly what is meant by the power "to regulate administratively" the distribution of the common lands in the towns of the district. But it would not seem to include the power to make grants of public lands generally, though it might have justified in this case the special allotment (hiyuela) to Vicente Samora, had it been made by the prefect. The power given to the governor to make *grants of public lands, which was ex- [215] pressly given by the regulations of November 21, 1828 (though the constitutional decrees of 1836 and 1837 were silent upon the subject), taken in connection with the limited powers conferred upon the prefects by the law of March 20, 1837, apparently preclude the idea that the more general power of granting public lands was intended to be conferred upon the latter—in other words, the limited authority conferred upon them by article 77 repels the inference of more extensive powers which had theretofore been vested in the governors, and in the governors alone.

Plaintiffs' counsel offered to show in this connection that other grants had been made by prefects, which had been recognized and confirmed by the proper Mexican authorities, and that several such grants had been confirmed by the Congress of the United States; but they were not regarded by the court below as sufficient to establish a general custom to recognize grants made by prefects as valid and legal. Indeed, the power given to prefects to regulate administratively the distribution of the common lands would seem to presuppose a prior grant to the pueblo, made by a higher authority, and to have been intended merely to authorize the prefect to make distribution of such common lands among the inhabitants of the pueblo.

The only case we have been able to find in which the power of prefects to make grants of public lands is discussed is that of Ohm v. San Francisco, 92 Cal. 437. In that case the complaint alleged that the state of California was, prior to July 13, 1848, a political department of the Republic of Mexico, and was subdivided into pueblos, constituting political municipalities, supplied with such officials as the Republic or governor chose to appoint; that such officers could grant and distribute lands of the municipalities; that the pueblo of Yerba Buena, or San Francisco, was one of such municipalities, and was provided with a prefect appointed by the Republic and the governor of California who was empowered, among other things, to make a grant and distribution of lands to private persons in fee within his district and said municipality. It seems that [216 the grant in this case had been *approved by the governor of the department by virtue of his superior power to grant vacant lots within the boundaries of the Republic, and had been subsequently confirmed by the district court.

The rarity of the question involved, and the special familiarity of the supreme court of California with Spanish and Mexican land grants, will justify a somewhat lengthy transcription from its opinion concerning the power of prefects: "We cannot find," said the court on page 451, "in any of the laws or ordinances of Spain and Mexico to which we have been referred, any authority conferred upon prefects to make grants in fee of the pueblo lands. It is not contained in the decree of the Spanish Cortes of January 4, 1813; nor in the plan of Piric; nor in the Mexican law of colonization of 1824; nor in the regulations of 1828; nor, we think, in the law of March 20, 1837, to which the prefect himself refers as the source of his authority. The clause of this act cited and relied on by the appellant is given in the original Spanish and in translation at page 314, addenda, Dwinelle's Colonial History of San Francisco. In terms it merely authorizes the prefects in their respective districts to 'regulate executively' the distribution of the common lands of the pueblos, provided there are no law suits pending in the courts concerning them, saving a right of appeal to the governor. The law writers do not agree in their construction of this article. Dwinelle thinks it conferred authority to make grants of the pueblo lands for the pueblo. Halleck thinks that it merely conferred a power to regulate the temporary use of the common lands. This court has decided that it did not expressly confer power to grant lands in private ownership. Hart v. Burnett, 15 Cal. 572. As a matter of history it is known that the prefects very rarely attempted to exercise such power,—not more than two or three instances, including this grant to Scherrebeck, appearing in the records of San Francisco, and one of those subsequent to the conquest, by Horace Hawes. It is also well known as a fact and as matter of law that the claim of such power by the prefects has been repudiated by the city from the beginning. The complaint here shows that the validity *of this Scherrebeck grant was denied [217 by the city as early as 1853, and ever since. The Van Ness ordinance, passed in 1855, and ratified by the legislature in 1858, practically confirmed all previous grants of pueblo lands made by any ayuntamiento, town council, alcalde, or justice of the peace of the former pueblo or of the city, but was entirely silent as to grants by prefects. Even the allegations of the complaint do not show that the prefect had power as agent, and acting in behalf of the pueblo, to alienate its lands in fee. He is said to have authority to make grant and distribution of lands within the pueblo limits, but this power may have been derived from the departmental authorities, and exercised independently and against the will of the municipal authorities. And this appears to have been the case with the Scherrebeck claim. The making of the grant was opposed by the alcalde, the only municipal officer who appears to have had anything to do with it; but it was approved by the governor and the superior authorities."

In the case under consideration there was no evidence that the grant of the prefect ever received the sanction or approval of the governor, the ayuntamiento (town council), or other superior authority of the Mexican Republic; and we do not think the fact that similar grants may have been confirmed by Congress, or received the approval of the Mexican authorities, is decisive in favor of recognizing its validity. In its adjudication of these cases, the court of private land claims is subject to certain statutory restrictions upon which previous confirmations by Congress of imperfect grants have no proper bearing. Rio Arriba Land & C. Co. v. United States, 167 U. S. 298, 308 [42: 175, 178]. We are of opinion that it was beyond the power of the prefect to make the grant in question.

Nor do we think that petitioners are entitled to this grant by prescription or adverse possession, since under § 13 of the act creating the court of private land claims the title to the land must have been "lawfully and regularly derived from the government of Spain or Mexico," and one which, if not complete and perfect at the date of the acquisition of the property by the United States, "the claimant would *have had a lawful right to make perfect [218 had the territory not been acquired by the United States." This would preclude the idea that possession since the date of the treaty, however exclusive and notorious, could be regarded as an element going to make up a perfect title. There was no evidence of more than six or eight years' possession prior to the date of the treaty, and this, under any construction of the Spanish or Mexican laws, would be insufficient to constitute a title as against the sovereign. Indeed, it may be open to doubt whether under the legislation of Mexico public lands are not imprescriptible; but if it be otherwise, it would seem that under the decree of the King of Spain of July 16, 1819, nothing less than a possession of forty years could be deemed or respected as creating title by adverse possession. 2 White's New Recopilacion, 562.

The disposition we have made of this case renders it unnecessary to consider whether the document offered in evidence to establish the plaintiffs' title, which was neither the expediente, nor the testimonio, or official copy, thereof —and was merely an unsworn and unverified copy of the testimonio—was admissible at all.

If there be any hardship to the petitioners in the rejection of this grant, they must apply for relief to another department of the government. We are bound by the language of the act creating the court of private land claims. Its decree in this case was correct, and it is therefore affirmed.

Former adopted citizen of Indian nation, rights of—when may sue in United States court.

1. The withdrawal of the adoption of a citizen by an Indian nation, by a statute expressly repealing and annulling the grant of citizenship, is sufficient to destroy all personal rights founded on the mere status created by the grant of citizenship.

2. A former member of an Indian nation, who is still a resident of the Indian territory and a citizen of the United States, but no longer a member of the Indian nation, may sue a member of that nation in the United States court for that territory.

IN ERROR to the United States Court for the Indian Territory on a certificate as to the jurisdiction of that court to review a judgment of that court sustaining a plea to its jurisdiction in an action brought by A. B. Roff, plaintiff, against Louisa Burney, administratrix, etc. Reversed, and case remanded with instructions to overrule the plea to the jurisdiction.

Statement by Mr. Justice Brewer:

*This case comes from the United States [219 court for the Indian territory on a certificate as to jurisdiction. The amended complaint filed in that court November 6, 1893, besides stating a cause of action in favor of the plaintiff against the defendant, alleges the following facts bearing on the question of jurisdiction: That the plaintiff is a natural-born citizen of the United States of America; has never renounced his allegiance to said government, and has never taken an oath of allegiance to any foreign government of any kind whatever; that he has ever been and is yet a citizen of the United States; that the legislature of the Chickasaw nation, on October 7, 1876, passed the following act:

"Sec. 1. Be it enacted by the legislature of the Chickasaw nation, That the right of citizenship is hereby granted to the following-named children and nephews of William H. Bourland: Amanda, Matilda, Gordentia, and Run Hannah."

That by this act, which was simply a confirmation of a prior statute, passed in 1857, the parties named therein became adopted citizens of the Chickasaw nation; that he was duly and legally married to one of the parties named therein, to wit, Matilda Bourland, while she was such adopted citizen; that thereafter, and on October 11, 1883, the legislature of the Chickasaw nation passed another act, as follows:

"Sec. 1. Be it enacted by the legislature of the Chickasaw nation, That the right of citizenship granted to the following named children and nephews of W. H. Bourland, Amanda, Matilda, Gordentia, and Run Hannah, approved October 7, 1876, the same is hereby repealed and annulled.

"Sec. 2. Be it further enacted, That the governor is hereby directed and required to remove said parties and their descendants beyond the limits of this nation, and that this act take effect from and after its passage."

And that since the passage of the last-named act the Chickasaw government and all the officials thereof have refused to recognize this plaintiff as a member of the Chickasaw tribe, or a citizen of said Chickasaw nation, and that the courts of that nation have refused to entertain jurisdiction of any controversy between him and any member of the tribe of *Chickasaw Indians, and still refuse to [220 entertain jurisdiction of such controversies.

tween the United States and the Choctaw and Chickasaw tribes (11 Stat. at L. 612) is as follows:

"So far as may be compatible with the Constitution of the United States and the laws made in pursuance thereof, regulating trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes, the Choctaws and Chickasaws shall be secured in the unrestricted right of self-government, and full jurisdiction, over persons and property, within their respective limits; excepting, however, all persons with their property, who are not by birth, adoption, or otherwise citizens or members of either the Choctaw or Chickasaw tribe."

Article 38 of the treaty with the same tribes, of date April 28, 1866, provides (14 Stat. at L. 95):

"Every white person who, having married a Choctaw or Chickasaw, resides in the said Choctaw or Chickasaw nation, or who has been adopted by the legislative authorities, is to be deemed a member of said nation, and shall be subject to the laws of the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations according to his domicil, and to prosecution and trial before their tribunals, and to punishment according to their laws in all respects as though he was a native Choctaw or Chickasaw."

Section 6 of the act creating the United States court in the Indian territory, approved March 1, 1889 (25 Stat. at L. 784, chap. 333), reads:

"That the court hereby established shall have jurisdiction in all civil cases between citizens of the United States who are residents of the Indian territory, or between citizens of the United States, or of any state or territory therein, and any citizen of or person or persons residing or found in the Indian territory, and when the value of the thing in controversy, or damages or money claimed, shall amount to $100 or more: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to give the court jurisdiction over controversies between persons of Indian blood only."

221] *This was amended by the act of May 2, 1890, which, in § 30 (26 Stat. at L. 94), contains this proviso:

"Provided, however, That the judicial tribunals of the Indian nations shall retain exclusive jurisdiction in all civil and criminal cases arising in the country in which members of the nation by nativity or by adoption shall be the only parties."

And in § 31 (p. 96) it was also provided:

"But nothing in this act shall be so construed as to deprive any of the courts of the civilized nations of exclusive jurisdiction over all cases arising wherein members of said nations, whether by treaty, blood, or adoption, are the sole parties, nor so as to interfere with the right and power of said civilized nations to punish said members for violation of the statutes and laws enacted by their national councils where such laws are not contrary to the treaties and laws of the United States."

Mr. C. L. Herbert for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. H. C. Potterf and W. F. Bowman for defendant in error.

Mr. Justice Brewer delivered the opinion of the court:

The condition of the Indians and Indian tribes within the limits of the United States is anomalous. The tribes, though in certain respects regarded as possessing the attributes of nationality, are held to be not foreign, but domestic dependent nations. Cherokee Nation v. Georgia, 30 U. S. 5 Pet. 1 [8: 25]; Worcester v. Georgia, 31 U. S. 6 Pet. 515 [8: 483]; Choctaw Nation v. United States, 119 U. S. 1 [30: 306]; Cherokee Nation v. Kansas Railway Company, 135 U. S. 641 [34: 295]. While the Indians and the territory which may have been specially set apart for their use are subject to the jurisdiction of the United States, and Congress may pass such laws as it sees fit prescribing the rules governing the intercourse *of the Indians with one another [222 and with citizens of the United States, and also the courts in which all controversies to which an Indian may be a party shall be submitted (United States v. Rogers, 45 U. S. 4 How. 567 [11: 1105]; United States v. Kagama, 118 U. S. 375 [30: 228]; Gon-shay-ee, Petitioner, 130 U. S. 343 [32: 973]; Cherokee Nation v. Kansas Railway Company, supra), the mere fact that a citizen of the United States has become a member of an Indian tribe by adoption may not necessarily cancel his citizenship. As said by Chief Justice Taney, in United States v. Rogers, supra (573 [11: 1107]), "whatever obligations the prisoner may have taken upon himself by becoming a Cherokee by adoption, his responsibility to the laws of the United States remained unchanged and undiminished." Indeed, by § 43 of chap. 182, 26 Stat. at L. 99, provision is made for the naturalization of members of the Indian tribes in the Indian territory, with a proviso "that the Indians who become citizens of the United States under the provisions of this act do not forfeit or lose any rights or privileges they enjoy or are entitled to as members of the tribe or nation to which they belong."

Now, according to this complaint, plaintiff was a citizen of the United States. Matilda Bourland was not a Chickasaw by blood, but one upon whom the right of Chickasaw citizenship had been conferred by an act of the Chickasaw legislature. The citizenship which the Chickasaw legislature could confer it could withdraw. The only restriction on the power of the Chickasaw nation to legislate in respect to its internal affairs is that such legislation shall not conflict with the Constitution or laws of the United States, and we know of no provision of such Constitution or laws which would be set at naught by the action of a political community like this in withdrawing privileges of membership in the community once conferred. The Chickasaw legislature, by the second act, whose meaning is clear, though its phraseology may not be beyond criticism, not only repealed the prior act, but canceled the rights of citizenship granted thereby, and further directed the governor to remove the parties named therein and their descendants beyond the limits of the nation. This act was *not one simply taking effect [223 as of the date of its passage, and then withdrawing rights admitted to have been theretofore legally granted, but was retroactive in its scope, and purported to annul and destroy all that had ever been attempted to be done in respect to the matter. Whether any rights of property could be taken away by such subsequent act need not be considered. It is enough to hold that all personal rights founded on the mere status created by the prior act fell when that status was destroyed. Plaintiff never took any oath of allegiance to the Chickasaw nation; never in terms relinquished his full rights as a citizen of the United States. Doubtless, by intermarriage with one who was at the time by legislative act a Chickasaw citizen, he acquired the rights and privileges of a member of that tribe or nation, but when that which was the foundation upon which such acquisition rested was taken away by act of the nation, then all those rights and privileges ceased. The tie which bound him to the nation was his wife's citizenship. That tie the nation destroyed. Its destruction released him. That such was the effect of this legislative act is established by the conduct of the Chickasaw government and all its officials, for they have refused to recognize plaintiff as any longer a member of the Chickasaw nation, and the courts of that nation have declined to entertain jurisdiction of any suits brought by him against a Chickasaw. The validity of the act withdrawing citizenship from the wife of plaintiff, and the consequent withdrawal from plaintiff of all the rights and privileges of citizenship in the Chickasaw nation, has been practically determined by the authorities of that nation, and that determination is not subject to correction by any direct appeal from the judgment of the Chickasaw courts. It follows, therefore, that his right as a citizen of the United States to appeal to the Federal courts to take jurisdiction of his claims against one of the Chickasaw nation must be sustained, for it cannot be that a citizen of the United States residing in the Chickasaw nation can be wronged without an opportunity of redress in some judicial tribunal. We are of opinion, therefore, that the plea to the juris-224]diction was wrongfully sustained, and the judgment of the United States Court for the Indian Territory will be reversed, and the case remanded, with instructions to overrule the plea to the jurisdiction.

JAMES C. ARMSTRONG, William Driver, et al.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 224–241.)

Separate interests of claimant cannot be united to give jurisdiction—consent of property owners to street improvement—equitable relief against void assessments—cloud on title—statutory remedy—when not exclusive.

1. The distinct and separate interests of claimants in a suit for relief against assessments cannot be united for the purpose of making up the amount necessary to give this court jurisdiction on appeal.
2. The fact of consent by the requisite number of property owners, to be manifested by failure to object, is jurisdictional and in the nature of a condition precedent to the exercise of the power to levy taxes for a street improvement, under Utah Sess. Laws 1890, chap. 41.
3. Equitable jurisdiction for relief against void assessments for paving, to be collected in ten annual instalments, may be invoked where there is no plain and adequate remedy by certiorari and it is necessary to prevent a multiplicity of suits, as well as to relieve the property owners from a cloud upon their title.
4. Relief against an existing or imminent cloud on title, although it is created by a void assessment, may be granted where the illegality or fatal defect does not appear on the face of the record but must be shown by evidence aliunde which may possibly be lost, or when a deed given on a sale for the taxes would be presumptive evidence of good title in the purchaser.
5. The exclusiveness of a statutory remedy against irregular assessments does not extend to an assessment that is entirely void, under a statute which leaves questions of a jurisdictional character open to judicial inquiry.
6. The exclusiveness of a remedy for recovering back payments of illegal, inequitable, and unjust special taxes or assessments, under Utah Sess. Laws 1890, § 1, p. 38, does not extend to the case of a tax which is wholly void and illegal.

APPEAL from a decree of the Supreme Court of the Territory of Utah affirming the decree of the Fourth Judicial District Court of that Territory in favor of the plaintiffs, James C. Armstrong et al., in an action brought by them against Ogden City, a municipal corporation, restraining the city and its officers from levying assessments upon the property of the plaintiffs and others similarly situated for the purpose of paving a street in that city. Affirmed as to one appellee, and as to the other appellees, dismissed.

See same case below, 12 Utah, 476.

Statement by Mr. Justice Shiras:

The original bill in this case was filed in May, 1892, in the fourth judicial district court of the late territory of Utah, against Ogden City, a municipal corporation, and its mayor and the members of its common council; and it was thereby sought to restrain the city and its officers from levying assessments upon the real estate of the plaintiffs and others similarly *situated, for the purpose of paving a [225 portion of one of the streets of the city.

To this bill a demurrer was filed, which was sustained by the district court, and a judgment was entered dismissing the bill. On appeal to the supreme court of the territory that judgment was reversed, and the cause remanded to the court below. An answer to the bill was then filed, denying substantially the equities of the bill. Subsequently, on April 9, 1894, a supplemental bill was filed, bringing in additional parties complainant, and alleging that since the filing of the original bill the defendants had passed the ordinance assessing the properties of the plaintiffs, and were about to expose to sale the real estate described in the original and supplemental bills to satisfy the assessments, and threatened to continue to sell said real estate annually for ten years as each instalment of said assessment became due, whereby the plaintiffs had been compelled to pay certain amounts, stated in detail, in order to prevent a sale of their property, and to prevent a cloud upon their titles; and that certain real estate belonging to some of the plaintiffs had been sold by the city to satisfy the illegal assessments. The prayers were for a decree declaring the ordinance and assessments to be void, restraining the defendants from proceeding thereunder; that an account be ordered of the amounts paid by plaintiffs under protest; that plaintiffs have judgment for the same; that the sales of real estate be set aside, and for general relief. An answer was filed to the supplemental bill denying specifically all of its allegations, but admitting that the ordinance in question was passed as alleged. It alleged affirmatively that the plaintiffs were estopped to complain as in the supplemental bill alleged; that the same did not state facts

When a court of equity will restrain the collection of a tax; equitable relief against illegal taxation.

An action for an injunction will not lie to restrain the collection of a tax upon an illegal assessment, where there is a remedy to review and correct the assessment by certiorari, or to strike it from the roll by mandamus. Mutual Ben. L. Assur. Co. v. New York Supers. 3 Abb. App. Dec. 344, 2 Abb. Pr. N. S. 233, 32 How. Pr. 359, 3 Keyes, 182, Affirming 33 Barb. 322, 20 How. Pr. 416, and also Affirming 8 Bosw. 683.

Equity will not restrain the execution of a deed of land sold for taxes on the ground that the proceedings were irregular, or even void in some particulars. Thus, an error consisting in a misnomer of the defendant corporation on the assessment books will not authorize the relief. Nor will the fact that property subject to taxation has not been listed warrant the interference. Warden v. Fond du Lac County Supers. 14 Wis. 618; Kellogg v. Oshkosh, 14 Wis. 624; O'Neal v. Virginia & M. Bridge Co. 18 Md. 1, 79 Am. Dec. 669; Exchange Bank v. Hines, 3 Ohio St. 1.

In a case of mere noncompliance with some particular direction of the statute, aside from which the tax is sufficiently regular, or where the irregularities relate only to the time in which the different steps were taken, and do not affect the principle of taxation or the groundwork of the proceedings, relief in equity will not be allowed, such irregularities being regarded as merely technical defects, which, while they can never be wholly avoided, do not go to the merits of the proceedings. Mills v. Gleason, 11 Wis. 470, 78 Am. Dec. 721; Mills v. Johnson, 17 Wis. 599.

Nor will alleged irregularities in the sale of lands for taxes afford ground for the interference of equity to restrain the purchaser from afterward selling the same lands, the two sales being entirely independent of and distinct from each other. St. Louis v. Goode, 21 Mo. 216

Where an act of legislature, held by the court to be constitutional, exempted certain property from taxation, an injunction has been allowed against the enforcement of a tax upon such property. Illinois C. R. Co. v. McLean County, 17 Ill. 291.

An act of legislature whose terms authorize a transfer or sale of the taxing power of the state with reference to certain corporations, releasing them on certain conditions from further taxation, being held unconstitutional, its enforcement may be enjoined. Mott v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 30 Pa. 9, 72 Am. Dec. 664.

Fraud has been held a sufficient ground to warrant a court of equity in a departure from the general rule of noninterference with the collection of taxes. Thus, where an assessor, after having accepted without objection a list of taxable property, afterward and without notice arbitrarily increases the list, the taxpayer having no knowledge of the matter until after the time for redress at law has expired by limitation, the collection of the tax may be enjoined. Cleghorn v. Postlewaite, 43 Ill. 428.

Equitable relief has also been allowed against the enforcement of a tax imposed for the payment of judgments obtained through fraud and collusion. Newcomb v. Horton County, 18 Wis. 566.

But equity will not interpose to restrain the collection of a tax for the payment of judgments rendered against a municipal corporation, on the ground that the bonds on which the judgments were founded were without consideration, and were obtained by fraud, where such defense might have been pleaded to the action at law. Muscatine v. Mississippi & M. R. Co. 1 Dill. 536.

Where an assessment of personal property has been reduced by a town board of revision, and afterward raised to the original amount by a county board of supervisors without notice of their intended action to the property owner, the tax is regarded to the extent thus increased as an unauthorized assessment by persons having no authority, and as such it may be enjoined. Darling v. Gunn, 50 Ill. 424.

In general, courts of equity will not interfere with the collection of taxes because of mistakes in judgment on the part of the officers assessing the tax, if they have acted fairly and impartially, and where they are not charged with bad faith. LeRoy v. New York, 4 Johns. Ch. 352.

But an exception to this rule has been allowed where, under a mistake as to the place where the personal property of a railroad was to be taxed, its capital stock was taxed in a wrong locality, and in such case an injunction has been granted. Mohawk & H. R. Co. v. Clute, 4 Paige, 384.

But in no case will the collection of a tax be enjoined where it is not shown that the injury resulting from its enforcement would be irreparable, and this fact must appear in the bill by issuable averments. Ritter v. Patch, 12 Cal. 298.

He who would have equity must himself do equity, and where complainant has not paid that portion of the tax which is clearly valid, to which no objection is offered and which can easily be distinguished from the illegal, the injunction will be denied, since the collection of a legal tax will not be restrained to prevent the enforcement of an illegal one. Hersey v. Milwaukee County Supers. 16 Wis. 186, 82 Am. Dec. 713; Bond v. Kenosha, 17 Wis. 284; Mills v. Johnson, 17 Wis. 599; Howes v. Racine, 21 Wis. 515; Palmer v. Napoleon Twp. 16 Mich. 176; Taylor v. Thompson, 42 Ill. 10; Montgomery County Comrs. v. Elston, 32 Ind. 27, 2 Am. Rep. 327.

Where one has assented to the levying of a tax, either by directly petitioning that it be assessed for certain purposes, or by standing idly by and failing to avail himself of the remedy provided by law for questioning the regularity of the proceedings, he is estopped from obtaining relief in equity, even sufficient to constitute a supplemental complaint; that the cause of action was barred by the statute of limitations; that there was a misjoinder of parties plaintiff, and that there was a misjoinder of causes of action.

On the 27th day of October, 1894, findings were signed, and judgment entered, giving the plaintiffs the relief prayed for in both the original and the supplemental bill. The decree 226]of *the court below was on appeal affirmed by the supreme court of the territory, from whose decree an appeal was taken and allowed to this court.

The findings of fact were as follows:

1. That the plaintiffs were at the date of the filing of the complaint in this action residents and taxpayers in Ogden City, Weber county, Utah territory, and brought this action concerning a matter of general interest in all taxpayers in said Ogden City on their own behalf and on the behalf of all others similarly situated.

2. That the defendants, except Ogden City, at the time of the bringing of this action were the mayor and members of the common council of said Ogden City, defendant.

3. That on the 7th day of March, 1892, proceedings were had by the common council of said Ogden City as follows:

"Finance committee recommending immediate creation of three paving districts as follows: District No. 2, Twenty fifth street though the proceedings were absolutely null and void. Kellogg v. Ely, 15 Ohio St. 64; Jackson v. Detroit, 10 Mich. 248; Weber v. San Francisco, 1 Cal. 455; Peoria v. Kidder, 26 Ill. 351.

The owner of city lots, who, with full notice of all the proceedings, encourages contractors to go on with the grading of a street and assures them that they shall be paid, is estopped from invoking the aid of equity to enjoin the collection of a special tax upon his lots to pay for such grading. Sleeper v. Bullen, 6 Kan. 300.

A court of equity is not a court of errors to review the acts of public officers in the assessment and collection of taxes, nor will it revise their decision upon matters within their discretion if they have acted honestly. Livingston v. Hollenbeck, 4 Barb. 9; Clinton School District's Appeal, 56 Pa. 315; O'Neal v. Virginia & M. Bridge Co. 18 Md. 1, 79 Am. Dec. 669; Heywood v. Buffalo, 14 N. Y. 534; Brooklyn v. Meserole, 26 Wend. 132.

So, where a particular manner is provided by law, or a particular tribunal designated, for the settlement and decision of all errors or inequalities on behalf of persons dissatisfied with a tax, they must avail themselves of the legal remedy thus prescribed, and will not be allowed to waive such relief and seek in equity to enjoin the collection of the tax. Hughes v. Kline, 30 Pa. 227; Maeklot v. Davenport, 17 Iowa, 379; Merrill v. Gorham, 6 Cal. 41; Peoria v. Kidder, 26 Ill. 351.

But an exception has been allowed to the rule where the grievanee complained of consisted in the mode and form of the collection of the tax rather than in the rate or assessment, and where no remedy is provided by law for such improper mode and form of collection an injunction may be allowed. Miller v. Gorman, 38 Pa. 309.

And where the bill seeks to restrain a taxing officer from selling personal property for taxes, and complainants show the exact damage in dollars and cents which they would sustain by reason of the sale, an injunction will not be allowed, the proper remedy being at law. Conley v. Chedic, 6 Nev. 222.

The most generally recognized exception to the rule that equity will not interfere with the collection of the revenue because of defects or illegalities in the proceedings is in cases where the proceedings if not enjoined would result in clouding the title to real estate. Thus, where the defect is not merely a formal one, but works a substantial injury to complainant's rights, resulting in a cloud upon his title, the injunction will be granted. Mitchell v. Milwaukee, 18 Wis. 93; Crane v. Janesville, 20 Wis. 305; Heywood v. Buffalo, 14 N. Y. 534; Mutual Ben. L. Ins. Co. v. New York Supers. 33 Barb. 322; Morris Canal & Bkg. Co. v. Jersey City, 12 N. J. Eq. 227; Siegel v. Outagamie County Supers. 26 Wis. 70.

And where the proceedings sought to be set aside are valid upon their face, and extrinsic facts are necessary to be proved to show their invalidity or illegality, equity will interfere to prevent a cloud upon title. Dean v. Madison, 9 Wis. 402; Heywood v. Buffalo, 14 N. Y. 534.

So, where two lots have been assessed together as the property of a person owning but one of them, and a gross tax has been imposed upon the two, the case is regarded as falling within the exception, and the injunction may be allowed. Crane v. Janesville, 20 Wis. 305.

Where the relief is sought to prevent a cloud upon title it will only be granted in those cases where the illegality or irregularity complained of exists dehors the record. And where the objection to the validity of the tax or assessment appears upon the face of the tax proceedings, or upon the face of the proceedings by which alone the adverse party can claim title to the land sold for the unpaid tax, equity will not enjoin. Van Rensselaer v. Kidd, 4 Barb. 17; Bouton v. Brooklyn, 15 Barb. 393; Robinson v. Gaar, 6 Cal. 275; Bucknall v. Story, 36 Cal. 67; Van Doren v. New York, 9 Paige, 388; Dean v. Madison, 9 Wis. 402; Wiggin v. New York, 9 Paige, 17.

But where by statute a tax deed is made prima facie evidence of the regularity of all the proceedings incident to the assessment and sale, if the tax has been imposed contrary to law, such a cloud upon the title will result as to warrant the interference of equity. Palmer v. Rich, 12 Mich. 414; Jenkins v. Rock County Supers. 15 Wis. 11.

Mere vagueness, however, or inaccuracy in the description of land to be sold for taxes, is not sufficient to warrant an injunction against the sale on the ground of preventing a cloud upon title, since, if the tax is justly due, the cloud may easily be avoided by payment. Burlington & M. River R. Co. v. Spearman, 12 Iowa, 112.

And where the description in a tax deed is so defective as to render the deed utterly void a court of equity will not interfere. Head v. James, 13 Wis. 642.

A city assessment without authority of law will be enjoined, even where no question as to cloud upon title is raised. Foster v. Kenosha, 12 Wis. 617; Toledo, W. & W. R. Co. v. Lafayette, 22 Ind. 262.

Even though the tax be authorized by act of legislature, yet where the city authorities have disregarded and failed to comply with all the requirements of the statutes, equity will enjoin a sale of land for such taxes on the ground that the proceedings are coram non judice and void. Baltimore v. Porter, 18 Md. 284, 79 Am. Dec. 686.

Where an act of legislature has extended the city limits by taking in a large amount of lands not necessary for city purposes, the sole object being to make them liable for city taxes, the collection of such taxes may be properly enjoined. Langworthy v. Dubuque, 13 Iowa, 86.

Though relief by injunction is more freely granted in cases of municipal assessments, still if "Councilor McManus moved to adopt the motion. Carried."

4. That the above were the only proceedings had by said council of Ogden City in regard to the creation of said paving district prior to the publication of the notice hereinbelow mentioned; and upon the same day the following proceedings were had:

"Councilor Spencer moved the following motion, in pursuance of the proceedings already taken in ordering the creation of three paving districts:" I move that the council adopt the accompanying notice of intention, and that the same be published for twenty days, beginning with to-morrow morning, Tuesday, March 8th. Said notice was read and Councilor Dee moved to lay on the table for one week. Motion lost, Dee and Elliott voting "aye;" Calvert, Cannon, Graves, McManus, Shurtliff, and Spencer voting "nay." The original motion was then put and carried, Calvert, Cannon, Graves, McManus, Shurtliff, and Spencer voting "aye," and Dee and Elliott voting "nay."

the objections may be urged and the grievances adjusted in a court of law, equity will not interfere with the assessment. McBride v. Chicago, 22 Ill. 574; Ottawa v. Chicago & R. I. R. Co. 25 Ill. 43.

And where, by the proceedings of the corporate authorities in making the assessment, a remedy is provided by all persons aggrieved, and the proceedings may be removed by certiorari to the proper tribunal, an injunction will not be granted. Betts v. Williamsburgh, 15 Barb. 255.

An injunction will not be allowed to restrain the exercise of municipal authority of a city in the levying and collection of a tax, on the ground that the passage of an ordinance with relation to the tax is in violation of the city charter. Page v. St. Louis, 20 Mo. 137.

Nor will the relief be granted against the levying of taxes by a municipal corporation because of the extension of the town limits by act of legislature, contrary to the wishes of the property owners in the tract included in the extension, the statute being held constitutional. Manly v. Raleigh, 4 Jones, Eq. 370.

Where a city has itself created a nuisance by the construction of its streets in such a manner as to cause the water to stand upon certain lots, it cannot, for the purpose of abating the nuisance, tax the lots themselves, and a sale of such lots for payment of the tax will be enjoined. Weeks v. Milwaukee, 10 Wis. 243.

Although a city charter provides that no contracts beyond a certain sum shall be entered into by the city except with the lowest bidder, after advertising, an injunction will not lie at the suit of the lotowners to restrain the enforcement of a tax for paving streets with a patented pavement which is the exclusive property of one firm. Hobart v. Detroit, 17 Mich. 246, 97 Am. Dec. 185; Harlem Gaslight Co. v. New York, 33 N. Y. 309. And see dissenting opinion of Dixon, Ch. J., in Dean v. Charlton, infra. But see, contra, Dean v. Charlton, 23 Wis. 590, 99 Am. Dec. 205.

The circuit courts of the United States will interfere to restrain the collector of internal revenue from the collection of a tax improperly assessed. Georgia v. Atkins, 1 Abh. U. S. 22.

And it has been held that the courts of a state may also interfere to restrain revenue officers of the United States from collecting a revenue tax unauthorized by law. Georgia v. Atkins, 35 Ga. 315.

But a bill to enjoin the enforcement of a tax under the revenue laws, in the nature of a bill of peace, will not lie in favor of a number of persons joined as complainants whose only interest in common is in resisting the tax, they having no common interest in the subject-matter on which it is levied. Cutting v. Gilbert, 5 Blatchf. 259.

Where the tax upon shares in national banks exceeds the rate of taxation imposed upon banks of the state, its collection may be enjoined, but only upon payment of a sum which shall be a fair equivalent for the tax on the banks of the state. Frazer v. Siebern, 16 Ohio St. 614.

But a national bank is not entitled to an injunction restraining the collection of a tax upon its shares of stock on the ground that they are illegally assessed against the bank instead of the shareholders, it not appearing that an action for damages would not afford a complete remedy, and no circumstances of irreparable mischief being shown. First Nat. Bank v. Meredith, 44 Mo. 500.

The proceedings preliminary to the actual levy of a tax will not be enjoined, whether it is about to be imposed upon personalty or realty, since the person at whose instance the suit is brought cannot from the nature of the case obtain redress until the amount of his own tax has been ascertained by actual levy. Miller v. Grandy, 13 Mich. 540.

Nor will a tax be enjoined because complainant has paid previous assessments which were illegal, and which he now seeks to have set off against the tax in question. Fremont v. Mariposa County, 11 Cal. 361.

Nor will equity interfere if the proceedings, originally defective, have been subsequently cured by act of legislature. Cowgill v. Long, 15 Ill. 202.

Where a tax upon a franchise has been illegally imposed the proper remedy is at law, and no relief will be allowed in equity against its collection. DeWitt v. Hays, 2 Cal. 463, 56 Am. Dec. 352.

Nor will the collection of assessment for paving and improving streets be enjoined on the ground that such paving is an interference with the rights and franchises of a plank-road company having the right to use the street, the injunction being sought, not by the company, but by an adjacent lotowner. Bragg v. Detroit, 5 Mich. 336.

The issuing of bonds and the levying and collecting of a tax in aid of subscriptions to a railroad by a county court will not be enjoined on the ground of want of jurisdiction in the court to take such proceedings without a vote of the people, since a sale of the taxpayer's property under such proceedings would not devest the owner of his title, and he can maintain an action at law for the property and for damages for its detention. State, Connelly, v. Parkville & G.R. R. Co. 32 Mo. 496; Sayre v. Tompkins, 23 Mo. 443.

Great depreciation in the value of a particular property, as a watering place, resulting from the condition of the country during a civil war, affords no ground for relief in equity against a tax assessed against such property upon its valuation before the war. White Sulphur Springs Co. v. Robinson, 3 W. Va. 542.

And an entire tax or assessment should not be enjoined on the ground that too much has been assessed. Indianapolis v. Gilmore, 30 Ind. 414.

Where the jurisdiction of equity has attached for and of paving and macadamizing the streets therein and to defray the expenses of such improvement by local assessment.

"The city council of Ogden City, situate in the county of Weber, territory of Utah, gives notice that it intends to make the following improvements, to wit, pave and macadamize the following streets: Twenty-fifth street from the west line of Washington avenue to the west line of Wall avenue. This district shall be known as paving district No. 2. The boundaries of the district to be affected and benefited are the lines running one hundred and fifty feet back and parallel with the outer lines of each side of the streets on each and every block and for the full length thereof therein. The estimated cost of such improvement is $40,000. For the payment of the costs and expenses thereof the city council intends to levy local taxes upon the real estate lying and being within said paving district and to the extent of the benefits to such property by reason of such improvement. The city council will, on March 29, 1892, at 10 A. M., hear objections in writing and from any and all persons interested in said local assessment. By order of the city council.

"T. P. Bryan, City Recorder."

6. That on March 29, 1892, at 9:55 o'clock, D. H. Peery and sixty-eight others, including all the plaintiffs in this action and in the supplemental complaint, who were then the owners of real property within the said paving district No. 2, and with frontage on Twenty-fifth street within the said paving district, filed a protest with the said recorder of said Ogden City, protesting against the levying of any local assessment against or upon their property for the purpose of paving said street within said district; that said persons so protesting owned and protested for more than one half of the whole *frontage on said Twenty-fifth [228 street within said district, to wit, 2 414 feet; that after said hour of 10 A. M. of said day certain persons who had protested to the amount of 302½ feet withdrew their protests, leaving at all times 2,111½ feet frontage on said Twenty-fifth street in said district still protesting against the said local assessment; that the total number of feet fronting on said Twenty-fifth street in said paving district, as mentioned in said notice of intention above set forth, was 3,960, of which 660 feet belonged at said time and still belong to said Ogden City, and were then and are now used for public purposes by the said city, and 125 feet of said frontage were then and are now the property of the said Ogden City, and was public school property, used and owned for public schools.

7. That notwithstanding said protest of said abutting property owned on said Twenty fifth street in said paving district No. 2, and without giving any other or further notice except as hereinbefore stated, the said city council, the purpose of annulling a tax certificate improperly issued and void, the court may properly proceed to enjoin a sale of personal property to satisfy the tax. Hamilton v. Fond du Lac, 25 Wis. 490.

Equity will not interfere by injunction to restrain the enforcement of tax proceedings on the ground of irregularities or errors in the assessment of the tax, or in the execution of the power conferred upon taxing officers, the remedy at law being deemed sufficient in such cases. Macklot v. Davenport, 17 Iowa, 379; Center & W. Gravel Road Co. v. Black, 32 Ind. 468; Warden v. Fond du Lac County Supers. 14 Wis. 618; Kellogg v. Oshkosh, 14 Wis. 624; Exchange Bank v. Hines, 3 Ohio St. 1; Jackson v. Detroit, 10 Mich. 248; Williams v. Detroit, 2 Mich. 560; Greene v. Mumford, 5 R. I. 472, 73 Am. Dec. 79; Schofield v. Watkins, 22 Ill. 66; Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Frary, 22 Ill. 34; Merritt v. Farris, 22 Ill. 303; Munson v. Minor, 22 Ill. 594; Metz v. Anderson, 23 Ill. 463.

Injunction to restrain collection of an illegal and erroneous tax assessed on the owner of personal property is not allowable; and the action cannot be maintained unless the complaint shows that it would prevent a multiplicity of actions or irreparable injury to the freehold, or that extrinsic evidence is needed to evade an apparently legal lien. Pacific Mail S. S. Co. v. New York, 57 How. Pr. 511.

A bill in equity will not lie to restrain a sale of personal property seized for the collection of a tax, in the absence, at least, of any showing that the property possessed any peculiar value not capable of compensation in damages; the remedy at law is ample. Henry v. Gregory, 29 Mich. 68.

The collection of a tax will be restrained when the purpose for which it is to be expended is unconstitutional. Riggsbee v. Durham, 94 N. C. 800; Markoe v. Hartranft (Pa.) 6 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 487.

The collection of all taxes, including those justly due, will not be enjoined because part are erroneous. Buck v. Miller (Ind.) 37 L. R. A. 384.

The excessive amount of a tax levy is not ground for an injunction against the whole tax; but the amount which could be lawfully imposed should be tendered by one who asks relief in equity against the tax. Wells, F. & Co.'s Express v. Crawford County, 63 Ark. 576, 37 L. R. A. 371.

Though the collection of a tax has been restrained on the ground of its unconstitutionality, where there was no adequate remedy at law and the injury was irremediable and threatened the destruction of complainant's franchise, yet in general the unconstitutionality of the act will not warrant the interference by injunction. Foote v. Liucke, 5 McLean, 616; Mechanics' & T. Branch of State Bank v. Deholt, 1 Ohio St. 591; Exchange Bank v. Hines, 3 Ohio St. 1.

But where the officers levying the tax were improperly elected and their action is therefore void, or where the tax was levied by less than the requisite majority of a board of supervisors, an injunction may be allowed. Kiuyon v. Duchene, 21 Mich. 498; Cumberland County Supers. v. Webster, 53 Ill. 141.

Mere proof that an assessment is illegal is not sufficient ground for an action to restrain the collection of the tax. Postal Teleg. Cable Co. v. Grant, 33 N. Y. S. R. 997, Appeal dismissed, 128 N. Y. 633; Susquehanna Bank v. Broome County Supers. 25 N. Y. 312; Rome, W. & O. R. Co. v. Smith, 101 N. Y. 684.

An injunction before trial may be granted to prevent a sale and issue of a tax deed, as a threatened cloud upon title, if plaintiff makes a prima facie case and is ready to perform the requirements of equity as to valid taxes on the land in question. Litchfield v. Brooklyn, 10 Misc. 74; Pettit v. Shepherd, 5 Paige, 493, 28 Am. Dec. 437; Oakley v. Williamsburgh Trustees, 6 Paige, 262; Sanders v. Yonkers, 63 N. Y. 489; King v. Townshend, 141 N. Y. 358; Fonda v. Sage, 48 N. Y. 179.

The court will not sustain an action to restrain the collection of a tax except under circumstances of great necessity, and to prevent irreparable damage. Brass v. Rathbone, 8 App. Div. 78; Rome, W. & O. R. Co. v. Smith, 39 Hun, 332.

on the 4th day of April, 1892, passed the following resolution, to wit:

"Resolved, That the city proceed as speedily as possible to the paving of Twenty-fifth street district with Utah sandstone blocks; that the city engineer be instructed to prepare the necessary specifications at once and submit the same at the next meeting of the council; that the competition of said work be restricted to bona fide residents of Ogden, and that so far as it is possible only Ogden labor be employed in the performance of the work."

8. That on May 2, 1893, said city council of Ogden City passed a resolution instructing the city recorder to advertise for bids for the paving of Twenty-fifth street in said district; which notice was as follows:

"To paving contractors: Bids will be received by the city recorder of Ogden City until 12 o'clock M. May 23, 1892, for the paving of Twenty-fifth street, in Ogden City, from Washington to Wall avenue, according to the specifications of the city engineer of Ogden City, on file in the city recorder's office. Competition is restricted to bona fide residents of Ogden City. The city reserves the right to reject any and all bids. Specifications will be furnished on application to the city recorder."

229] *9. That no specifications had been made by the city prior to this time, but afterwards new specifications were made and filed providing for the paving, grading, and curbing of said Twenty-fifth street, and were adopted by the city council; which specifications provided for the paving of said street with asphaltum and the sides of the street with sandstone blocks and curbing the street, and the contract which was awarded for the doing of said work provided that the contractor should keep the said street in repair for two years after the work upon the same was finished.

10. That the plaintiffs in this action were at the date of the filing of the complaint herein, to wit, May 21, 1892, the owners of the real property mentioned in the complaint, but upon the trial of this action it appeared that John Broom and William Chapman were deceased; Samuel Chapman, administrator of the estate of William Chapman, and Hester Broom, administratrix of the estate of John Broom, were substituted as plaintiffs, and said other parties were still the owners of the property mentioned as belonging to them in the complaint in this action.

11. That said plaintiffs had upon filing their complaint obtained a temporary injunction against the said defendants, but afterwards a demurrer to said complaint was sustained by the said court and said complaint ordered dismissed; which ruling was afterwards by the supreme court of the territory of Utah reversed, and the said cause was ordered remanded, with directions to the defendant to answer said complaint.

12. That the said council, in spite of the protest hereinbefore mentioned, proceeded and at the time of the filing of the complaint in this action had upon its passage the ordinance attached as Exhibit B to the complaint in this action, and afterwards, on the 22d day of March, 1893, passed the ordinance which is hereto attached and marked Exhibit A and made a part of these findings.

13. That on the 9th day of April, 1894, the plaintiffs filed a supplemental complaint in this action and asked that Mathias Biel, Joseph Clark, George W. Lashus, Lamoni Grix, Carl Sorenson, J. E. Horrocks, and Ann Horrocks, J. S. Lewis, *Lindsey R. Rogers, Patrick[230 Healey, Joseph Morely, Zilpha J. Stephens, W. C. Warren, Almira C. Baker, D. H. Stephens, Mary A. Stephens, Elizabeth Stephens, and the Ogden Union Depot & Railway Company, a corporation, be made parties to this action; which supplemental complaint was ordered by the court to be filed; that at the time of the filing of the supplemental complaint the said parties (except the Ogden Depot & Railway Company, a corporation) were and still are the owners of real estate fronting on said Twenty-fifth street (and said plaintiff last named was the owner of real estate assessed with said special tax, but not included in said paving district) included in said paving district, and upon the trial of this action D. H. Peery, Jr., and the Realty Company of Kittery, Maine, a corporation, and J. Pingree and Zilpha J. Stephens, Carrie Lewis, and George W. Murphy were added as parties plaintiff, and were at the date and still are the owners of real estate in said district fronting on said Twenty-fifth street, the pleadings having been allowed to be amended by the court in accordance with such facts.

14. That said Ogden City, in pursuance of said ordinance of March 22, 1893, was about to expose the real estate described in the original and supplemental complaints to sale to satisfy the illegal assessment imposed by said ordinance, and that the parties plaintiff in this action after their said property had been advertised for sale and was about to be sold to satisfy the said illegal assessment then due, paid under protest to said Ogden City, in order to prevent the sale of their property, the following amounts, to wit, J. C. Armstrong, $95.04; Mathlas Biel, $63; Joseph Clark, $48; Samuel Chapman, for the William Chapman estate, $49.20; Joseph Clark, for Clark, Emmet, and Thompson, $30; William Driver, $60; H. I. Griffin, $23.76; Lamoni Grix, $24.90; Ann Horrocks and James E. Horrocks, $124.80; Geo. W. Lashus, $60; H. D. and J. S. Lewis, $82.09; Carrie Lewis, $30; Joseph Morely, $36; Patrick Healey, for Patterson and Healey, $30; Joseph Clark, for Patterson & Clark, $60; L. R. Rogers, $74.04; J. H. Spargo, $48; D. M. Stephens, $14.70; Carl S. Sorenson, $20.40; W. C. Warren, $48; *Geo. M. Kerr, guardian[231 of the Nichols heirs, $160.08; D. H. Peery, Jr., $24; Realty Company of Kittery, Maine, $748.80; Job Pingree, $35.40; Ogden Union Depot & Railway Company, a corporation, $118.80; Geo. W. Murphy, $154.20.

15. That said plaintiffs are without any speedy and adequate remedy at law for the recovery of said amounts without a great multiplicity of the suits, and said assessment constitutes a cloud upon the title of the various plaintiffs to their several parcels of realty, and that said city asserts that it will annually for nine years hereafter levy assessments upon said real estate for the payment of said paving and collect the same from the said parties plaintiff, and has already caused to be sold the property of certain of the plaintiffs under and by virtue of said assessment.

16. That the number of feet frontage in said paving district was 3,300, as the same is described in the ordinance, Ex. A.; that the difference between the district described in the ordinance and the district described in the notice of intention consisted of 660 feet of the public property of the said Ogden City, and the lots affected by the said assessment and described in said ordinance varied in depth, some being 75 feet deep and others 150 feet deep, and that the property owned by the various parties plaintiff in this action varied greatly in depth; that no ascertainment of actual benefits to the property assessed was ever made in order to determine the amount of assessment or to determine whether the amount assessed exceeded the actual benefits to the property by reason of the improvement, but the cost of the improvement was assessed upon the property abutting and fronting upon Twenty-fifth street within the said paving district at an ordinary rate of $12 per front foot without any finding or attempt to find the amount of actual benefits to the property; that the said improvement was made without any general plan and form of public improvement having been adopted by the said Ogden City, and the actual benefits to the property assessed for said improvement were not equal and uniform, nor was said assessment equal and uniform.

Messrs. R. H. Whipple, T. D. Johnson, and James N. Kimball for appellant.

Mr. E. M. Allison, Jr., for appellees.

Mr. Justice Shiras delivered the opinion of the court:

The first question to be determined is whether the amount in controversy is sufficient to give us jurisdiction of the appeal.

Although no motion was made to dismiss the appeal, it was suggested at the argument that, as it was not competent to make up the sum necessary to give this court jurisdiction by uniting the several sums for which each taxpayer was liable, this was such a case, and that therefore we should dismiss the appeal.

Undoubtedly, it is the well-settled rule of this court that, in a suit in equity brought in the circuit court by two or more persons on several and distinct demands, the defendant can appeal to this court as to those plaintiffs only to each of whom more than $5,000 is decreed. Russell v. Stansell, 105 U. S. 303 [26:989], was a case in its facts much like the present one. There land within a particular district was assessed for taxation, each owner being liable only for the amount wherewith he was separately charged; a bill of complaint was filed by a number of them, praying for an injunction against the collection of the assessment, and from a decree dismissing the bill an appeal was taken to this court. It was held that, while the complainants were permitted, for convenience and to save expense, to unite in a petition setting forth the grievances of which complaint was made, the object was to relieve each separate owner from the amount for which he personally, or his property, was found to be accountable, and that such distinct and separate interests could not be united for the purpose of making up the amount necessary to give this court jurisdiction on appeal.

The same conclusion was reached in Gibson v. Shufeldt, 122 U. S. 27 [30: 1083], where the previous cases were fully discussed.

*An examination of this record discloses [233 that none of the complainants, save one, was assessed with an amount sufficient to have enabled him to bring the case here on appeal, and accordingly, under the doctrine of the cases cited, this appeal must be dismissed as to such parties.

But it appears that the Realty Company of Kittery, a corporation of the state of Maine, a party complainant in the supplemental bill, had been assessed, under the ordinance complained of, for the sum of $748.80, as an instalment for one year, and had been compelled to pay the same, and that the city was threatening to continue said proceedings and to sell the real estate of said company annually for nine years as each instalment for a like sum became due. The liability of that company then, under the ordinance and assessment complained of, amounted to the sum of $7,488, and as that company could, had the decree of the court below been adverse to it, have brought the case here on appeal, so, upon the authorities above referred to, it is competent for the defendant city to do the same.

Upon the merits, the first and most important question to consider is whether the city council had jurisdiction to assess and collect the paving tax.

The proceedings were initiated and the tax sought to be levied and collected under the provisions of chapter 41 of the Session Laws of 1890 of the late territory of Utah. The 13th section thereof reads as follows:

"In all cases before the levy of any taxes for any improvements provided for in this act the city council shall give notice of intention to levy said taxes, naming the purposes for which the taxes are to be levied, which notice shall be published at least twenty days in a newspaper published within said city. Such notice shall describe the improvements so proposed, the boundaries of the district to be affected or benefited by such improvements; the estimated cost of such improvements; and designate the time set for such hearing. If at or before the time so fixed written objections to such improvements signed by the owners of one half of the front feet abutting upon that portion of the street, avenue, or alley *to be so improved [234 be not filed with the recorder, the council shall be deemed to have acquired jurisdiction to order the making of such improvements."

The bill alleged, the answer admitted, and the trial court found that the notice of intention to pave in district No. 2, and to defray the expenses thereof by levying a local tax on abutting property owners, was published on March 9, 1892, and in which it was stated that the city council would on March 29, 1892, at 10 o'clock A. M., hear objections in writing from any and all persons interested in said local assessment.

The sixth finding of the trial court was as follows:

"That on March 29, 1892, at 9:55 o'clock, D.

H. Peery and sixty eight others, including all the plaintiffs in this action and in the supplemental complaint, who were then owners of real property within the said paving district No. 2, and with a frontage on Twenty-fifth street within the said paving district, filed a protest with the said recorder of said Ogden City protesting against the levying of any local assessment against or upon their property for the purpose of paving said street within said district; that said persons so protesting owned and protested for more than one half of the whole frontage on said Twenty-fifth street within said district, to wit, 2,414 feet; that after said hour of 10 A. M. of said day certain persons who had protested to the amount of 302½ feet withdrew their protests, leaving at all times 2,111¾ feet frontage on said Twenty-fifth street in said district still protesting against said local assessment; that the total number of feet fronting on said Twenty-fifth street in said paving district, as mentioned in said notice of intention above set forth, was 3,960 feet, of which 660 feet belonged at said time and still belongs to said Ogden City, and was then and is now used for public purposes by said city, and 125 feet of said frontage was then and is now the property of the said Ogden City, and was public school property, used and owned for public schools."

It is contended on behalf of the appellant that the city council, on April 4, 1892, determined that less than half of the whole frontage had protested, and that, as the city council was acting principally in a proceeding duly inaugu-235] rated, such *action cannot be reviewed in an equitable action to restrain the collection of the tax, but should be reviewed, if at all, by certiorari, in which action the whole record would be removed to the district court.

So far as this proposition involves questions of facts as to the proportion of frontage covered by the protests, we, of course, accept finding, on that subject made by the trial court, and approved and adopted by the supreme court of the territory. Stringfellow v. Cain, 99 U. S. 610 [25: 421]; Haws v. Victoria Copper Mining Co. 160 U. S. 303 [40: 436].

But the argument seems to be that when once that question of fact was determined by the city council, proceeding under the statute, their determination cannot afterwards be challenged in a collateral proceeding; that while it would not be conclusive in an action by certiorari to set aside the assessment, it is conclusive as against a proceeding by injunction to prevent the collection of the tax. It is said that the jurisdiction of the city council attached when by resolution or ordinance and publication it gave notice of its intention to make the improvement in question.

We agree with the courts below in thinking that no jurisdiction vested in the city council to make an assessment or to levy a tax for such an improvement, until and unless the assent of the requisite proportion of the owners of the property to be affected had been obtained, and that the action of the city council in finding the fact of such assent was not conclusive as against those who duly protested. The fact of consent, by the requisite number, in this case to be manifested by failure to object, is jurisdictional, and in the nature of a condition precedent to the exercise of the power.

"Where the power to pave or to improve depends upon the assent or petition of a given number or proportion of the proprietors to be affected, this fact is jurisdictional, and the finding of the city authorities or council that the requisite number had assented or petitioned is not, in the absence of legislative provision to that effect, conclusive; the want of such assent makes the whole proceeding void." 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. 4th ed. § 800, where numerous cases *from the different states [236 are cited in support of that proposition.

In Zeigler v. Hopkins, 117 U. S. 683 [29: 1019], a similar question was thus stated and decided:

"There is in reality but a single question presented for our consideration in this case, and that is whether, in an action of ejectment brought to recover the possession of lands sold for the nonpayment of taxes levied to defray the expenses of opening Montgomery avenue generally, and not in obedience to an order of a court of competent jurisdiction to meet some particular liability which had been judicially established, the landowner is estopped from showing, by way of defense, that the petition for the opening presented to the mayor was not signed by the owners of the requisite amount of frontage; and this depends on whether the owner is concluded (1) by the acceptance of the petition by the mayor and his certificate as to its sufficiency and the action of the board of public works thereunder; or (2) by the judgment of the county court confirming the report of the board of public works. This precise question was most elaboratcly considered by the supreme court of California in Mulligan v. Smith, 59 Cal. 206, and decided in the negative, after full argument. With this conclusion we are entirely satisfied. It is supported by both reason and authority."

It is next contended on behalf of the appellant that if the city council wrongfully took jurisdiction, in face of the facts shown in or upon the face of its own proceedings, then the tax is absolutely void on its face, and the plaintiffs must seek their remedy at law; and further, if the city council wrongfully and falsely made its record to show facts sufficient to give it jurisdiction, when such facts never existed, then in order to get into equity plaintiffs must plead all such facts, and that even in such a case certiorari is, under the laws of Utah, a plain and perfect remedy.

It is doubtless true that the collection of a tax will not be restrained on the ground that it is irregular or erroneous. Errors in the assessment do not render the tax void; and usually there are legal remedies for all such mere irregularities *and errors as do not go to [237 the foundation of the tax, and parties complaining must be confined to these. As was held by this court in Dows v. City of Chicago, 78 U. S. 11 Wall. 108 [20: 65]: "A suit in equity will not lie to restrain the collection of a tax on the sole ground that the tax is illegal. There must exist in addition special circumstances, bringing the case under some recognized head of equity jurisdiction, such as that the enforcement of the tax would lead to a multiplicity of suits or produce irreparable injury or, where the property is real estate, throw a cloud upon the title of the complainant."

But the present case would seem plainly to be one of equitable jurisdiction within the doctrine of that case. What is complained of is no mere irregularity or error in the assessment. As we have seen, there was an entire want of jurisdiction in the common council to proceed for want of the assent of the requisite proportion of property owners, and the assessment and tax were, therefore, void. That there was no plain and adequate remedy by certiorari would seem to be evident. Upon that writ nothing could have been shown by evidence of facts outside of the record. It is true that, in some of the states, provision is made by statute to bring such evidence in, but such is not shown to have been the case here. It is an admitted fact upon the face of the pleadings that the common council actually found that the necessary jurisdictional fact existed, and that such a finding was made a matter of record. The plaintiffs alleged in their bill and the defendants in their answer denied that the finding of the jurisdictional fact by the common council was not a true finding. Such an issue required evidence dehors the record of the proceedings before the council in order to impeach their finding. The record of this case discloses that a large amount of oral evidence was introduced by the complainants, and admitted without objection by the defendants, to show ownership by the contesting parties, and to show that the common council were mistaken in finding that the requisite number had not protested.

Not only, however, was there a want of an adequate remedy in proceeding by a writ of [238 certiorari, but, we think, *equitable jurisdiction was properly invoked to prevent a multiplicity of suits, and also to relieve the plaintiffs from a cloud upon their title.

The finding on this fact of the case was as follows:

"That said plaintiffs are without any speedy and adequate remedy at law for the recovery of said amounts without a great multiplicity of suits, and said assessment constitutes a cloud upon the title of the various plaintiffs to their several parcels of realty, and that said city asserts that it will annually for nine years hereafter lay assessments upon said real estate for the payment of said paving and collect the same from the said parties plaintiff, and has already caused to be sold the property of certain of the plaintiffs under and by virtue of said assessment."

If a tax is a lien upon lands, it may then constitute a cloud upon the title; and one branch of equity jurisdiction is the removal of apparent clouds upon the title, which may diminish the market value of the land, and possibly threaten a loss of it to the owner. It is doubtless true that it has been held by this and other courts that if the alleged tax has no semblance of legality, and if upon the face of the proceedings it is wholly unwarranted by law, or for any reason totally void, as disclosed by a mere inspection of the record, such a tax would not constitute a cloud, and that the jurisdiction which is exercised by courts of equity, to relieve parties by removing clouds upon their title, would not attach.

But when the illegality or fatal defect does not appear on the face of the record, but must be shown by evidence aliunde, so that the record would make out a prima facie right in one who should become a purchaser, and the evidence to rebut this case may possibly be lost, or become unavailable from death of witnesses, or when the deed given on a sale of the lands for the tax would be presumptive evidence of a good title in the purchaser, so that the purchaser might rely upon the deed for a recovery of the lands until the irregularities were shown, the courts of equity regard the case as coming within their jurisdiction, and have extended relief on the ground that a cloud on the title existed or was *imminent. Dow [239 v. City of Chicago, 78 U. S. 11 Wall. 108 [20: 65]; Hannewinkle v. Georgetown, 82 U. S. 15 Wall. 547 [21: 231].

Undoubtedly, for merely irregular assessments, where the authorities have jurisdiction to act, the statutory remedy is also the exclusive remedy. But when the statute, as in this case, leaves open to judicial inquiry all questions of a jurisdictional character, it is well settled that a determination of such questions by an administrative board does not preclude parties aggrieved from resorting to judicial remedies.

Thus, in Emery v. Bradford, 29 Cal. 75, the supreme court of California, while holding that the remedy of an owner of a lot in San Francisco assessed for work on a street in front of the same, if dissatisfied with the decision of the superintendent of public streets, is an appeal from such decision to the board of public supervisors, and that, if the proceedings are such that the proper officers have jurisdiction to act, their determinations are valid, and can only be reviewed in the mode provided by the statute, said that where "there are acts to be performed of a jurisdictional character essential to the validity of the assessment, it is not to be supposed that the conclusiveness of the decision of the board of supervisors is to extend to that class of cases."

So, in Wright v. City of Boston, 9 Cush. 242, the supreme judicial court of Massachusetts, in holding that objections to a tax for some defect or irregularity in making the assessment must be taken advantage of by appeal, stated the proposition thus: "For any defect or irregularity in the course of proceeding in making the assessment, any ground of objection, which does not go to show the whole proceeding a nullity, he [the owner] must take his appeal, if he has one."

In Union Pacific Railway Co. v. Cheyenne, 113 U. S. 516, 525 [28: 1098, 1102], this court, through Mr. Justice Bradley, said: "But it is contended that the complainant should have sought a remedy at law and not in equity. It cannot be denied that bills in equity to restrain the collection of taxes illegally imposed have frequently been sustained. But it is well settled that there ought to be some equitable ground for relief besides the mere illegality of the tax; for it must *be presumed that the law fur- [240 nishes a remedy for illegal taxation. It often happens, however, that the case is such that the person illegally taxed would suffer irremedial damage, or be subject to vexatious litigation, if he were compelled to resort to his legal remedy alone. For example, if the legal remedy consisted only of an action to recover back the money after it had been collected by distress and sale of the taxpayer's lands, the loss of his freehold by means of a tax sale would be a mischief hard to be remedied. Even the cloud cast upon his title by a tax under which such a sale could be made would be a grievance which would entitle him to go into a court of equity for relief."

Numerous cases to the same effect may be found cited in Cooley on Taxation, 543.

Again, it is contended on behalf of the appellant that the defendants cannot recover the taxes paid by them under protest because the Sessions Laws of Utah, 1890, § 1, p. 38, provides that "any party, feeling aggrieved by any such special tax or assessment or proceeding may pay said special tax assessed or levied upon his property, or such instalments thereof as may be due, at any time before the same shall be delinquent, under protest, and with notice in writing to the city collector that he intends to sue to recover the same, which notice shall particularly state the alleged grievances and grounds thereof; whereupon such party shall have the right to bring a civil action within sixty days thereafter, and not later, to recover so much of the special tax as he shall show to be illegal, inequitable, and unjust, the cost to follow the judgment, to be apportioned by the court as may seem proper, which remedy shall be exclusive."

As respects this contention we agree with the supreme court of the territory, that this statute applies to cases where there are only errors, irregularities, overvaluations, or other defects which are not jurisdictional, but that where the council, not having the jurisdiction to levy the tax, could not proceed under the statute, the taxpayers need not proceed under the statute to recover the money paid. Where the tax was wholly void and illegal, as in this [241 case, the *statute and its remedies for errors and irregularities have no application.

Our conclusion is that the decree of the Supreme Court of the Territory of Utah, so far as it respects the Realty Company of Kittery, is affirmed, and that as to the other appellees the appeal is dismissed.

CHARLES M. DENNISON, Appt.,
v.
UNITED STATES.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 241-250.)

Fee of chief supervisor of elections—burden of proof—res judicata.

1. A chief supervisor of elections is entitled to 15 cents a folio, for drawing instructions to supervisors relative to their duties.
2. A chief supervisor of elections is not entitled to fees for making copies of applications for appointment of supervisors; nor for entering and indexing letters of instruction to them, or special reports of supervisors of election relating to registration, election, or compensation of supervisors, or reports on applications for their appointment, or payrolls of such supervisors, or for certifying the same to the marshal; nor for more than one folio for each of their oaths; nor for entering and indexing applications to be appointed supervisors; nor for entering and indexing their oaths and those of the special deputy marshal, but is entitled to a fee for filing such oaths. He is not entitled to fees for making, entering, and indexing mail lists of supervisors' names and postoffice addresses; or receiving lists from the same; or depositions of inability of supervisors to discharge their duties; but is entitled to a fee for filing such depositions.
3. The government has the burden of showing that an excessive number of folios are charged for in the account of a chief supervisor of elections, when he makes oath that the services have been necessarily performed and the item has been allowed by the district court.
4. A decision in favor of certain claims approved by the district court, on the ground that such approval threw the burden of proof against him on the government, without passing on the legality of the separate items, is not res judicata as to the validity of similar items in another case.

Argued and Submitted November 2, 1897. Decided November 29, 1897.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Court of Claims in favor of Charles M. Dennison, chief supervisor of the Northern District of New York, against the United States, for his fees and disbursements in certain general elections, etc. Affirmed as modified.

See same case below, 25 Ct. Cl. 304.

Statement by Mr. Justice Brown:

This was a petition by the chief supervisor for the northern district of New York for fees and disbursements connected with the general election of 1890, amounting to $16,612.79, of which $2,752.60 were disallowed by the Treasury Department; for like fees and disbursements connected with the *general elec[242 tion of 1892, amounting to $18,998.94, of which $2,581.75 were disallowed; and also for fees connected with the examination of witnesses to show that certain supervisors, who had been appointed in the city of Troy to attend a Congressional election in 1888, had been deterred from discharging their duties by violence, or threats of violence, by disorderly persons. This account amounted to $624.65, of which $102.65 were disallowed.

The petition alleged that all these accounts had been approved and allowed by the district court.

Upon a finding of facts which do not differ materially from those set up in the petition, the court of claims directed a judgment in favor of the petitioner for $678.10, whereupon petitioner appealed to this court.

Mr. Richard Randolph McMahon for appellant.

Messrs. Louis A. Pradt, Assistant Attorney General, and Felix Brannigan, Assistant Attorney, for appellee.

NOTE.—As to constitutional prohibition against change of salary during term as affecting fees, see note to Gobrecht v. Cincinnati (Ohio) 23 L. R. A. 609.

As to extra pay or compensation to officers, see note to United States v. Macdaniel, 8: 587.

Mr. Justice Brown delivered the opinion of the court:

The duties of chief supervisors are prescribed by statute. U. S. Rev. Stat. §§ 2020, 2026 Their fees are also fixed by statute. § 2031. To entitle a supervisor to a valid claim against the government he must make it appear that the services performed were required by the letter of the former sections, or were such as were actually and necessarily performed in the proper execution of the duties therein prescribed. It must also appear that his charges therefor are covered by the latter section or if they are not fixed in the very words of that section, that, by analogy to some other service, he is entitled to make a corresponding charge. If the services are only performed for his own convenience, or are manifestly unnecessary or useless—even if they be such as he judges proper himself—they cannot be made the basis of a claim against the government.

243] *The petitioner in this case made a claim for his services in the general elections of 1890 and 1892 in the aggregate sum of $35,611.73, of which but $4,265.13 appear to have been for disbursements. Of this very large amount there was disallowed but $5,334.35, an amount which was further reduced by the judgment in his favor of $678.10 to $4,656.25, which is the amount in dispute here.

If the petitioner be entitled by law to the further sum claimed for what are in the main clerical services, he must receive judgment for them; but as the dates of the approval of his accounts show that his services did not extend over a period of more than six months, he has at least no reason to complain of the illiberality of the government.

The approval of the district court goes only to the facts that the services were rendered as stated in the accounts, and that, in certain matters of discretion, the discretion was properly exercised. United States v. Jones, 134 U. S. 483 [33: 1007]; United States v. Barber, 140 U. S. 177, 179 [35: 398, 399]. Neither of these cases requires the allowance of charges obviously unnecessary.

The items disallowed by the court below will be considered in their order:

1.—Item 4. Drawing instructions to supervisors, relative to their duties, 106 folios at 15 cents a folio, $15.90. As this charge was expressly allowed in United States v. McDermott, 140 U. S. 151, 154, ¶ 5 [35:391, 393], and in United States v. Poinier, 140 U. S. 160, 163, ¶ 3 [35: 395, 396], we do not understand why the item was rejected. Apparently it was an oversight. The Attorney General concedes the allowance in his brief.

2.—Item 5. Making copies of applications from different cities for the appointment as supervisors, to be annexed to the reports made to the judge, 1950 folios at 15 cents a folio, $279.50. United States Revised Statutes, § 2012, requires that the court, when opened, shall proceed to appoint and commission under the hand of the judge two resident citizens of each election precinct, who shall be of different political parties, etc., as supervisors. Section 2026 seems to contemplate that the judge shall obtain his information as to the competency of the persons receiving these appointments through the chief supervisor, *who is charged [244 with the duty of receiving the applications of all persons for appointments to such positions; of presenting such applications to the judge, and furnishing information to him in respect to the appointment of such supervisors. The law does not require or contemplate that the original applications shall be retained by the chief supervisor, but rather that they shall be presented to the judge, who may preserve them or not as he sees fit. There is not the slightest necessity for making copies of them. The offices to be filled are purely temporary, and as soon as the election is held and the reports made the supervisors are functi officio. The office of the applications is even more temporary than that of the supervisors, since as soon as the appointments are made the applications have served the purpose for which they were intended. To speak of them as the official records of the chief supervisor is to dignify them with a title and importance entirely foreign to their real functions. To retain the originals and furnish the judge with copies is only to burden the government with an utterly useless expense. There is nothing to show that these copies were ordered by the court.

3.—Items 7, 8, 10, 13, 14, 21, and 27 are all of one class, and fall within the same general principle. They are for entering and indexing special letters of instruction to each local supervisor, containing a notice of the supervisor's appointment and general directions with regard to the method of obtaining his commissions or concerning the proper discharge of the duties of his office; some inclosing blank reports to be made of proceedings at the meeting of the boards of registration; others requiring a report of the vote cast; still others notifying the supervisors of the days allowed and the amount due, with special orders requiring them to verify their lists; and similar directions germane to the proper discharge of their functions. The aggregate amount of these items is $1,447.65.

We see no reason for entering or indexing these letters of instructions. There was no necessity for making separate memoranda of them,—much less copying them or preserving *duplicates. The regular course of busi-[245 ness of the office would authorize one to infer that instructions were sent to the local supervisors in each case, and the names in the supervisors' commissions would show to whom these instructions were sent. We held in the case of United States v. McDermott, 140 U. S. 151, 154 [35: 391, 393], that the chief supervisor was entitled to 15 cents per folio for preparing and furnishing proper instructions to supervisors, and that he was also entitled to the expenses of printing copies of such instructions for the use of the local supervisors, but that he was not entitled to a folio charge for each copy so furnished.

It is equally clear that he is not entitled to a charge for entering and indexing them, as they are no proper part of the records of his office. Letters of instructions are not "records" in any sense of the word.

4.—Items 9, 22, 23, and 24 are for entering and indexing special reports of the supervisors of election, either of the proceedings at the meeting of the board of registry or of other matters connected with the registration, election, or compensation of the supervisors.

Petitioner is doubtless entitled to a fee of 10 cents under U. S. Rev. Stat. § 2031, for filing and caring for each of these special reports, which are a proper part of the records of the office, but we think the entering and indexing them were an unnecessary burden upon the government. These items are therefore disallowed.

5.—Items 11 and 25. Entering and indexing reports on presentation of applications for the appointment of supervisors of election, which reports furnished information to the judge in respect to the qualifications of each applicant, $355.95 and $101.10. These reports are made to the judge, and are no part of the records of the chief supervisor's office. By § 2031, the charge for "entering and indexing" can only be made where the papers are a part of the records of the office. In view of the temporary character of these appointments, the word "record" should receive a narrow construction, and be limited to such documents and entries as might subserve some useful purpose in the future. The office of [246]*these reports is performed when they are submitted to the judge and the appointments are made. If he deems them of any importance, their custody belongs to the court, and not to the supervisor. The copying and entering of them upon his records can be of no possible utility. It belonged to the court to determine for itself what should be done with the originals.

6.—Item 12. Entering and indexing pay rolls of supervisors of election and certifying the same to the marshal, $76.95. It appears to have been the duty of the chief supervisor, under the instructions of the Attorney General, to audit and certify the amount due the supervisors, but we see no necessity for preserving copies of them in the records of the supervisor's office. The charge in this case is not for auditing and certifying the amounts, but for entering, by which we understand copying, and indexing the pay rolls, which we consider an unnecessary burden.

7.—Items 15 and 28 include charges to the amount of $630.60, for drawing oaths of supervisors, two folios. The controller allowed one folio for each oath. The oath contained the statement formerly required by § 1756, that the affiant had never borne arms against the United States, etc., which was repealed by the act of May 13, 1884 (23 Stat. at L. 21), the repealing act providing that in the future every person appointed to any office should take the oath prescribed by § 1757. The oath thus prescribed is less than one folio in length. The case is evidently not one for a liberal construction of the statute. These items are accordingly disallowed.

8.—Item 17. Auditing claims of and drawing pay rolls of supervisors of election for their claims for service, and certifying the same to the marshal for payment, 773 folios, of which the controller disallowed 531 folios, the difference being $81.60. There is no finding in connection with this item as to whether the count of the supervisor or of the controller was correct. Nor is any reason given for the disallowance of the 531 folios. As the account was verified by the oath of the claimant that each and every service charged therein had been necessarily performed, and as the district court allowed the item, we *think it was [247 incumbent upon the government to show that the claimant charged for an excessive number of folios. We are therefore of opinion that this item should be allowed.

9.—Item 18. Entering and indexing applications of persons applying to be appointed supervisors of election, etc., $286.95. This was not a charge for filing recommendations for appointments or for indexing appointments, which charges were allowed in United States v. Poinier, 140 U. S. 160 [35: 395], but for entering and indexing the applications. As we have already held that the law does not contemplate that these papers shall become the records of the office, the service was evidently wholly unnecessary.

10.—Items 19 and 20. Entering and indexing the oaths of supervisors and special deputy marshals, of which the controller allowed a part and disallowed a larger part, the difference being $671.70. It does not appear why the controller allowed less than one half of these items; but as we think the whole charge should have been disallowed, it is unnecessary to seek an excuse for disallowing a moiety. It is true that U. S. Rev. Stat. § 2027, requires the commissioners, with all due diligence, to forward to the chief supervisor all oaths of office administered to any supervisor of election, in order that the same may be properly preserved and filed. They thereby become a part of the records of the chief supervisor's office, and he is properly entitled to a fee for filing the same; but it does not, therefore, follow that he is entitled to a separate fee for entering and indexing them. As we observed in Poinier's Case, page 162 [35: 396], "it does not, however, follow that every paper which the law authorizes to be filed must therefore be recorded or copied. To entitle a paper or document to be recorded it should have some permanent value. Where the original paper is preserved or filed, such, for instance, as the pleadings, exhibits, depositions, or other papers in a common suit at law or equity, no necessity ordinarily exists for its being recorded. As a charge of 10 cents for filing these informations was allowed by the department, the exception to this item for recording and indexing is therefore sustained." The same remarks are applicable to the charge in this case. *The petitioner was entitled[248 to 10 cents for filing and caring for every paper to be filed by him; but he does not thereby become entitled to a separate fee for entering and indexing them.

11.—Item 26. Making, entering, and indexing records, such as mail lists containing supervisors' names and postoffice addresses, with columns for checking matter sent out by mail, and also receiving lists, etc. These lists are obviously no part of the record, and the item should be disallowed.

12.—Item 31. Entering and indexing certain depositions and evidence taken in the matter of the claim made that certain supervisors had been unable to discharge the duties of their office by reason of violence and threats of violence, $172.35. For the reasons already stated with reference to the items for entering and indexing oaths, we think that the supervisor was entitled to a charge of 10 cents for filing these depositions, but he is not entitled to the large charge of $172.35 for entering and indexing them. This charge is also disallowed.

The underlying vice of the petitioner's theory throughout this whole account consists in the assumption that every paper or document which comes into or issues from his hands, or is prepared by him officially, even though it be for a purely temporary purpose, constitutes an official record, and that it is within his discretion that every such paper shall be entered (copied) in durable books and indexed in a permanent form. This is not the case. Even in courts of justice, which are a permanent feature of every civilized government, the judgment record which the clerk is authorized to enter in a book kept for that purpose does not include every paper found in the files of the case, nor even the depositions of witnesses, but is confined to the pleadings and proceedings necessary to make up a complete history of the suit. Much more is this the case with the records of the chief supervisor, which exist only for a temporary purpose, and after a year or two lose practically their entire value. It is true that the chief supervisor is entitled to exercise a certain discretion as to what papers he shall enter upon a 249]permanent book, but to enter a *hundred letters, each of which must be substantially a copy of every other, excepting the address, is so manifestly an abuse of his discretion that no court should tolerate it for a moment. It is not for us to determine what are the records which should be entered and indexed. It is sufficient to say that, for the purposes of this case, we have no difficulty in determining what are not.

The plea of res judicata, arising from the fact that the claimant brought an action in 1887 in the court of claims to recover for various items of service of the same nature and description as those claimed in this case, and that the court found in his favor and rendered judgment against the United States for the amount claimed, is not well taken. There is no finding of fact in connection with this plea, and we can only judge of what the issue was by reading the opinion of the court of claims. 25 Ct. Cl. 304. From this opinion it appears that the items of the account were not passed upon in detail, but that the court rendered judgment in favor of the claimant upon the ground that the approval of the account by the district court, under the decision in United States v. Jones, 134 U. S. 483 [33: 1007], threw upon the government the burden of disproving the correctness of the several items. That the court did not approve the items as charged is evident from its statement that "on the argument it was maintained by the counsel for the government that the claimant had failed to establish the quantum of his services and expenditures by competent evidence; and, as to many of the items, such is the opinion of the court."

Further than this, however, the suit under consideration is not for the same items as those allowed in the former case, but for similar items, and the case falls within our ruling in Cromwell v. County of Sac, 94 U. S. 351 [24: 195], that "where the second action between the same parties is upon a different claim or demand, the judgment in the prior action operates as an estoppel only as to those matters in issue or points controverted, upon the determination of which the finding or verdict was rendered." There was no issue raised and decided in the former case as to the legality of the several items considered separately, but such issue is clearly raised in this case.

*While we think the judgment of the [250 court of claims was correct with respect to all the items involved in this case, with the exception of two, the aggregate amount of which is $97.50, for its error in respect to those two the judgment will have to be varied by increasing the same from $678.10 to $775.60, and subject to such increase it is in all other respects affirmed.

trict of New York in favor of the defendant, José Manuel Hernandez, in an action brought by George F. Underhill against him for damages for detention and confinement of Underhill by defendant while a military commander in Venezuela. Affirmed.

See same case below, 26 U. S. App. 573.

Statement by Mr. Chief Justice Fuller:

In the early part of 1892 a revolution was initiated in Venezuela against the administration
251]thereof, which the revolutionists *claimed had ceased to be the legitimate government. The principal parties to this conflict were those who recognized Palacio as their head and those who followed the leadership of Crespo. General Hernandez belonged to the anti-administration party, and commanded its forces in the vicinity of Ciudad Bolivar. On the 8th of August, 1892, an engagement took place between the armies of the two parties at Buena Vista, some 7 miles from Bolivar, in which the troops under Hernandez prevailed, and on the 13th of August, Hernandez entered Bolivar and assumed command of the city. All of the local officials had in the meantime left, and the vacant positions were filled by General Hernandez, who from that date and during the period of the transactions complained of was the civil and military chief of the city and district. In October the party in revolt had achieved success generally, taking possession of the capital of Venezuela October 6, and on October 23, 1892, the Crespo government, so called, was formally recognized as the legitimate government of Venezuela by the United States.

George F. Underhill was a citizen of the United States, who had constructed a waterworks system for the city of Bolivar under a contract with the government, and was engaged in supplying the place with water, and he also carried on a machinery repair business. Some time after the entry of General Hernandez, Underhill applied to him as the officer in command for a passport to leave the city. Hernandez refused this request, and requests made by others in Underhill's behalf, until October 18, when a passport was given and Underhill left the country.

This action was brought to recover damages for the detention caused by reason of the refusal to grant the passport; for the alleged confinement of Underhill to his own house; and for certain alleged assaults and affronts by the soldiers of Hernandez's army.

The cause was tried in the circuit court of the United States for the eastern district of New York, and on the conclusion of plaintiff's case, the circuit court ruled that upon the facts plaintiff was not entitled to recover, and direct-252]ed a *verdict for defendant on the ground that "because the acts of the defendant were those of a military commander, representing a de facto government in the prosecution of a war, he was not civilly responsible therefor." Judgment having been rendered for defendant, the case was taken to the circuit court of appeals, and by that court affirmed upon the ground "that the acts of the defendant were the acts of the government of Venezuela, and as such are not properly the subject of adjudication in the courts of another government." 26 U. S. App. 573 [65 Fed. Rep. 577]. Thereupon the cause was brought to this court on certiorari.

Messrs. Walter S. Logan and Charles M. Demond, for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. F. R. Coudert, Jr., F. R. Coudert, and Joseph Kling for defendant in error.

Mr. Chief Justice Fuller delivered the opinion of the court:

Every sovereign state is bound to respect the independence of every other sovereign state, and the courts of one country will not sit in judgment on the acts of the government of another done within its own territory. Redress of grievances by reason of such acts must be obtained through the means open to be availed of by sovereign powers as between themselves.

Nor can the principle be confined to lawful or recognized governments, or to cases where redress can manifestly be had through public channels. The immunity of individuals from suits brought in foreign tribunals for acts done within their own states, in the exercise of governmental authority, whether as civil officers or as military commanders, must necessarily extend to the agents of governments ruling by paramount force as matter of fact. Where a civil war prevails, that is, where the people of a country are divided into two hostile parties, who take up arms and oppose one another by military *force, generally speaking for-[253 eign nations do not assume to judge of the merits of the quarrel. If the party seeking to dislodge the existing government succeeds, and the independence of the government it has set up is recognized, then the acts of such government from the commencement of its existence are regarded as those of an independent nation. If the political revolt fails of success, still if actual war has been waged, acts of legitimate warfare cannot be made the basis of individual liability. United States v. Rice, 17 U. S. 4 Wheat. 246 [4: 562]; Fleming v. Page, 50 U. S. 9 How. 603 [13: 276]; Thorington v. Smith, 75 U. S. 8 Wall. 1 [19: 361]; Williams v. Bruffy, 96 U. S. 176 [24: 716]; Ford v. Surget, 97 U. S. 594 [24: 1018]; Dow v. Johnson, 100 U. S. 158 [25: 632], and other cases.

Revolutions or insurrections may inconvenience other nations, but by accommodation to the facts the application of settled rules is readily reached. And where the fact of the existence of war is in issue in the instance of complaint of acts committed within foreign territory, it is not an absolute prerequisite that that fact should be made out by an acknowledgment of belligerency, as other official recognition of its existence may be sufficient proof thereof. The Three Friends [United States v. The Three Friends], 166 U. S. 1 [41: 897].

In this case, the archives of the state department show that civil war was flagrant in Venezuela from the spring of 1892; that the revolution was successful; and that the revolutionary government was recognized by the United States as the government of the country, it being, to use the language of the Secretary of State in a communication to our minister to Venezuela, "accepted by the people, in the possession of the power of the nation and fully established."

That these were facts of which the court is bound to take judicial notice, and for information as to which it may consult the Department of State, there can be no doubt. Jones v. United States, 137 U. S. 202 [34: 691]; Mighell v. Sultan of Johore, [1894] 1 Q. B. 149.

It is idle to argue that the proceedings of those who thus triumphed should be treated as the acts of banditti or mere mobs.

We entertain no doubt upon the evidence 254]that Hernandez *was carrying on military operations in support of the revolutionary party. It may be that adherents of that side of the controversy in the particular locality where Hernandez was the leader of the movement entertained a preference for him as the future executive head of the nation, but that is beside the question. The acts complained of were the acts of a military commander representing the authority of the revolutionary party as a government, which afterwards succeeded and was recognized by the United States. We think the circuit court of appeals was justified in concluding "that the acts of the defendant were the acts of the government of Venezuela, and as such are not properly the subject of adjudication in the courts of another government."

The decisions cited on plaintiff's behalf are not in point. Cases respecting arrests by military authority in the absence of the prevalence of war, or the validity of contracts between individuals entered into in aid of insurrection, or the right of revolutionary bodies to vex the commerce of the world on its common highway without incurring the penalties denounced on piracy, and the like,—do not involve the questions presented here.

We agree with the circuit court of appeals, that "the evidence upon the trial indicated that the purpose of the defendant in his treatment of the plaintiff was to coerce the plaintiff to operate his waterworks and his repair works for the benefit of the community and the revolutionary forces," and that "it was not sufficient to have warranted a finding by the jury that the defendant was actuated by malice or any personal or private motive;" and we concur in its disposition of the rulings below. The decree of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

Evidence of the invalidity of a patent—when admissible in state court—power of state court to determine questions under patent laws.

1. Evidence of the invalidity of a patent and its infringement of a prior patent does not oust the jurisdiction of a state court in an ordinary action of assumpsit which is not removable to a Federal court, when the state court has jurisdiction both of parties and subject-matter as set forth in the declaration, and the question of the invalidity of the patent is incidental to a defense of the lack of consideration and of a rescission of the contract.

2. The power of state courts to determine questions arising under the patent laws is not precluded by U. S. Rev. Stat. § 711, excluding them from jurisdiction of "cases" arising under those laws.

Submitted November 2, 1897. Decided November 29, 1897.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of Illinois to review a judgment of that court affirming the judgment of the Circuit Court of that state in favor of the defendant, the Paris Gaslight & Coke Company, in an action brought by Henry Pratt et al., for the recovery of an agreed sum for manufacturing and setting up an apparatus for the manufacture of water gas for defendant. Affirmed.

Statement by Mr. Justice Brown:

This was an action in assumpsit upon the common counts, by the persons constituting the firm of Henry Pratt & Company, to recover of the Paris Gaslight & Coke Company the agreed consideration of $4,850 for manufacturing and setting up at its works in the city of Paris, Edgar county, Illinois, an apparatus for the manufacture of water gas, in accordance with certain patents granted to Pratt and Ryan, April 22, 1884, and April 12, 1887, the component parts of said apparatus being set forth in the contract.

Defendant pleaded the general issue, and in addition thereto that the cause of action arose under a written contract, by which the plaintiffs agreed to keep the defendant harmless against any suits which might be brought against it for the infringement of any patents, and, if any such were brought, to defend the same at their own expense; further averring that the patents to Pratt and Bryan were void, and an infringement upon certain patents which had been granted to Springer and Lowe; that plaintiffs had not kept defendant harmless from suits for infringement, as provided for in such contract, and had not defended the same at their expense, but that a suit had been begun against defendant by the National Gaslight & Fuel Company in the circuit court of the United States for the southern district of Illinois, for *an infringement of the [256 Springer patent; that defendant requested plaintiffs to defend it, which they had agreed to do, but that they wholly refused to defend it, and said suit is still pending; that defendant was compelled to, and did at once, quit using the apparatus by reason of such suit, and has wholly ceased to use it.

The third plea averred, in substance, that the plaintiffs obtained the contract upon false and fraudulent representations that their patents were not infringements upon any other patents, which representations the plaintiffs knew to be untrue; that plaintiffs further represented that the National Gaslight & Fuel Company had begun a suit against them for an infringement of the Springer patent, and had found that they had no claim, and assured plaintiffs that no suit would be brought against defendant, by the Gaslight & Fuel Company, nor by anyone else, and that the Company had abandoned all claim that plaintiffs' patents were an infringement upon theirs, which representations were false and fraudulent to the knowledge of the plaintiffs, who had before that time been notified by the Gaslight & Fuel Company that suit would be brought against anyone who might use the apparatus made by them.

The fourth plea alleged substantially the same representations as the third, and that, while plaintiffs were about to commence the construction of the apparatus, the National Gaslight & Fuel Company notified defendant that the plaintiffs' apparatus was an infringement upon the patents; that defendant thereupon notified plaintiffs that it would not accept such apparatus, and thereupon plaintiffs proposed that, if defendant would permit them to proceed, they would, before asking payment for the same, furnish defendant a good and sufficient bond indemnifying it against all damages that it might suffer by reason of any infringement, and upon defendant accepting such offer, plaintiffs refused to give such bonds as they had agreed, and still neglect to do so.

To these special pleas a general demurrer was filed by the plaintiffs, which was overruled by the court, and by leave of the court replications were filed, and upon the issues thus 257] *joined a trial was had which resulted in a verdict for the defendant. A motion for a new trial being overruled, and judgment entered upon the verdict, the case was taken to the appellate court of Illinois, and from that court to the supreme court, which affirmed the judgment of the circuit court, whereupon plaintiffs sued out a writ of error from this court.

Mr. John T. Richards for plaintiffs in error.

Messrs. George Hunt and James R. Ward for defendant in error.

Mr. Justice Brown delivered the opinion of the court:

The only Federal question presented by the record in this case turns upon the admissibility of evidence tending to show that the patents issued to the plaintiffs Pratt & Ryan were infringements upon a prior patent issued to Springer. Plaintiffs contend that the state court, by admitting such testimony, thereby assumed jurisdiction of a patent case, in violation of U. S. Rev. Stat. § 711, which declares that "the jurisdiction vested in the courts of the United States, in the cases and proceedings hereinafter mentioned, shall be exclusive of the courts of the several states. . . . Fifth. Of all cases arising under the patent-right or copyright laws of the United States."

The action, however, was not brought to test the validity of plaintiffs' patents, to recover damage for their infringement, or to enjoin their use by the defendant. The suit was an ordinary action of assumpsit upon the common counts for the price of a machine,—a patented machine it is true, but none the less subject to a common-law action to recover its value. No mention is made of a patent in the declaration, and the contract having been executed, the action was properly brought upon the common counts, notwithstanding the machine was sold under a written agreement. 2 Greenl. Ev. § 104. Defendant in its plea set up the contract, under *which the plaintiffs[258 agreed to save the defendant harmless against any suit which might be brought against it for infringement, and to defend such suits at their own expense; and averred, among other things, that the patents were void and an infringement upon prior patents; that plaintiffs had not kept the defendant harmless against suits, but had refused to defend it against a suit brought by the National Gaslight & Fuel Company, by reason of which the consideration had wholly failed, and defendant had rightfully rescinded the contract. Manifestly if the defendant had no right to use the machine it was of no value to it, and the whole purpose of its purchase was frustrated.

Had the action been in the circuit court of the United States defendant would obviously have had the right to show that the plaintiffs' patents were void, and an infringement upon prior patents as an excuse for rescinding the contract. Hayne v. Maltby, 3 T. R. 438; Nye v. Raymond, 16 Ill. 153. Why should it not have the same right in a state court? It is evident that, unless it can prove the invalidity of the plaintiffs' patents, it might be completely at their mercy. It cannot, under our decisions, remove the case to a Federal court, as one arising under the Constitution or laws of the United States, since no claim was made by the plaintiffs in their declaration under such Constitution or laws. Chappell v. Waterworth, 155 U. S. 102 [39: 85]; Walker v. Collins, 167 U. S. 57 [42: 76]; Tennessee v. Union and Planters' Bank, 152 U. S. 454 [38: 511]. It could not file a bill against the National Gaslight & Fuel Company to test the validity of the patents, since the defendant, and not the Fuel Company, was the offending party. Nor could it have compelled the Fuel Company to sue it for an infringement had that company not chosen to do so. The Fuel Company did, however, elect to bring such suit, which the plaintiffs were promptly notified by the defendant to defend; but they refused to do this, and now claim that defendant is incapacitated from contesting the validity of their patents, which contest they were bound under their contract to make in the suit brought against the defendant by the Fuel Company. It is possible 259]a bill would lie in the *circuit court of the United States to reseind the contract, but, having the right to reseind without suit, it ought not to be driven to this circuitous remedy.

The action under consideration is not one arising under the patent-right laws of the United States in any proper sense of the term. To constitute such a cause the plaintiff must set up some right, title, or interest under the patent laws, or at least make it appear that some right or privilege will be defeated by one construction, or sustained by the opposite construction, of these laws. Starin v. New York, 115 U. S. 248 [29: 388]; Germania Ins. Co. v. Wisconsin, 119 U. S. 473 [30: 461].

The state court had jurisdiction both of the parties and the subject-matter as set forth in the declaration, and it could not be ousted of such jurisdiction by the fact that, incidentally to one of these defenses, the defendant claimed the invalidity of a certain patent. To hold that it has no right to introduce evidence upon this subject is to do it a wrong and deny it a remedy. Section 711 does not deprive the state courts of the power to determine questions arising under the patent laws, but only of assuming jurisdiction of "cases" arising under those laws. There is a clear distinction between a case and a question arising under the patent laws. The former arises when the plaintiff in his opening pleading—be it a bill, complaint, or declaration—sets up a right under the patent laws as ground for a recovery. Of such the state courts have no jurisdiction. The latter may appear in the plea or answer or in the testimony. The determination of such question is not beyond the competency of the state tribunals.

The jurisdiction of state courts over patent cases is not more exclusive than that of the district courts over cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction. Yet, when vessels have passed into the hands of an assignee or receiver, it has been the constant practice of courts of bankruptcy and equity to respect the liens given by the maritime law, to marshal such liens and direct their payment, precisely as a court of admiralty would have done. Scott's Case, 1 Abb. (U. S.) 336; Re Kirkland, 14 Fed. Cas. 677; Re People's Mail Steamship Co. 3 Ben. 226; High, Receivers, § 138.

260] *While the question has never arisen in this court in the exact form presented in this case, we have repeatedly held that the Federal courts have no right, irrespective of citizenship, to entertain suits for the amount of an agreed license or royalty, or for the specific execution of a contract for the use of a patent, or of other suits where a subsisting contract is shown governing the rights of the party in the use of an invention, and that such suits not only may, but must, be brought in the state courts. Hartell v. Tilghman, 99 U. S. 547 [25: 357]; Wilson v. Sandford, 51 U. S. 10 How. 99 [13: 344]; Albright v. Teas, 106 U. S. 613 [27: 295]; Goodyear v. Day, 1 Blatchf. 565; Blanchard v. Sprague, 1 Cliff. 288; Dale Tile Mfg. Co. v. Hyatt, 125 U. S. 46 [31: 683]; Wade v. Lawder, 165 U. S. 624 [41: 851]. Although in an action for royalties, if the validity and infringement of the patent are controverted, the case is considered as one "touching patent rights," for the purposes of an appeal to this court under U. S. Rev. Stat. § 699. St. Paul Plow Works v. Starling, 127 U. S. 376 [32: 251]. In this case the court expressly reserved the question whether the action should be considered as one arising under the patent laws of the United States within the meaning of § 711.

We are referred to but one case directly in point which favors plaintiffs' contention: Elmer v. Pennel, 40 Me. 430, in which, in a suit upon a note given for a patent right, proof that the patent was void as an infringement upon a prior one was held not to be admissible without that fact having been determined by a court of competent jurisdiction.

There is, however, an overwhelming weight of authority to the contrary. Beginning with the case of Bliss v. Negus, 8 Mass. 46, in which, in a similar action upon a note, it was held the defendant might show that the patent had been obtained by fraud and perjury, the supreme judicial court of Massachusetts has held steadily to the doctrine that where the question of the validity of a patent arises collaterally it will take jurisdiction of it. In Dickinson v. Hall, 14 Pick. 217 [25 Am. Dec. 390], evidence that the patent was void was held to be pertinent to show a total want of consideration for the defendant's note. The principal case, however, is that of Nash v. Lull, 120 Mass. 60 [3 Am. Rep. 435], in which the opinion of the court was delivered by *Mr. Justice[261] Gray, to the effect that any degree of utility or practical value in a patent will support the consideration paid for it; but that if it be wholly void, a note given for it is without consideration, and such issue may be tried in the state court as well as in the circuit court of the United States. See also, to the same effect, Bierce v. Stocking, 11 Gray, 174; Lester v. Palmer, 4 Allen, 145.

Like opinions have been pronounced in the courts of New Hampshire, Connecticut, New York, Pennsylvania, Indiana, Wisconsin, Illinois, and Missouri; and in all these states the principle seems well established that any defense which goes to the validity of the patent is available in the state courts. In these cases the validity of the patent was attacked upon different grounds, but we perceive no distinction in the principle involved. The patent may be void because the invention was well known before; or because it is useless or immoral; or because it is an infringement upon other prior patents; and it is no objection to the jurisdiction of the state court that the question of validity may involve the examination of conflicting patents, or the testimony of experts. It is the fact of its invalidity, and not the reasons for it, that is material. The cases are so numerous and uniform that a bare reference to them is all that is necessary. Dunbar v. Marden, 13 N. H. 311; Rich v. Atwater, 16 Conn. 409; Sherman v. Champlain Transportation Co. 31 Vt. 162; Clough v.

Patrick, 37 Vt. 421; Burrall v. Jewett, 2 Paige, 134; Middlebrook v. Broadbent, 47 N. Y. 443 [7 Am. Rep. 457]; Continental Store Service Co. v. Clark, 100 N. Y. 365; Head v. Stevens, 19 Wend. 411; Harmon v. Bird, 22 Wend. 113; Cross v. Huntly, 13 Wend. 385; Saxton v. Dodge, 57 Barb. 84, 115; Geiger v. Cook, 3 Watts & S. 266; Slemmer's Appeal, 58 Pa. 155, 163 [98 Am. Dec. 248]; McClure v. Jeffrey, 8 Ind. 79; Nye v. Raymond, 16 Ill. 153; Page v. Dickerson, 28 Wis. 694 [9 Am. Rep. 532]; Rice v. Garnhart, 34 Wis. 453 [17 Am. Rep. 448]; Billings v. Ames, 32 Mo. 265.

The claim made by the plaintiffs in error, that there was no competent evidence to show that their patents were an infringement upon the prior patents, was not specially assigned as 262]*error, either in the appellate court, or in the supreme court of the state, and is not noticed in either of the opinions of those courts. Under these circumstances it cannot be assigned as error here.

The judgment of the Supreme Court of Illinois is therefore affirmed.

EDWARD HODGSON, Plff. in Err.,
v.
STATE OF VERMONT.

Information, when sufficient—due process of law.

1. An information in the words of a statute for selling intoxicating liquors without authority of law is not insufficient to constitute due process of law, although it does not give the particulars of the kind, quantity, price, and person to whom sold, when these are given by specifications to which the defendant is entitled as a matter of right.
2. An information, instead of an indictment, is sufficient to constitute due process of law in a prosecution.

Argued October 14, 15, 1897. Decided November 29, 1897.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of Vermont to review a judgment of that court affirming the judgment of the County Court for the County of Addison in that State refusing to quash an information for selling liquor, and overruling a motion in arrest, and sentencing Edward Hodgson to pay certain fines and costs and to be confined in the house of correction at Rutland for a certain time upon a judgment of conviction of him for selling liquor contrary to a statute of the state. Affirmed.

See same case below, 66 Vt. 134.

Statement by Mr. Justice Shiras:

At the June term, 1892, of the county court for the county of Addison, in the state of Vermont, the plaintiff in error was tried and convicted "of one first offense and one second offense," upon an information for selling liquor, filed by the state's attorney. The information was as follows:

"Be it remembered that Frank L. Fish, state's attorney within and for said county, comes here into open court and in his own proper person, and upon his oath of office, gives said court to understand and be informed that Edward Hodgson of Orwell, in the county of Addison, and state of Vermont, on the 7th day of June, A. D. 1892, at Orwell, in the county of Addison aforesaid, did, at divers times, sell, furnish, and give away intoxicating liquor without authority, contrary to the form of the statute in such case made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the state.

"And the said state's attorney, on his oath aforesaid, comes and gives said court further to understand and be informed that the said Edward Hodgson, prior to this time, to wit, at the December term of the county court held at Middlebury, in and for the county of Addison, on the first Tuesday of *December, A. D. [264 1891, before and by consideration of said court, was, as appears of record, convicted of selling, furnishing, and giving away intoxicating liquors, against the law in such case made and provided."

It is stated in the record that the state's attorney "likewise filed specifications in words and figures following:"

"In said case the state's attorney, for a specification, specifies, and says as follows: That he will rely upon, and expect to prove in the trial of said cause, the fact that the respondent, within three years before the filing of the information in the said cause, sold, furnished, and gave away intoxicating liquor to the following named persons, or to some one of them, that is to say:

[Here follow the names of sixty-six persons, whose residence is not given.]

"And the undersigned state's attorney states that he has also specified the offenses against said respondent with all the certainty as to the time and person, and he is now able from all the information he has in said cause; and the state's attorney reserves the right to amend these specifications if he shall have further evidence pursuant to the statute.

"And the state's attorney further specifies and relies upon the selling, furnishing, and giving away of intoxicating liquor by the respondent within three years before the filing of said information, to some person or persons now unknown to the state's attorney, and claims the right to add the names of such persons, when ascertained, to the specifications, and to make such other amendments in these specifications as the law and discretion of the court may admit."

This specification is not required by any statute, and forms no part of the information. It is, however, provided by statute that "when a specification is required, it shall be sufficient to specify the offenses with such certainty as to time and person as the prosecutor may be able, and the same shall be subject to amendment at any stage of the trial; and where the specification sets forth the sale, furnishing, or giving away to any person or persons unknown the witnesses produced may be inquired of as to such transactions with any per-265]son,*whether named in the specification or not, and as the name of such person may be disclosed by the evidence it may be inserted in or added to the specification upon such terms as to a postponement of the trial for this cause as the court shall think reasonable." Stat. of Vt. 1886, No. 37.

NOTE.—As to what is due process of law, see note to Pearson v. Yewdall, 24: 436.

It does not appear from the record that the specification was asked for by the respondent, nor whether the offenses of which he was convicted were for selling, furnishing, or giving away; or whether to either of the sixty-six persons named in the specification, or to some person or persons not named. These proceedings were based upon §§ 3802, 3803, 3859, 3860 of the Revised Laws of Vermont (Revision of 1880), as amended by No. 42 of the Acts of 1888, which are as follows:

"Sec. 3802. If a person by himself, clerk, servant, or agent, sells, furnishes, or gives away, or owns, keeps, or possesses with intent to sell, furnish, or give away, intoxicating liquor or cider, in violation of law, he shall forfeit for each offense to the state, upon the first conviction not less than five nor more than one hundred dollars, and may also be imprisoned in the discretion of the court not more than thirty days; upon the second and each subsequent conviction, not less than ten nor more than two hundred dollars for each offense, and shall also be imprisoned not less than one month nor more than one year.

"Sec. 3803. Justices shall have concurrent jurisdiction with the county court in prosecutions under the preceding section, and the same may be tried upon the complaint of a grand juror of the town, or of the state's attorney, before a justice or upon the information of the state's attorney, before the county court.

"Sec. 3859. Complaints for any offense against § 3572 (§ 3802) shall be substantially in the following form:

'State of Vermont } ss:
——— County, }

'To A. B., justice of the peace for the county of———, comes C. D., grand juror of 266] the town of———, in said county, *and complains that E. F., of———, on the ——— day of———, A.D.——, at———, did, at divers times, sell, furnish, or give away (as the case may be) intoxicating liquor, without authority, contrary to the form of the statute in such case made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the state.

'C. D., Grand Juror.'

"Sec. 3860. Under the foregoing complaint every distinct act of selling, furnishing, or giving away may be proved, and the court shall impose a fine for each offense."

Before trial the plaintiff in error filed a motion to quash the indictment. This motion was overruled by the court, to which decision the plaintiff in error duly excepted. The case was carried by the plaintiff in error to the supreme court of Vermont upon exceptions to the overruling by the county court of his motion to quash, and upon other exceptions taken at the trial, and not material here, as they raise no Federal question. Judgment and sentence were stayed in the county court, to await the result of the hearing in the supreme court.

In that court the plaintiff in error filed a motion in arrest of judgment, which he was allowed by the court to do, and the same was taken into consideration and passed upon by the court.

The grounds set forth are, in substance: That the information upon which the conviction was had is insufficient and void, and lacking in substance in various particulars specified in the motion; that the respondent was deprived of his right to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation against him; that he was convicted of two infamous crimes without due process of law, and denied by the state the equal protection of the law; that the statutes of Vermont under which the proceedings were had are in conflict with the provisions of the Constitution of the United States, and especially that provision of the 14th Amendment which provides that "no state shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any state deprive any person of life, liberty, or property *without due process of law, nor deny to[267 any person the equal protection of the law."

The supreme court of Vermont affirmed the judgment of the county court refusing to quash the information, and overruled the motion in arrest, and proceeded to render judgment upon the verdict, and sentenced the plaintiff in error to pay a fine of $30 for the first offense and $70 for the second offense, with costs taxed at $197.36, and to be confined at hard labor in the house of correction at Rutland for the period of sixty days, "with alternative sentence." The alternative sentence is, that in case of failure to pay the fine and costs within twenty-four hours, the respondent be confined in the house of correction for the term of three days for each dollar, in addition to the period for which he is sentenced. Rev. Laws, § 4336.

The court decided, in substance, that the information was sufficient; that it constituted due process of law; that the statute did not infringe the requirements of the Constitution of the United States by depriving the accused of the equal protection of the laws or by subjecting him to cruel and unusual punishment.

The defendant thereupon sued out a writ of error to this court, which was allowed by the chief judge of the supreme court of the state of Vermont.

Messrs. E. J. Phelps and W. H. Bliss for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. Frank L. Fish and C. A. Prouty for defendant in error.

Mr. Justice Shiras delivered the opinion of the court:

At a former term of this court, in the case of O'Neill v. Vermont, 144 U. S. 323 [36: 450], we were asked to hold certain provisions of the laws of the state of Vermont concerning the importation and sale of intoxicating liquors void, because they *conflicted with the [268 Constitution of the United States wherein it confers upon Congress exclusive power to regulate interstate commerce, and forbids cruel and unusual punishments. But the court was of opinion that the record in that case did not disclose that any Federal question had been raised or decided in the supreme court of Vermont, and the writ of error was accordingly dismissed.

In the present case the assignments of error raised no question as to the character of the punishment inflicted upon the accused. Nor do the facts of the present case call upon us to consider the validity of those portions of the Vermont statutes which concern intoxicating liquors as articles of interstate commerce.

But certain Federal questions are sufficiently presented in this record, which have been argued with great ability, and which it is our duty to now consider.

The first contention is that the information under which the plaintiff in error was tried and convicted was defective in such essential particulars as to deprive him of his liberty and property without "due process of law." It is said that the information does not charge any specific offense; that it does not state with any reasonable certainty the time when the offenses charged, or any or either of them, occurred; that the name of no person to whom liquor was alleged to have been sold, furnished, or given away is stated; that neither the place where the sales are claimed to have taken place, the kind or quantity of intoxicating liquor so disposed of, nor any other circumstance that would tend to identify the transactions referred to, is stated; that such an information does not protect the accused in the least against being prosecuted for one crime and convicted of another; that under this information it is and must remain utterly uncertain what particular one of many offenses the accused was convicted of; that the record of an acquittal or conviction upon such an information forms no bar to a second prosecution for the same offense.

While we are not relieved from considering these obligations by the mere fact that the offenses charged arose under a statute, and were proceeded in in a court of a state, it is yet 269]*obvious that our concern in them can go no further than to inquire whether the plaintiff in error was deprived of the rights and immunities secured to him by the Federal Constitution.

Several of the objections specified merely raise questions of form, and, as such, were conclusively ruled by the state court. But it is insisted that in all criminal prosecutions the accused must be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation against him; that in no case can there be, in criminal proceedings, due process of law where the accused is not thus informed, and that the information which he is to receive is that which will acquaint him with the essential particulars of the offense, so that he may appear in court prepared to meet every feature of the accusation against him.

Conceding that this is a correct statement of the rights of an accused person, and that, if deprived of such rights, he may properly invoke the protection of the Constitution of the United States, our reading of this record has not satisfied us that the plaintiff in error has any just grounds of complaint. We adopt, in this regard, the views and language of the supreme court of the state.

"The offense created by the statute is the provision of intoxicating liquors without the authority of law either by a sale, furnishing, or giving away. There are no circumstances necessary to be set out to constitute either of these acts an offense. The terms of the statute as clearly import the prohibited offense as any terms can. The offense is neither heightened nor lessened by, nor dependent upon, the kind or amount of intoxicating liquor sold, nor upon the person to whom the sale, furnishing, or giving away is made, nor upon the amount of money received, nor upon whether made by the respondent or by someone for him. None of these particulars need be set forth to notify the respondent of the offense with which he is charged, and called upon to answer, nor to apprise the jury of what they are to convict or acquit him, nor to apprise the court of the sentence which it should impose. The prescribed form covers the offense in the exact and easily understood language of the statute which creates *it. This is sufficient. . . . [270 It is not an ancient crime which has been from time immemorial clothed in special terms which, by long use, have become the most apt and definite ones to describe the exact crime. The statute sometimes prescribes the punishment of a common-law crime without defining it, or creates an offense and prescribes no form for an information. It such cases it is well held that the common-law requirements in charging it must be met. . . . [But it is sufficient to charge a statutory offense in the terms of the statute.] . . . The respondent contends that the prescribed form is defective in that it does not require the names of the persons to whom sales are claimed to have been made to be set forth; that sales must be made to some person. But this contention is based on the requirements of the common law, when applicable. The specification ordinarily would, and did in this case, supply this information. . . . It is also contended that the particulars of the kind of liquor, price, and name of the person to whom sold, should be set forth in the information, both to apprise the respondent of the evidence he has to meet, and to have the record protect him from a second conviction for the same offense. It is never necessary for the state to disclose what is merely its proof of the commission of the offense charged in the information. If the record does not itself identify the offense or offenses for which conviction has been had, on the trial of a subsequent prosecution, such identification may be made by parol testimony. If these particulars were set out in the information, resort might have to be had to parol proof to identify the offense for which conviction was had. It might occur that the same respondent made more than one sale of the same kind and quantity of liquor, to the same person, at the same price, at the same place, on the same day. Besides, by the common law, it has always been held that the prosecutor need not set forth the name of the person when unknown. It is sufficient to state that his name is unknown. . . . These particulars, of the kind, quantity, price, and person to whom sold, are seldom known to the prosecutor until revealed by the witness upon the stand. Without *these partic- [271 ulars the prescribed form answers every essential requirement of the common law in regard to informations or indictments. The prescribed form sets forth in clear language, easily to be understood, 'the cause and nature of the accusation.' . . . By the use of the words 'at divers times,' on the day named, it notifies him that he may be called upon to meet more than one offense committed in one of the ways named. The prosecution is never confined to prove the offense on the day specified in the information, if the proof is within the time limited for the prosecution of the offense. The accused can of right call upon the prosecutor to specify more fully what is claimed to be included under these general terms. This is analogous to the common counts in assumpsit in civil cases which grew up under the common law. The defendant in a civil case is entitled to notice of what he is called upon to meet, as much as a respondent in a criminal case, and for the same reasons. Under these common counts it has always been held that the plaintiff might show any number of claims of the class described, and, for this reason, that the defendant was entitled, as a matter of right, to a bill of particulars, or specifications, and that such specifications supplied what was lacking by the generality of the count, in regard to the particulars and number of similar claims which the plaintiff would call upon the defendant to litigate. In this view the information, aided by specifications, is good by the rules of the common law. But whether it be or not, the legislature has an undoubted right to change and mould the forms of procedure so long as it does not deprive the accused of any constitutional right. . . . This class of cases is not exceptional in its manner of trial. They are proceeded with like all other cases. The selection and empaneling of the jury, the rules of evidence, burden of proof, and procedure in the trial, are the same as in all other criminal cases. What has been said in regard to the scope of the information, aided by specifications, to which the respondent was entitled as a matter of right, and which was furnished to him, and in regard to the order and manner of his trial, makes the respondent's 272]trial a trial by 'due process*of law,' or 'in accordance with the law of the land,' within the varying definitions of those general terms as claimed by the respondent's counsel." State v. Hodgson, 66 Vt. 134.

It is argued that the defects or insufficiencies of the information cannot be supplied by the specification, because the latter is not required by any statute and is not a matter of right. If this assumption was well founded it would strengthen the criticism urged against the information. But that such assumption is not well founded is shown by the opinion of the supreme court of Vermont above quoted, wherein it is held that the accused under these proceedings is entitled to a specification as a matter of right.

The defendant being entitled to a specification as a matter of right, under the decision of the supreme court of the state, the question of the validity of the information in the absence of any specification is not presented by this case, and we therefore express no opinion upon it.

It is further claimed that the conviction of the plaintiff and his sentence to infamous punishment was without due process of law, because he was not indicted by a grand jury. Discussion of this contention is unnecessary, because it was the very matter considered in Hurtado v. California, 110 U. S. 516 [28: 232], where it was ruled that the words "due process of law" in the 14th Amendment of the Constitution of the United States do not necessarily require an indictment by a grand jury in a prosecution by a state for murder. The views expressed in that case have been approved and followed in a number of subsequent cases of which a few may be cited. Barbier v. Connolly, 113 U. S. 27 [28: 923]; Re Kemmler, 136 U. S. 436 [34: 519]; Ex parte Converse, 137 U. S. 624 [34: 796]; Hallinger v. Davis, 146 U. S. 314 [36: 986].

We concede the proposition, so earnestly urged on behalf of the plaintiff in error, that by the 14th Amendment it is made the right and the consequent duty of this court, when a case has been duly brought before it, to inquire whether, in the enactment and administration of the criminal laws of a state, it is sought to arbitrarily deprive any person of his life, liberty, or property, or to refuse him the equal *protection of the laws, and that [273 such inquiry is not precluded or ended by the mere fact that the judgment complained of was reached by proceedings in a state court in pursuance of the provisions of a state statute. But we are contented to close this discussion by quoting the language of this court in Ex parte Converse: "We repeat, as has been so often said before, that the 14th Amendment undoubtedly forbids any arbitrary deprivation of life, liberty, or property, and in the administration of criminal justice requires that no different or higher punishment shall be imposed on one than is imposed on all for like offenses, but it was not designed to interfere with the power of the state to protect the lives, liberty, and property of its citizens; nor with the exercise of that power in the adjudications of the courts of a state in administering the process provided by the law of the state."

claim by him against the government for a repayment of money thus paid on the ground that he was entitled to the fees.

Submitted October 26, 1897. Decided November 29, 1897.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Court of Claims in favor of Edgar M. Wilson, administrator, against the United States for certain fees claimed by him as consul general of the United States at the port of Yokohama, Japan. Reversed, with instructions to dismiss the petition.

See same case below, 31 Ct. Cl. 471.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Joseph McKenna, Attorney General, Felix Brannigan, Assistant Attorney, and Joshua Eric Dodge, Assistant Attorney General, for appellant.

Mr. John S. Mosby for appellee.

274] *Mr. Justice Peckham delivered the opinion of the court:

The court of claims in this case gave judgment in favor of the appellee upon these facts: Thomas B. Van Buren, a citizen of the United States, was appointed consul general of the United States at the port of Yokohama, Japan, and held office from June, 1874, until June, 1885. While at Yokohama, Mr. Van Buren received fees for certifying invoices of merchandise shipped from that port through the United States in bond to foreign countries amounting to the sum $4,115, which fees were paid into the Treasury of the United States under the rules, regulations, and requirements of the Departments of State and Treasury, requiring fees to be so accounted for and paid to the United States. There were 1,646 of these invoices. Of the merchandise so shipped, that covered by 523 of the invoices was stopped in transit, for consumption in the United States without further consular certificates, and the declarations or invoices and certificates made by the consul were accepted by the customs officers of the United States as sufficient. The fees collected for certifying these 523 invoices amounted to $1,307.50. The merchandise described in 478 of the 1,646 invoices passed in transit through the United States to foreign countries, and was exported from the United States. The fees collected for certifying these invoices amounted to $1,195. With regard to 645 of the 1,646 invoices, there was no evidence either that the merchandise described in the invoices was stopped in transit and entered for consumption in the United States, or that it passed in transit through the United States to foreign countries. The fees collected for certifying these invoices amounted to $1,612.50. Mr. Van Buren's accounts for the total of all these among other fees were settled at the Treasury Department, and in the settlements he was charged with these as for official fees.

The court of claims found that it was not shown that the reason for paying said fees into the treasury was to avoid controversy with any department of the government, or that Mr. Van Buren made any demand to have the fees refunded to him, or credited to him before said 275] accounts were finally settled, *or that before the final settlement of his accounts at the Treasury Department he made any objection or protest against said fees being charged to him as official fees. The court gave the claimant judgment for the total of the three sums above mentioned, being $4,115.

The judgment in this case was mainly based by the court below upon the case of United States v. Mosby, 133 U. S. 273 [33: 625], and it was there held that the invoices referred to in §§ 2853 and 2855, Revised Statutes, either as they stood originally, or as they were amended by the act of June 10, 1880, did not include invoices for the shipment of merchandise in transit through the United States to other countries, and that the law did not require a consul to issue certificates in such cases, that no provision was made for a fee for them in the regulations of 1874, or those of 1881, and that it did not appear that the regulations of the Treasury Department required a consul to perform any duty in relation to such goods. The claim of the claimant in regard to such fees was allowed as a proper claim against the government.

It is stated in the brief of counsel for the government herein that in the Mosby Case neither the court of claims nor this court was given the benefit of any information as to what transit invoices were, and it is now said that both the courts were mistaken in holding that the invoices in the Mosby Case were not those referred to in the above numbered sections of the Revised Statutes; and it is said that it now appears by the evidence before the court that such invoices are the identical invoices described by those sections, and that § 2860, in providing that, "no merchandise imported from any foreign place or country shall be admitted to an entry unless the invoice presented in all respects conforms to the requirements of §§ 2853, 2854, and 2855, and has thereon the certificate of a consul, vice consul, or commercial agent in those sections specified," makes it necessary to have the consular certificate given in this case.

We are not now called upon to question the decision in the Mosby Case. We think there is another ground upon which to base a reversal of the judgment herein, which is, *that [276 the payments made by Mr. Van Buren of the fees covered by his claim were wholly voluntary, and that the general rule applicable to voluntary payments should be enforced.

The petition in this case was not filed until the 30th of March, 1888, and Mr. Van Buren's term of service expired in June, 1885. From the commencement of that service in 1874 up to the termination of his office and the final settlement of his accounts, no whisper of any claim on his part against the government was ever heard from Mr. Van Buren. It does not appear that he had the least doubt that the government was entitled to all the fees paid over by him to it, and in all the various settlements of his accounts with the Treasury Department, and in his correspondence, so far as this record shows, no claim was ever made or hint given on his part that he had the least title to retain these fees or to recover them back if paid to the government. There is no pretense that he paid the fees into the treasury to avoid a controversy with any department of the government, or that he ever made any objection or protest against the fees being charged to him as official fees. The court of claims so finds in substance. If a voluntary payment can be made to the government, it seems to us that this is such a case, and unless it be declared that the law of voluntary payments is not applicable to the case of a payment by an official to the government, we think the payments made by the original claimant were voluntary. This is not a case of an order or direction for the payment of these moneys, given to Mr. Van Buren by the officers of the Treasury or State Departments; nor is it a case where the failure to pay the moneys might be regarded as disobedience to the peremptory order of a superior officer; nor a payment under duress. The facts show nothing but a voluntary payment of money to the government, without claim of any right to retain one penny of it.

In United States v. Lawson, 101 U. S. 164 [25: 860], the collector received an order in writing from the commissioner of customs, his superior, requiring him to account for all fees received by him as collector. Under that order he paid the fees in controversy into the treas-277] ury, and it was held that *having thus paid them pursuant to a peremptory order of his superior officer, he was not precluded from thereafter recovering them in a suit against the United States.

To the same effect is United States v. Ellsworth, 101 U. S. 170 [25: 862], where the ruling in the Lawson Case is followed. In the Ellsworth Case the court said, after referring to the penalties for noncompliance with the requirements of the law in paying over moneys: "Viewed in the light of these penal provisions, the payments in question made under the peremptory order of the commissioner cannot be regarded as voluntary in the sense that the party making them is thereby precluded from maintaining an action to recover back so much of the money paid as he was entitled to retain. Call it mistake of law or mistake of fact, the principles of equity forbid the United States to withhold the same from the rightful owner."

In both of the cases, in addition to the general law upon the subject of moneys received for the use of the United States to be paid into the treasury, there was a distinct and peremptory order that the moneys in question should be paid, and it was in compliance with such order from a superior officer that the moneys were paid.

In Swift & C. & B. Company v. United States, 111 U. S. 22 [28: 341], the payments were held to be not voluntary because the purchaser of the stamps from the government had to take them on the terms which the government imposed or else go out of business. In that case, however, it appeared that the leading manufacturers of matches, among whom was William H. Swift (who upon the organization of the claimant corporation in 1870 became one of its large stockholders and treasurer), had made repeated protests to the officers of the internal revenue bureau against the methods adopted by it in computing commissions for proprietary stamps sold to those who furnished their own dies and designs. It appeared that the rule of the department was one adhered to during the whole time of its existence, and it was announced by the internal revenue commissioner that such ruling would not be altered, and as it was necessary for those in the business to have the stamps in order to continue their business, it was held by this *court[278 that they were not obliged to continuously protest, and that settlements made with the treasury officials upon the basis of the correctness of the custom of the department in regard to the sale of stamps and commissions thereon did not bar the claimant's right to recover the moneys which the department ought to have paid but did not; that the position of the parties was such as to render these continuous protests unnecessary. Various cases are cited by Mr. Justice Matthews, in delivering the opinion of the court, showing what amounts to an involuntary payment.

In the Mosby Case, supra, it appears that the claimant asserted his right to the moneys and had correspondence with the officers of the department in relation thereto, and only paid the moneys to avoid a contest with his superior officers.

Nothing in any case cited is inconsistent with the view that the payments in this case were wholly voluntary in their nature, and as such cannot be recovered back.

For these reasons, without considering other questions appearing in the record, we think the judgment of the Court of Claims should be reversed, and the case remanded to that court with instructions to dismiss the petition.

IN ERROR to the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia to review the judgment of that court affirming a judgment entered upon a trial before a jury in favor of defendants, William G. Douglas et al., in an action brought by William F. Holtzman to recover possession of a lot in the city of Washington. Affirmed.

See same case below, 5 App. D. C. 397.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Arthur A. Birney for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. Job Barnard, James S. Edwards, and Henry E. Davis for defendants in error.

Mr. Justice Peckham delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action of ejectment, brought to recover the possession of a lot in the city of Washington, designated as lot No. 8 in square No. 941. The defendants set up adverse possession as a defense. Upon the trial before a jury a verdict was rendered in favor of the defendants, upon which judgment was entered, and an appeal taken to the court 280]of appeals of *the District of Columbia, where the judgment was in all things affirmed (5 App. D.C. 397), and the plaintiff has brought the record here for review.

It appeared on the trial that the record title to the lot had been, at the time of his death, in one David A. Hall, who died December 24, 1870, and the heirs at law of Hall, by divers conveyances, conveyed this lot to the plaintiff in fee. The plaintiff proved also that the defendants at the commencement of this action were in possession of the premises through one Richard Rothwell, their tenant, and that they claimed to own the same as heirs at law of William Douglas, who died in September, 1865. The defendants, on their part, proved a deed of conveyance to William Douglas of the lot in question from the corporation of the city of Washington, the deed reciting a sale of the property for unpaid taxes assessed on the land in the name of David A. Hall, the deed being dated July 6, 1865, and recorded July 12, 1865, in the proper office. The deed was admitted in evidence to show color of title in the defendants.

The facts upon which the defense of adverse possession arises have been so well summarized in the opinion of the court of appeals, which was delivered by Mr. Justice Morris, that we take his statement thereof, as follows: "It was testified on behalf of the defendants, that, some time in the latter part of the same year, 1865, one Richard Rothwell, a stonecutter and builder, who owned and occupied an adjoining lot, deposited upon the rear of the lot in controversy some pontoons, which he had purchased from the United States, and which he stored there until he could make some disposition of them; and that he afterwards used a part of this lot for the deposit of stone and marble, which he used in his business. He testified that he had deposited three or four wagon loads of marble there as early as the year 1867; and that some of the pontoons remained on the lot four or five years. He also testified that, in the year 1870, he commenced to deposit stone there in large quantities; and that in 1872 he erected a small shed on the lot in which to carry on his work, and which he replaced with a larger structure in or about the year 1882.

*"Some time in the year 1867, Mrs. [281 Douglas, the widow of William Douglas, apparently acting on behalf of his estate or of the estate of their children, had an interview with Rothwell and came to an understanding with him with reference to his continued occupancy of the lot, in pursuance of which understanding he agreed to pay as rent to her annually therefor a sum of money equal to the amount of taxes that should annually be assessed upon it, and he did so pay rent to her until her death in 1887; and after her death he paid the rent to her daughter, a Mrs. Wirt, down to about the time of the institution of this suit. During all this time, that is from 1867 to 1889, Rothwell continued to occupy the property, and paid rent therefor to the Douglases; and the latter paid the taxes annually for all the years from 1868 to 1893, both inclusive, except for the year 1870, during which there was an interregnum in consequence of the establishment about that time of a territorial form of government in the District of Columbia, the assessment of the property having been in the name of William Douglas since the year 1868, inclusive.

"By a stipulation filed in the cause since the argument, in order to supplement some omission in the printed record, it appears that, at the death of William Douglas, in 1865, four of his children were adults and two minors; and that Mrs. Douglas, the widow, was appointed guardian to the two latter, and filed in her guardianship accounts for several years the annual receipts for taxes on this lot paid by her, and was allowed credit for them by the court. It therefore appears that, with reference to this lot, she acted, not for herself or on her own individual account, but on behalf of the estate that was then in her children.

"There was a proposition on the part of Mrs. Douglas, apparently about the time of Rothwell's attornment to her, to inclose the lot with a fence. But to this Rothwell objected, on the ground that it would interfere with his use of it and with free access to it of his horses and wagons; and the project was abandoned, so that the lot was never actually inclosed, and the only evidences of occupation consisted in such use of the property as has been indicated. *The streets had not been actually [282 laid out in that neighborhood otherwise than by their delineation on the map of the city; and the whole region was an open field with no definite landmarks to indicate to the casual observer the actual location of this lot."

This action was commenced on the 31st of May, 1889, and, as stated in the brief of the counsel for the plaintiff, the vital question for the jury was, Were the defendants in adverse possession prior to May 31, 1869? The evidence is uncontradicted that from a period as early as 1867 the defendants through their tenant, Rothwell, were in possession of the premises, and such possession was continued up to the commencement of this action; but it is claimed that because Rothwell had entered upon the land in 1865, without claiming to own the same or to be entitled to possession, and had deposited the pontoons and marble mentioned in the foregoing statement of facts, that he thereby became a tenant of the plaintiff's predecessors in title, and that he could not change the character of his possession, as being in subordination to them, by any agreement between himself and Mrs. Douglas without giving notice to them that such an agreement had been made.

The doctrine which the plaintiff seeks to set up, we think, is not applicable to the facts of this case. After the purchase at the tax sale, the delivery of the deed and the recording thereof, Mrs. Douglas in 1867 claimed title to the land and demanded possession thereof from Rothwell, and by reason of the understanding then arrived at between herself and Rothwell he became the tenant of Mrs. Douglas as the representative of the heirs at law of William Douglas, and such tenancy continued up to the commencement of this action. She went to him under a claim of ownership and of the right to immediate possession of the lot as owner. He then acknowledged her right, became her tenant, and paid rent to her. That certainly placed Mrs. Douglas, as the representative of the heirs, in possession of the lot. From that time the facts are sufficient upon which to base a claim of adverse possession. We think it was inaugurated when 283] Rothwell, *under his agreement with Mrs. Douglas, acknowledged her right and paid her rent, and it was immaterial, so far as the heirs are concerned, that Rothwell had before that time entered upon the lot, although under no claim of title and presumably in subordination to the title of plaintiff's predecessors. Harvey v. Tyler, 69 U. S. 2 Wall. 328 [17: 871]. If Rothwell were himself asserting a title by adverse possession, while coming into possession in acknowledgment of and under the title of the owners, there might be an opportunity for the application of the doctrine contended for by plaintiff, and in such case Rothwell could not set up title by adverse possession while entering in subordination to the title of the owner, unless he first vacated and then retook possession as a hostile entry, or did some act necessarily evincing an intention to put an end to his tenancy. We are not dealing with Rothwell's rights or title. The defendants did all they were called upon to do in order to take possession and inaugurate an adverse holding, when they came with their tax deed, claimed to own the property described in it, and exercised an act of ownership by letting the lot to Rothwell as a tenant at a certain rent. When Rothwell recognized the claim of ownership and remained in possession from that time in subordination to the rights of Mrs. Douglas and the heirs at law, their adverse possession, so far as this point is concerned, was sufficiently inaugurated. Mrs. Douglas was no party or privy to the prior entry of Rothwell, and therefore, whatever the circumstances as proved in this case regarding such prior entry, her rights and those of the heirs cannot be in any way affected thereby. There is no pretense of any fraud or concealment in the case by anyone, certainly not by Mrs. Douglas. Neither she nor the heirs were bound, in order to maintain their rights, to give any written or verbal notice to the former owners that they were in possession through Rothwell; nor did the possession of Rothwell, as tenant of the Douglas heirs, fail to commence at the time of this agreement because he did not give notice to the former owners of his recognition of the title and right to the possession as claimed by Mrs. Douglas.

We are also of the opinion that there was evidence to be *submitted to the jury, that[284 the possession of the defendants was in all other respects adverse within the meaning of the law upon the subject for more than twenty years before the commencement of this action. There is no doubt that the entry of defendants by means of the agreement mentioned was under a claim of title on the part of Mrs. Douglas and those whom she represented as the heirs at law of William Douglas. There was enough to authorize the jury to find that the possession was notorious and exclusive, continuous, actual, open, and adverse. Ward v. Cochran, 150 U. S. 597 [37: 1195].

Payment of the taxes, as described in the above statement of facts, is very important and strong evidence of a claim of title; and the failure of the plaintiff's predecessors to make any claim to the lot or to pay the taxes themselves, is some evidence of an abandonment of any right in or claim to the property. In Ewing v. Burnet, 36 U. S. 11 Pet. 41 [9: 624], it was held by this court that the payment of taxes on land for twenty-four successive years by the party in possession was powerful evidence of the claim of right to the whole lot upon which the taxes were paid. The same principle is held in Fletcher v. Fuller, 120 U. S. 534, 552 [30: 759, 764]. It is some evidence that the possession was under a claim of right and was adverse.

Although there was no fence around this lot during the period in question, yet it was occupied by the tenant for the purposes of his business, that of marble and stone cutting, and although every foot of the property was not covered by his material, yet it was placed upon the lot in a convenient manner to be used by him in the prosecution of his business, and in a manner which showed that his possession was not in connection with any others but was exclusive and perfect in himself.

We agree with the court below when, speaking through Mr. Justice Morris, it says that, "short of an actual inclosure, it is not easy to conceive of a use and occupation more sharply distinctive and adverse than the conversion of the property into a stone yard with the stone practically scattered all over it, according to the testimony of one or more of the witnesses. Nor should the fact be ignored in this connection, that for *upwards of twenty years the rec-[285 ord owners of this property wholly neglected their duties to the public in regard to it, never sought to pay the taxes, and permitted the defendants to discharge the burden which it was incumbent upon themselves to bear, and it might well be supposed that they had abandoned the property and acquiesced in the title which the defendants had acquired."

At the request of the plaintiff, the judge charged the jury that, "to defeat the claim of the plaintiffs in this action upon the defense of adverse possession the jury must find from the evidence that the defendants, in person or by their tenants, have for more than twenty years prior to the 31st of May, 1889, held actual, exclusive, continuous, open, notorious, and adverse possession of the said premises, and they cannot extend their possession by tacking it to the prior possession of any person who, during such prior possession, did not claim any title or right to the premises." Ward v. Cochran, 150 U. S. 597 [37: 1195].

This charge contains a statement of all the requisites for constituting an adverse possession according to the above-cited case.

And the jury were instructed that the defense of adverse possession was an affirmative one, and that it was incumbent upon the defendants to establish it by a clear preponderance of proof, and if the proof were equally balanced, they must find for the plaintiff.

At the request of the defendants the court gave the following instructions to the jury:

"If the jury find from the evidence that William Douglas, the ancestor of the defendants, bought at a tax sale held by the late corporation of Washington, so called, the property in controversy in this case, and paid the price bid for it by him at such sale, and received from said corporation of Washington a deed to said property, which was by him duly filed for record and recorded in the land records of the District of Columbia more than twenty years prior to the commencement of this suit; that thereupon the said property was assessed to the said William Douglas on the tax 286] books of the city of Washington, *and the taxes thereon from that time until the beginning of this suit paid by the said William Douglas or his successors in title, the defendants in this case; that at a period of time more than twenty years before the commencement of this suit the said property was rented on behalf of the defendants to a person who took the same and held possession thereof as tenant of the defendants for the purposes of a stone yard, paying rent therefor from the date of making such arrangement with the defendants; and that, although the said property was not inclosed by a fence, yet the person so renting the same, either upon the whole or a part thereof during his occupancy, deposited stone used by him in his business, and that such use and possession of said property was continued by the occupant thereof actually, exclusively, continuously, openly, notoriously, adversely, and uninterruptedly for a period of twenty years next before the commencement of this suit, then the jury is instructed that the defendants are entitled to recover."

The plaintiff excepted to the granting of such request and to the charge as given. For the reasons already suggested, we think the exception not well founded. The charge as given was substantially correct, and there was evidence in the case upon which to found it. The first, second, and third requests to charge, made by counsel for plaintiff, involve the questions above discussed, and were properly refused. There are no other questions of sufficient doubt to render their discussion necessary. We are of opinion there is no error in the record, and the judgment must be affirmed.

Construction of written contract — courts of admiralty act upon principles of equity—construction of bottomry bonds—loss of ship and cargo — recovery for loss of ship—master's authority to give bottomry bond—amendment of answer to a libel.

1. The lack of ambiguity in certain words when standing alone does not necessarily relieve them from the necessity of construction in ascertaining the meaning of the entire contract.
2. Courts of admiralty act upon enlarged principles of equity, rather than the strict rules of common law.
3. Bottomry bonds are favored in courts of admiralty and every fair presumption is to be made to support them when there is no suspicion of fraud.
4. The loss of a ship and cargo on which a bottomry bond has been given, including a portion of the cargo which had been transhipped to another vessel, does not make the bond void so as to relieve the cargo transhipped, although the defeasance release provides that the bond shall be void in case of the "loss of the said vessel."
5. A shipowner who recovers an award for the loss of his ship from another vessel which was in fault for a collision is liable, to the extent of such recovery, to the creditors of his ship, under U. S. Rev. Stat. §§ 4282 et seq., limiting his liability to the amount or value of his interest in the vessel and freight.
6. A bottomry bond will not be presumed to have been executed by the master without proper authority, where it does not appear whether he had communication with the owners or not, or whether such communication was feasible or not, but it does appear that the hypothecation was necessary and for the best interests of the owners.
7. Refusal to permit the amendment of an answer to a libel in admiralty by setting up laches and res judicata is not an abuse of discretion, when the respondent was not misled and any loss sustained was the result of his own conduct, while the alleged decision was not on the merits.

ON A WRIT OF CERTIORARI to the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit to review a decree of that court reversing the decree of the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York in favor of libellants in this action brought by Brice Alan Miller et al., libellants, against Edward O'Brien, to recover a proportion of the sum paid on a bottomry and respondentia bond on account of loss at sea. Decree of Circuit Court of Appeals reversed, and that of the District Court affirmed.

See same case below, 35 Fed. Rep. 779, 59 Fed. Rep. 621, 35 U. S. App. 138.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Sidney Chubb for appellant.

Messrs. Wilhelmus Mynderse and Butler, Notman, Joline, and Mynderse for appellees.

Mr. Justice White delivered the opinion of the court:

By a charter party executed at Valparaiso, Chili, on April 5, 1884, Gibbs & Company, of the place named, chartered the ship Andrew Johnson to carry a cargo of nitrate of soda from Iquique and Caleta "to any safe port in the United Kingdom or on the continent between Havre and Hamburg, both included, as ordered." After loading at the places named, the Andrew Johnson, pursuant to orders, sailed on July 15, 1884, for Hamburg, the cargo on board being consigned to the order of Antony Gibbs & Sons, a firm doing business in London. On the 4th of August following, the vessel, being in distress, put into Callao. Certain necessary repairs, which were advised by a duly appointed board of survey, were made, and, upon the recommendation of the board, 8,449 bags, or about 1,200 tons, of the nitrate of soda were transhipped to the British bark Mary J. Leslie, to be conveyed by that vessel to Hamburg.

To defray the expenses incurred in the port of refuge, the master of the Andrew Johnson executed a bottomry and respondentia bond to the firm of Grace Brothers & Company. This bond not only bound the ship Andrew Johnson and her cargo and freight, but also, in express terms, hypothecated the cargo tran shipped to the Mary J. Leslie. Although both cargoes were thus bound, the bond in its defeasance clause provided that it should be void "if during the said voyage an utter loss of the said vessel by fire, enemies, pirates, the 289] perils *of the sea or navigation, or any other casualty shall unavoidably happen." A copy of the bond is found in the margin.†

The two vessels sailed for Hamburg. The Leslie arrived, *but the Johnson perished at sea as the result of a collision with the British ship Thirlmere. After the arrival of the Leslie at Hamburg, demand was made upon the representatives *of Antony [290] [291] Gibbs & Sons, the consignees of the nitrate of soda, which had been shipped on the Leslie, for payment in full of the amount of the bond, and in order to obtain possession of the cargo, the consignees entered into an agreement by which the question of the liability of the nitrate of soda on the Leslie for the entire amount of the bond was to be determined by arbitration, the arbitrators to be selected by and their decision to be binding upon the respective parties. It is to be inferred that the only question controverted before the arbitrators was whether the use of the words "said vessel" in the defeasance clause of the bond operated to avoid the bond in consequence of the wreck of the Andrew Johnson and the loss of her cargo. The German lawyers who were selected as arbitrators found that the nitrate of soda on board the Leslie was bound for the whole amount of the bond, and that, therefore, the consignees were not entitled to the cargo unless they paid the bond. Their award was, as follows:

"We formulate the question which you, in the names of Messrs. Antony Gibbs & Sons and Messrs. Baring Brothers & Co. have submitted to our judgment, as follows:

"Whether the portion of the cargo of nitrate of soda of the *Andrew Johnson, brought [292] home per Mary J. Leslie, is liable for the whole amount of the bottomry bond, which was signed in Callao, and whether, consequently, the receiver of this portion of the cargo has to pay the whole of the bottomry bond, provided the value of this portion of the cargo is not less than the amount of the bottomry debt.

"This question we must answer in the affirmative, because, according to the law here, ship, freight, and cargo of the Andrew Johnson, as well as the portion of the cargo which was transhipped into the Mary J. Leslie, are jointly liable for the whole amount raised on bottomry at Callao, and, therefore, the Andrew Johnson and her cargo having become a total loss, the holder of the bottomry bond can come upon that portion of the cargo which was shipped by the Mary J. Leslie for the whole amount of his claim.

"Some doubt might be raised as to whether, according to the wording of the bottomry bond, the money was not lent or appeared to be lent contingent upon the safety of the An-

†Know all men by these presents, that I, James H. Killeran, master mariner and commander of the ship or vessel, called the Andrew Johnson, of Thomaston, Maine, of the measurement of nineteen hundred and thirty-eight tons or thereabouts, now lying in the port of Callao, am held and firmly bound to Messrs. Grace Brothers & Co., carrying on business at Lima and Callao under the firm of Grace Brothers & Company, in the penal sum of thirteen thousand, two hundred and thirty-seven Peruvian silver soles 72-100, at 40 pence to the sole, equal to two thousand two hundred and twelve pounds 5*s.* 9*d.* of good and lawful money of Great Britain, to be paid to the said Grace Brothers & Co., or any of them, or to their or any of their orders, certain attorney, executors, administrators, or assigns, or to such person or persons as they or any of them shall appoint by indorsement thereon in the name of their firm of Grace Brothers & Co. to receive the same.

For which payment, to be well and faithfully made, I bind myself, my heirs, executors, or administrators, and also the hull, boats, tackle, apparel, and furniture of said vessel and her cargo of nitrate of soda, including about twelve hundred tons of nitrate soda, transhipped on board the British bark Mary J. Leslie, of Liverpool, N. S., of 815 tons register, and of which W. S. MacLeod is now master, and the freight to be earned and become payable in respect thereof, firmly by these presents, sealed with my seal. Dated this fifteenth day of September, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and eighty-four.

Whereas, the said vessel lately sailed from Caleta Buena, laden with a cargo of nitrate of soda, bound therewith to Hamburg in Germany, and during the drew Johnson, and becoming due only after her arrival at her port of destination, but becoming null and void in the event of her non-arrival. We are of opinion, however, that this interpretation is not consistent with the real intention of the contracting parties, and that the wording referred to has originated in the not sufficiently careful use and employment of a form of bond which happened to be at hand. This seems the less doubtful to us for this reason, that if the bottomry bond were interpreted in this manner, the cargo of the Mary J. Leslie would be entirely liberated, after the loss of the Andrew Johnson occurred, and would not even bear a portion of the bottomry debt, which nevertheless had arisen out of a case of general average. Manifestly this cannot have been the intention of the parties interested."

Antony Gibbs & Sons paid the amount of the bond for account of Gibbs & Company, the consignors. Subsequently, the owners of the Andrew Johnson commenced legal proceedings against the Thirlmere to hold that vessel responsible for the collision by which the Johnson and her cargo were lost. The Thirlmere availed herself of the statute of Great Brit-

293]ain *limiting the liability of shipowners, and the result was an award finding the Thirlmere to be wholly at fault, and condemning her to pay the loss caused by the sinking of the Johnson. As their proportion of the ascertained value of the Thirlmere, the owners of the Johnson for ship and freight were allowed the sum of £6,557, 9*s*., 6*d*., but from this amount there was deducted about £1,500 for certain expenses. In the proceedings in question, the owners of the nitrate of soda which was on the Johnson also recovered their proportion of the value of the Thirlmere. On account of the loss of the Andrew Johnson, the Boston Marine Insurance Company paid to her owner the sum of $30,000, less $2,825.49, the amount of a premium note with interest, and out of the sum received by the owner of the Andrew Johnson for the ship and freight from the value of the Thirlmere, the owner of the Andrew Johnson, in April, 1896, remitted to the insurance company as its share thereof the sum of $11,456.05, and to correct some mistake in calculation the sum of $35.60 was also subsequently paid by the shipowner to the insurance company.

The present suit was commenced on July 20, 1887, by a libel in personam against the owner of the Andrew Johnson to recover the prosecution of the said voyage sprang a leak, whereby she took in water at sundry times to such an extent that it was deemed expedient by the said master, for the safety of the vessel and the benefit of all concerned, to bear up for Callao, which was accordingly done, and on arrival at Callao aforesaid the vessel was duly surveyed by competent surveyors and certain repairs were recommended to be done to enable the said vessel to continue the voyage with safety, and also to tranship to another vessel about twelve hundred tons of the cargo laden on board the aforesaid Andrew Johnson in order to enable her to proceed on her voyage with perfect safety.

And whereas all necessary repairs and supplies have been made to the said vessel, and the said portion of cargo transhipped to the Mary J. Leslie to enable her to prosecute her said voyage, and she is now in a seaworthy condition and ready to proceed to sea, but the said James H. Killeran having unavoidably incurred certain debts for such repairs and other necessary and lawful matters and things relating to his said vessel which he is totally unable to defray and make good, save and except upon the security of the bottom of his said vessel and her cargo and freight, hath been necessitated to raise the sum of thirteen thousand, two hundred and seventy-three Peruvian soles, 72-100 silver, or its equivalent in British sterling, for the payment of the debts incurred as aforesaid, and to enable the said vessel to proceed to sea on the said intended voyage, and which sum the said master has been unable to obtain on his own credit or that of the owners of the said vessel, or in any other way than by bottomry and hypothecation of the said vessel, her boats, apparel, cargo, and freight.

And whereas the said Grace Brothers & Co. have, at the request of the above-bounden James H. Killeran, agreed to lend and advance to him the sum of thirteen thousand, two hundred and seventy-three soles, 72-100 silver, or its equivalent, at forty pence as aforesaid, in British sterling, for the purposes aforesaid, upon his executing this present bond or obligation and hypothecation of the said vessel, her boats and apparel and her cargo, including that portion of the cargo transhipped to the Mary J. Leslie, and the freight to be earned and become payable in respect of the said voyage, and the said Grace Brothers & Co. are contented to stand to and bear the risk, hazard, and adventure thereof upon the hull, body, or keel of the said vessel Andrew Johnson, her boats, tackle, apparel, and furniture, together with the cargo laden on board as aforesaid, and the freight to be earned and become payable as aforesaid and for securing the repayment of the said sum of thirteen thousand, two hundred and seventy-three Peruvian soles, 72-100 silver, or its equivalent in British sterling, as aforesaid, the loan whereof is hereby acknowledged, he, the said James H. Killeran, doth by these presents mortgage, hypothecate, and charge the said vessel, her boats, tackle, apparel and furniture, and her cargo, including that portion of the cargo transhipped to the Mary J. Leslie, and the freight to be earned and become payable in respect of the said voyage, unto the said Grace Brothers & Co., their executors, administrators, and assigns.

Now, the condition of this obligation is such, that if the said vessel shall forthwith set sail from Callao aforesaid, and without unnecessary delay or deviation proceed on her intended voyage to Hamburg, and if the above-bounden James H. Killeran shall and do within the space of five days next after the arrival of the vessel at her final port of destination, and before commencing to discharge the cargo free of any average whatever at the then current rate of exchange on London, well and truly pay or cause to be paid unto the said Grace Brothers & Co. or any of them, their or any of their order, attorneys or attorney, executors, administrators, or assigns, or unto such person or persons as they or any of them shall appoint by indorsement under their or his hand or hands in the name of their or his firm of Grace Brothers & Co., or otherwise, upon this present obligation the sum of two thousand, two hundred and twelve pounds, 5*s*. 9*d*. British sterling money, being the principal money of this obligation, and the further sum of three hundred and eighty-seven pounds three shillings of like money for the maritime interest or bottomry premium thereon, at the rate of seventeen pounds, 10 per centum, making together the sum of two thousand, five hundred and ninety-nine pounds, 8*s*. 9*d*. British sterling, and also do and shall on demand, well and truly pay or cause to be paid unto the said Grace Brothers & Co., or any of them, or to their or any of their order, attorneys, indorsers, executors, administrators, or assigns, all such costs, charges, and expenses as they or any of them shall or may have incurred, sustained, or be put to in or about the recovery of the aforesaid principal money and premium, or any part thereof, or otherwise howsoever in the premises.

Or if during the said voyage an utter loss of the said vessel by fire, enemies, pirates, the perils of the sea or navigation, or any other casualty, shall unavoidably happen to be sufficiently proved by the said James H. Killeran, then and in either of the said cases this obligation shall be void, or otherwise to be and remain in full force and virtue.

In testimony whereof, the said James H. Killeran hath, to these presents, and to a duplicate and triplicate thereof, set his hand and seal after careful reading, in the presence of the undersigned witnesses, the day and year first before written.

due proportion of the sum paid on the bond. Those joined as libellants were eleven in number; that is, all the members composing the firm of Gibbs & Company, the consignors of the nitrate of soda, and the members of the firm of Antony Gibbs & Sons, the consignees. The original libel is not in the record. Exceptions to it were filed on the ground that it did not state the nature of the action and that it did not state a cause of action. On June 6, 1888, the district judge overruled the exception to the want of clearness in the averments of the libel, but maintained the exception of no cause of action. Although the learned judge found that the bottomry bond had not been avoided by the loss of the Andrew Johnson and her cargo, and therefore that the payment made at Hamburg was necessary, he yet concluded that as the Andrew Johnson and her cargo had proved a total loss, nothing having been alleged in the libel as to a recovery by reason of such loss, the libellants were precluded 294] from *enforcing their claims in personam against the owner of the Johnson in consequence of the provision of the acts of Congress limiting a shipowner's liability for the acts and contracts of the master to the value of the ship and freight. 35 Fed. Rep. 779. As a result, on the 27th of June, 1888, an order was entered sustaining the exception of no cause of action, and directing that, unless the libel were amended, it be dismissed with costs. An amended libel was filed in July, 1888, to which an exception of no cause of action was again sustained, with leave further to amend. On January 4, 1889, the libel was for the second time amended, and this was also excepted to, on the ground of ambiguity, and that it did not state a cause of action. On the 24th of October, 1890, the libel was again amended by averring the loss of the Johnson, the fact that it had occurred by collision with the Thirlmere, the institution of proceedings against the Thirlmere by the owner of the Johnson, and the recovery in those proceedings on the ground that the collision had been caused solely by the fault of the former vessel. In June, 1891, respondent filed exceptions and an answer to this amended libel. The answer, among other things, averred as follows:

"This respondent admits that the owners of the ship Thirlmere, having taken appropriate proceedings under the statutes of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, obtained a decree limiting their liability for said collision to a certain sum, which they thereupon paid into the court, and which said sum was distributed between the libellants and the respondent herein, and other parties and their attorneys, in part satisfaction of the damages by each of them sustained by reason of said collision, but this respondent denies that he received the said sum of £6,557, 9*s*., 6*d*., and avers that the amount received by him was much less than said sum."

No allusion was made in the pleadings of the respective parties to the fact that the owner of the Andrew Johnson had received the benefit of any insurance upon the vessel.

After the taking of proof the cause was heard on the exceptions and merits on November 23, 295] 1893. At the outset *of the hearing the trial court overruled all the exceptions to the third amended libel but that of no cause of action, and referred this latter exception to the merits. Before the case was finally submitted the respondent moved the court to be allowed to amend his answer so as to plead two additional and distinct defenses:

"First, to as much of the libellants' claim as arises out of the limited-liability proceedings in the English court as to the Thirlmere, the defense of laches on the part of the libellant in not sooner bringing that matter before the court.

"Also as to the same portion of his claim, the defense res judicata, because passed on by the English court."

This request was refused and exceptions to the refusal were noted. The court, on the merits, held that the bottomry bond, at the time of its payment, was a valid obligation; that in view of the fact that the bond embraced, not only the cargo on the Johnson, but also the cargo on the Mary J. Leslie, that the words "said vessel" in the defeasance clause must be considered as referring to the cargo on both vessels and therefore, the obligations of the bond were not avoided by the loss of the Johnson and her cargo; that the owners of the Johnson having recovered from the Thirlmere, up to the value of the latter vessel, damages for the collision, were not discharged from personal liability under the acts of Congress, inasmuch as the sum recovered from the Thirlmere was greater than the amount sought to be enforced in personam against the owner. 59 Fed. Rep. 621. In conformity to the opinion of the court, an interlocutory decree was entered on April 3, 1894, referring the matter to a special commissioner to ascertain and report the amount the libellants were entitled to recover. On April 10, 1894, the respondent again applied to the court for leave to amend his answer by setting up the two additional defenses of laches and res judicata, and the request was again denied. On June 5, 1894, the report of the commissioner was filed, finding the libellants entitled to the principal sum of $6,091.73, and on July 16, 1894, a final decree for that sum with interest and costs was duly entered. By the final decree seven of the libellants, that is to say, those who composed the firm of *Antony Gibbs & Sons, were dismissed [296 on the ground of a want of interest, the court having found that the bond was paid by the consignees for account of the consignors, and they therefore were alone interested in the suit. On appeal to the circuit court of appeals the judgment of the trial court was reversed. The appellate court concluded that the words "said vessel" in the defeasance clause of the bond were free from ambiguity, and left no room for construction, and, therefore, that the loss of the Andrew Johnson with her cargo had operated to avoid the bond according to its tenor, and that the payment made of the amount by the consignees was hence unnecessary, and gave rise to no legal claim against the master or owner of the Johnson. 35 U. S. App. 138 [67 Fed. Rep. 605]. In consequence of the allowance of a writ of certiorari, the cause is here for review.

In the discussion at bar many minor questions have been pressed upon our attention, but the pivotal controversy rests upon the as-certainment of the true meaning of the bottomry bond, and the obligations, if any, which arose from its payment. We forego the present consideration of the more unimportant questions in order to at once approach the fundamental issues in the cause. The libellants assert that, from the terms of the bond as a whole, it manifestly results that the cargo of the Leslie was liable despite the loss of the Johnson and her cargo; that hence, the consignees of the cargo, on the Leslie, were obligated to pay the bond, and that on their doing so there arose a legal duty on the owner of the Johnson to pay the proper proportion thereof, which obligation, it is claimed, can be enforced despite the loss of the ship, since the owner had recovered and retained the amount awarded against the Thirlmere. On the other hand, the respondent asserts that the words of the bond providing for its avoidance in case of the loss of "said vessel" are free from ambiguity and give no room for construction, and that even if this be not the case in consequence of the loss of the Johnson, the consignors who paid the bond are not entitled, under the limited liability acts, to recover any proportion thereof.

There can be no doubt that, considered in [297] themselves and *alone, there is no ambiguity in the words found in the clause of the contract providing that "if during said voyage an utter loss of the said vessel by fire, enemies, pirates, the perils of the sea or navigation, or any other casualty, shall inevitably happen, . . . this obligation shall be void." But the question presented involves not the interpretation of this language apart from the whole agreement, but is, on the contrary, the ascertainment of the meaning of the entire contract. The fallacy which underlies the assertion as to want of all ambiguity in the bond arises, therefore, from presupposing that in order to establish want of ambiguity in a contract a few words can be segregated from the entire context, and that because the words thus set apart are not intrinsically ambiguous, there is no room for construing the contract itself. In other words, the confusion of thought consists in failing to distinguish between the contract as a whole and some of the words found therein. If the erroneous theory were the rule, then, in every case, it would be impossible to arrive at the meaning of a contract, in the event of difference between the contracting parties, since each would select particular words upon which they relied, and thus frustrate a consideration of the whole agreement. The elementary canon of interpretation is, not that particular words may be isolatedly considered, but that the whole contract must be brought into view and interpreted with reference to the nature of the obligations between the parties, and the intention which they have manifested in forming them. Boardman v. Reed, 31 U. S. 6 Pet. 328 [8: 415]; Chesapeake & O. Canal Co. v. Hill, 82 U. S. 15 Wall. 94, [21: 64].

This general rule of construction should especially guide a court of admiralty in interpreting a contract of bottomry and respondentia.

In the exercise of their jurisdiction with respect to such bonds, courts of admiralty are not governed by the strict rules of the common law, but act upon enlarged principles of equity (per Story, J., in The Virgin [The Virgin v. Vyfhius], 33 U. S. 8 Pet. 550 [8: 1041]), and the same learned justice, in the case of Pope v. Nickerson, 8 Story, 486, said: "A court of admiralty in cases within its civil jurisdiction, acts as a court of equity, and construes instruments, *as a court or equity does, with [298] a large and liberal indulgence."

To quote the language of the judicial committee of the Privy Council in The Prince George, 4 Moore, P. C. C. 28: "Bottomry bonds, for the benefit of the shipowners and the general advantage of commerce, are greatly favored in courts of admiralty, and where there is no suspicion of fraud every fair presumption is to be made to support them."

We reach, then, under the light of these principles, the consideration of the contract, for the purpose of ascertaining its meaning and enforcing the intention of the parties to be derived from all the stipulations therein found. There can be no doubt that the terms of the bond included, not only the Andrew Johnson and her cargo, but the cargo transhipped on the Leslie, for the bond says: "For which payment, to be well and faithfully made, I bind myself, my heirs, executors, or administrators, and also the hull, boats, tackle, apparel, and furniture of the said vessel and her cargo of nitrate of soda, including about 1,200 tons of nitrate of soda, transhipped on board the British bark Mary J. Leslie, of Liverpool, N. S., of 815 tons register, and of which W. S. MacLeod is now master, and the freight to be earned and become payable in respect thereof."

In the recitals of the bond, where a statement is made of the facts creating the necessity for the loan, the intention of the master to include the cargo transhipped on the Leslie is also unequivocally expressed. Likewise in the recitals which relate to the conditions upon which the lenders have agreed to advance the money required, it is again stated that they have consented so to do upon the master's executing "this present bond or obligation and hypothecation of the said vessel, her boats and apparel, and her cargo, including that portion of the cargo transhipped to the Mary J. Leslie, and the freight to be earned and become payable in respect to the said cargo, and the said Grace Brothers are contented to stand to and bear the risk, hazard, and adventure thereof upon the hull, body, or keel of the said vessel Andrew Johnson, her boat, tackle, apparel, and furniture, together with the cargo laden on *board as aforesaid, and the freight to [299] be earned and become payable as aforesaid, and for securing the repayment of the said sum . . . he, the said James H. Killeran, doth by these presents mortgage, hypothecate, and charge the said vessel, her boats, tackle apparel, and furniture, and her cargo, including that portion of the cargo transhipped to the Mary J. Leslie and the freight to be earned and become payable in respect to the said voyage, unto the said Grace Brothers, their executors, administrators, and assigns."

The cargo on the Leslie having been hypothecated along with that on the Johnson, and the bond declaring that it was upon the faith of such hypothecation that the money was advanced, the claim that because of the use of the word "vessel" in the singular, the bond was to be avoided by the loss of the Johnson, despite the arrival of the Leslie, amounts to contending that although both parties declared that the money was lent on the faith of both cargoes, and that without the pledge of both it would not have been advanced, yet that they immediately stipulated that it should be secured upon only one of the objects hypothecated.

Deriving the meaning of the parties from their situation and their intentions as declared in the contract, it becomes impossible in reason to construe the word "vessel" in the defeasance clause as not applying to both the Johnson and the Leslie. It is conceded that the value of the Johnson and her cargo was enormously in excess of the sum of the bond; this having been the case, to hold that the hypothecation of the cargo on the Leslie was only to be availed of in case of the arrival of the Johnson and her cargo, would be to determine that the cargo on board the Leslie was only to be resorted to by the bondholder, in the event recourse against that cargo should be superfluous. We cannot construe a contract for security so as to render the security available only in case resort to it should become unnecessary. True, it is sought to escape the dilemma resulting from this reasoning by saying that the object which the parties had in view was a resort to the cargo of the Leslie in case the Johnson and her cargo arrived in such a damaged condition as to render it necessary that 300] the cargo *of the Leslie should be called upon for an average contribution. But this explanation only accentuates the dilemma, since it contends that the lenders were to have recourse to the cargo of the Leslie in case the security resulting from the Johnson and her cargo was partially impaired, and not in the event that it was wholly so. But, obviously, if the security of the cargo of the Leslie was contemplated and provided for by the parties, as it manifestly was, the contract should not be held as meaning that the security was to be availed of only in the event that the value thereof was required to pay a part of the debt, and it was not to be resorted to when a greater reason for so doing existed. There are many other conditions of the bond which with equal force refute the attempt to limit the word "vessel," in the defeasance clause, to the Johnson, and which irresistibly make the language of the defeasance clause harmonize with the nature and extent of the security afforded by the bond. Thus, the clause as to the arrival of the vessels made no distinction between the Johnson and the Leslie. It cannot be contended that if the Leslie had arrived at the port of destination before the Johnson, her cargo could have been discharged without payment of the bond.

The contemporaneous construction of the contract given by the masters of the Johnson and the Leslie is shown by the bill of lading which was given by the one and taken by the other for the nitrate of soda which was transhipped on the Leslie. On this bill of lading the following indorsement was placed:

"The 8,449 bags of nitrate of soda, as per this bill of lading, are included in and jointly responsible with the nitrate of soda specified in the bottomry and respondentia bond given to Messrs. Grace Brothers & Company as security for the payment of the Amer. ship Andrew Johnson's disbursements in Callao."

We conclude that to give the construction to the bond claimed by the shipowner would not only do violence to the expressed intentions of the parties and their contemporaneous interpretations of its meaning, but would also be adopting, to quote the language of Sir James W. Colvile in The Great Pacific, L. R. 2 P. C. 524, "so improbable an hypothesis that the construction is only to be admitted if there is no escape from it."

*We may properly say of the bond un- [301 der consideration what was said by the supreme court of Pennsylvania in Insurance Company of Pennsylvania v. Duval, 8 Serg. & R. 147, in speaking of a form of respondentia bond in use in Philadelphia, which partook of the character of a loan coupled with a contract of insurance:

"Contracts of this kind are so different in different countries (although they resemble each other in some prominent features) that when disputes arise they are to be decided by the words of the particular contract in question, rather than by any principles of general commercial law. In the present instance, therefore, we must endeavor to ascertain the meaning of the bond and be governed by it."

In the case just referred to, the loan was upon goods laden upon a vessel, and it was a condition of the contract that the loan was to be paid within a certain period after the return of the vessel to Philadelphia, her home port, or in the event of an utter loss by certain enumerated sea risks, the bond was to be void. On the return voyage, the vessel was condemned and sold at an intermediate port, and the goods on board were sent to Philadelphia in other vessels and delivered to the defendants, and, according to an agreement annexed to the respondentia bond, were sold by them. In an action brought to recover the difference between the price realized from the sale and the amount of the loan, the defendants contended, among other defenses, that the terms of the bond did not make the repayment of the loan dependent upon the return of the goods, but upon the return of the vessel, and that as the vessel did not return, the day of payment had not arrived. The court pointed out the extraordinary consequences which would follow the construction contended for, and held that, even if under a literal interpretation the right to recover did not exist, a resort to the spirit of the contract and the intention of the parties would entitle the lender to judgment, as the goods and not the vessel were the sources from which the defendants expected to derive the means of payment.

Our conclusion being that the bond was not avoided by the loss of the Johnson, and was a valid and subsisting obligation, *at the [302 time of its payment, by the owners of the cargo, on the Leslie, the question which arises is, Can the cargo owners recover by an action in personam against the shipowner the due average proportion of the expenses at the port of refuge, incurred for the benefit of the ship and freight? The manifest result of the obligation of the cargo owners to pay the bond before they could obtain delivery of the goods was that they were obliged to discharge the part of the debt which was due by the ship Johnson. This, in effect, gave rise in their behalf to a claim against the ship for a breach of the contract of affreightment or charter party, by virtue of which the property of the owners was received on the Andrew Johnson to be transported to Hamburg, and there delivered to the order of the consignees named in the charter party on the payment of the freight therein specified. Had a portion of the cargo not been delivered, or been delivered in a damaged condition by the fault of the master, the right to proceed in admiralty to recover the damage sustained would have been clear. The Schooner Freeman [The Freeman v. Buckingham], 59 U. S. 18 How. 182 [15: 341]; Liverpool & G. W. Steam Co. v. Phenix Ins. Co. [The Montana], 129 U. S. 397, 462 [32: 788, 799]. Delivering the cargo charged with a lien for an indebtedness of the shipowner is no different in principle or effect from the nondelivery of a portion or the whole in a damaged condition. It is also analogous in principle to a jettison of a portion of the cargo for the benefit of the ship, and the remainder of the cargo, when a clear right to contribution would exist, enforceable in admiralty. Dupont v. Vance, 60 U. S. 19 How. 162, 168 [15: 584, 586]. As said in the latter case by Mr. Justice Curtis, delivering the opinion of the court: "The right of the shipper to resort to the vessel for claims growing directly out of his contract of affreightment has very long existed in the general maritime law." And, whilst in the same case (page 169 [15: 586]), the power of the master to hypothecate or sell a part of the cargo to enable him to prosecute the voyage was declared to exist, the obligation of the shipowner, under the law of the sea, to reimburse the cargo owner for the due proportion of the loss, was clearly stated.

The shipowner being liable for his average 303] portion of the *loss, the question is, Was he discharged therefrom by the loss of the Johnson and her cargo, although the owner has recovered and retains the sum awarded as damages against another ship for having brought about the loss? The answer to this question involves a consideration of the proper construction to be given to the act limiting the liability of shipowners.

The original act, approved March 3, 1851 (9 Stat. at L. 635, chap. 43), was carried forward into the Revised Statutes as §§ 4282 et seq.

Section 4283 declares that the liability of the owner of any vessel for various acts and things mentioned "shall in no case exceed the amount or value of the interest of such owner in such vessel and her freight then pending."

Section 4284 describes the liability as "the whole value of the vessel, and her freight for the voyage;" and § 4285 declares that it shall be a sufficient compliance with the law if the owner transfer his interest in such vessel and freight, for the benefit of the claimants, to a trustee.

Section 4283 was amended by the act approved June 26, 1884 (23 Stat. at L. 57, chap. 121), so as to do away with the restrictions upon the character of debts and liabilities against which the limitation might be asserted. This amendment, however, is not material to the question now considered.

The clear purpose of Congress was to require the shipowner, in order to be able to claim the benefit of the limited liability act, to surrender to the creditors of the ship all rights of action which were directly representative of the ship and freight. Where a vessel has been wrongfully taken from the custody of her owners or destroyed through the fault of another, there exists in the owner a right to require the restoration of his property, either in specie or by a money payment as compensation for a failure to restore the property. Manifestly, if the option was afforded the owner of the ship to receive back his property or its value, he could not, by electing to take its value, refuse to surrender the amount as a condition to obtaining the benefit of the act.

In The City of Norwich [Place v. Norwich & N. Y. Transp. Co.], 118 U. S. 486 [30: 142], where the obligation *of a shipowner to [304 account for the sum of insurance recovered on the loss of his ship was fully considered, the fact was declared to be that the provisions of the act of Congress, just referred to, were in conformity with the general maritime law of Europe (502). The text of the Ordonnance de la Marine of 1681 and the opinions of Pardessus and other continental jurisconsults were referred to as the sources from which the principles embodied in the act of Congress were derived. The language of Pardessus clearly shows that, under the general maritime law, the obligation of the owner was to surrender a sum awarded as damages for the loss of his ship, and, if he did not, he could not avail himself of the limitation of liability. He says (Droit Commercial, part 3, title 2, chap. 3, § 2):

"The owner is bound civilly for all delinquencies committed by the captain within the scope of his authority, but he may discharge himself therefrom by abandoning the ship and freight; and, if they are lost, it suffices for his discharge to surrender all claims in respect of the ship and its freight."

So, also, Kaltenborn, in a treatise published at Berlin in 1851, as translated and quoted in the dissenting opinion in The City of Norwich [Place v. Norwich & N. Y. Transp. Co.], supra, says:

"The Roman law, which held the owner absolutely liable with all his property, is nowhere put in practice, and was not current as early as the Middle Ages. Indeed, the Consulate of the Sea (chaps. 183, 224, 236), the law of Wisby, reasoning from articles 13 and 68, that the Hanse Towns, reasoning from article 2, title 10, render the owners, as a rule, answerable only to the extent of the ship's value; and the modern maritime laws free the owners, by the abandon of the ship and their several shares in the vessel, from all further liability for the ship enterprise, particularly for the acts and contracts of the captain. In the ship are included all gains arising during the voyage, as well as the insurance. Should the ship and the freight have perished, it is sufficient for exoneration of the owners if all claims and causes of action having reference to the vessel and freight are abandoned by them."

The same doctrine is clearly recognized in 305]the provisions of *the General German Commercial Code, where, in article 778, it is provided as follows:

"Art. 778. In cases of general average, the compensation for sacrifice or damage takes, as against the ship's creditor, the place of that which the compensation is to make good.

"The same rule applies to the indemnity, which in case of loss or damage to the vessel or of nonpayment of freight when goods have been lost or damaged, is due to the shipowner by the party who has caused the damage by his illegal conduct.

"When the compensation or indemnity has been received by the shipowner, he is personally responsible to the ship's creditors to the extent of the amount received in the same manner as to the creditors of a voyage in case of encashment of the freight."

Indeed, that a right of action for the value of the owner's interest in a ship and freight is to be considered as a substitute for the ship itself was decided in this court in the case of Sheppard v. Taylor, 30 U. S. 5 Pet. 675 [8: 269]. That was a case where a vessel had been seized, condemned, and sold by the Spanish authorities because of a violation of the trade regulations of the Kingdom of Spain. The King of Spain subsequently ordered the proceeds of the vessel and cargo to be repaid to the owners, but this was not done; afterwards the owners, having become insolvent, assigned their claims for the restoration of the proceeds and for indemnity from Spain to their separate creditors, and the commissioners under the Florida treaty awarded to be paid to the assignees a sum of money, part for the cargo, part for the freight, and part for the ship. The officers and seamen having proceeded against the owners of the ship by a libel in personam for their wages, and having afterwards, by an amended libel in personam, claimed payment out of the money paid to the assignees of the owners under the treaty, it was held that they were entitled, towards the satisfaction of the same, to the sum awarded by the commissioners for the loss of the ship and her freight, with certain deductions for the expenses of prosecuting the claim before the commissioners.

306] *Mr. Justice Story, delivering the opinion of the court, said (p. 710 [8: 282]):

"If the ship had been specifically restored, there is no doubt that the seamen might have proceeded against it in the admiralty, in a suit in rem for the whole compensation due to them. They have, by the maritime law, an indisputable lien to this extent. This lien is so sacred and indelible that it has, on more than one occasion, been expressly said that it adheres to the last plank of the ship. [Relf v. The Maria], 1 Pet. Adm. Rep. note 186, 195; [The Sidney Cove], 2 Dod. Adm. Rep. 13; The Neptune, 1 Hagg. Adm. Rep. 227, 239.

"And in our opinion there is no difference between the case of a restitution in specie of the ship itself, and a restitution in value; the lien re-attaches to the thing and to whatever is substituted for it. This is no peculiar principle of the admiralty. It is found incorporated into the doctrine of courts of common law and equity. The owner and the lienholder, whose claims have been wrongfully displaced, may follow the proceeds wherever they can distinctly trace them. In respect, therefore, to the proceeds of the ship, we have no difficulty in affirming that the lien in this case attaches to them."

Nor does the ruling in The City of Norwich [Place v. Norwich & N. Y. Transp. Co.], supra, that the proceeds of an insurance policy need not be surrendered by the shipowner, conflict with the decision in Sheppard v. Taylor. The decision as to insurance was placed on the ground that the insurance was a distinct and collateral contract which the shipowner was at liberty to make or not. On such question there was division of opinion among the writers on maritime law and in the various maritime codes. But as shown by the full review of the authorities, found in the opinion of the court, and in the dissent in The City of Norwich [Place v. Norwich & N. Y. Transp. Co.], all the maritime writers and codes accord in the conclusion that a surrender, under the right to limit liability, must be made of a sum received by the owner, as the direct result of the loss of the ship, and which is the legal equivalent and substitute for the ship.

We conclude that the owner who retains the sum of the damages which have been awarded him for the loss of his ship and freight has not surrendered "the amount or value" (§ 4283) of *his interest in the ship; that[307 he has not given up the "whole value of the vessel" (§ 4284); that he has not transferred "his interest in such vessel and freight" (§ 4285). It follows that the shipowner, therefore, in the case before us, to the extent of the damages paid on account of the collision, was liable to the creditors of the ship, and the libellants, as such creditors, were entitled to collect their claim, it being less in amount than the sum of such proceeds.

The remaining questions are free from difficulty. It was urged below and is pressed at bar that the amended libel disclosed no cause of action, because it was not specifically alleged that the master of the Johnson communicated with the cargo owners before consenting to the bond.

It was said in The Julia Blake [Bank of St. Thomas v. The Julia Blake], 107 U. S. 418, 425 [27: 595, 598], "it is now the settled law of the English courts that a master 'cannot bottomry a ship without communication with his owner, if communication be practicable, and a fortiori, cannot hypothecate the cargo without communicating with the owner of it, if communication with such owner be practicable.'" A particular review of the doctrine laid down by the English courts was, however, rendered unnecessary in the case of The Julia Blake, as the circumstances in that case clearly established that the hypothecation of the cargo was unwarranted, irrespective of the failure to communicate with the owner of the cargo. In the case of Glascott v. Lang, 2 Phill. Ch. 321, decided in 1847, Lord Chancellor Cottenham declared that no authority existed to support the claim that a bottomry bond executed upon a vessel might be avoided because the captain, though having opportunity to do so, failed to communicate with the owners before giving the bond. In The Karnak, L. R. 2

Adm. & Eccl. 308, Sir Robert Phillimore thus referred to the subject:

"I think it will be found upon examination of the foreign maritime law that the bottomry bond, under the various titles of contrat à la grosse aventure, hypotheca, bodmer, or cambio maritimo, was always considered as binding the cargo, and that the necessity of a special communication, if possible, of the master with the owner of the cargo, according to the doc-308]trine *of recent cases, however just in principle, is peculiar to the English law."

The rule declared to be settled in Great Britain by the cases of The Bonaparte, 8 Moore, P. C. C. 459; The Hamburg, Brown. & Lush. Adm. 253, 273; S. C. 2 Moore, P. C. C. N. S. 289, 320; Australasian Steam Navigation Company v. Morse, L. R. 4 P. C. 222, was, in 1877, thus stated by the Privy Council in Kleinwort v. Cassa Marittima, L. R. 2 App. Cas. 157:

"That it is an universal rule that the master, if in a state of distress or pressure, before hypothecating the cargo, must communicate or even endeavor to communicate with the owner of the cargo, has not been alleged, and is a position that could not be maintained; but it may safely, both on authority and on principle, be said, that in general it is his duty to do so, or it is his duty in general to attempt to do so. . . . If according to the circumstances in which he is placed it be reasonable that he should—if it be rational to expect that he may—obtain an answer within a time not inconvenient with reference to the circumstances of the case, then it must be taken upon authority and principle that it is the duty of the master to do so, or at least to make the attempt."

As in the case of The Julia Blake [Bank of St. Thomas v. The Julia Blake], however, we find it unnecessary to determine in the case now before us whether the rule laid down by the courts of Great Britain is the doctrine of this court. Under that rule, it is only where, under all the circumstances of the case, communication with the owners of the cargo was feasible, that a failure to attempt to communicate will avoid the bond. Now, in the case at bar, the pleadings do not aver, nor does the evidence establish, whether communication was had by the master with the owners of the cargo before the execution of the bond, nor that such communication was feasible or might reasonably have been had. While it may be inferred from the averment in the libel that the libellants assented to the bond, "believing that the said bond was properly and necessarily issued," that such assent was given subsequent to the execution of the bond, the language used does not imply that the master had not communicated with the cargo owners be-309]fore making the hypothecation. *As the bond does not import to the contrary, the master must be presumed to have lawfully executed it. The necessity for the hypothecation and that the course pursued was for the best interests of the cargo owners is established by the evidence. Under such circumstances, we think the duty was upon the party who questioned the power of the master to have executed the instrument of hypothecation to plead it as a matter of defense. The Virgin [The Virgin v. Vyfhius], 33 U. S. 8 Pet. 550 [8: 1041].

Particularly is this the case when, as here, the recovery sought from the shipowner is for advances made for his benefit, which were charged upon the property of the cargo owners by the representative as well of the shipowner as the owners of the cargo. Whether, under the circumstances, an estoppel might not arise, need not be determined.

But one matter remains to be considered, and that is as to the action of the district judge in refusing on the hearing, and subsequently, to permit the respondent to amend his answer by setting up the plea of laches and of res judicata as respects the allegation, for the first time made in the third amended libel, of the receipt by the owner of the Andrew Johnson of partial compensation from the owners of the ship Thirlmere for the loss of the Andrew Johnson and her freight. The third amended libel was filed October 28, 1890, and the exceptions and answer thereto were filed June 22, 1891. The trial took place on November 22, 1893. It appears from the papers used in support of the motion filed after the trial of the case that the claim made in the admiralty proceedings in England, that the cargo owners should be credited from the ship's share of the moneys paid into court by the owners of the Thirlmere with the ship's proportion of the bottomry bond, was rejected, because of a supposed want of jurisdiction. Indeed, the proctor for the respondent, in an affidavit filed in support of the renewed application for leave to amend the answer, stated as a reason for not setting forth the defenses in question in the answer to the amended libel that he "was then of the opinion that his client was entitled to judgment on the defenses then set up," and that he "was then advised that the presentation and rejection by the English admiralty court of the libellants' *claim, founded on their payment of the[310] bottomry bond, did not, according to the law of England, amount to an adjudication thereon, for the reason that the said English court of admiralty was without jurisdiction thereof."

It is also clearly inferable from the statements in the affidavit we have referred to that when the answer to the third amended libel was filed the proctor for the respondent knew of the transaction with the insurance company. Even, therefore, if the fact was, as claimed, that the respondent would have been entitled to receive from his underwriters one half of whatever decree the libellants might be entitled to recover, had the same been secured with reasonable diligence, and that respondent had lost said recourse by reason of the bar of the statute of limitations, still there is no pretense that the respondent was misled into believing that the libellants had abandoned their claim against him, and the fact was that they promptly brought suit in this country to recover against the shipowner. Without considering the averment in the last amendment to the libel, by which the recovery by the owner of the Johnson from the Thirlmere was alleged, the first libel informed the respondent that the claim arising from the bond was pressed against him. If between the time of the filing of the first libel (July 20, 1887) and the time of the hearing (November 22, 1893) a claim against an insurance company in favor of the respondent was lost by laches, such loss was the result of his own conduct.

Under all the circumstances, particularly as the rejection of the claim in the courts of Great Britain was not upon the merits, we are of opinion that the trial court did not abuse its discretion in refusing leave to amend the answer.

The decree of the Circuit Court of Appeals must be reversed, and that of the District Court affirmed. And it is so ordered.

Sufficiency of answer—appeal from territorial judgment—jurisdiction of this court—wrongful conversion of an estate—interest, when chargeable—commissions of administrator—allowance to solicitor—one not appealing cannot contest—rate of interest—costs, when chargeable on defendant.

1. In an action by an administrator to recover the assets of the estate from a defendant who has no right to them, but has converted them, it is not a sufficient answer to allege that the estate may be increased after an accounting with another estate, and to bring that other estate into the controversy with the innumerable questions in regard to it which have no connection with the issues in the case; and a cross bill setting up the same matters is demurrable.
2. Upon an appeal from the supreme court of a territory, the findings of facts by that court are conclusive upon this court.
3. The jurisdiction of this court on such appeal, apart from exceptions to the admission or rejection of evidence, is limited to determining whether the findings of fact support the judgment.
4. Where the defendant has wrongfully converted the whole estate of a minor, and his liability to pay it back is plain and clear, it is no objection to the decree that it makes him liable as an individual for the repayment of the same. It is not necessary to follow and identity the specific property.
5. It is not error for a court to charge defendant, who has converted the whole assets of an estate, with interest on the amount thereof at 6 per cent.
6. Statutory commissions on the whole amount due to an administrator from one who has converted the estate should be allowed without deduction from a part of the sum which is not paid over, but which the defendant by favor of the court is allowed to retain on account of his right to share in the fund as a distributee.
7. An allowance, out of a fund, of a fee for a solicitor by whose exertions the fund was recovered, is within the judicial discretion of the court; and in fixing that fee the court can proceed upon its own knowledge of the value of the solicitor's services.
8. One who does not appeal from a decree is not entitled, on appeal from a decree of affirmance, to contest a provision of the original which is merely affirmed by the latter.
9. An allowance of interest at a certain rate by the supreme court of a territory, which has discretion in the matter, will not be altered and increased by this court.
10. Costs of defending an action brought by an administrator against one who has wrongfully converted assets of the estate and persistently refused to pay them over on demand must be charged against the defendant personally, and cannot be allowed out of the fund.

APPEALS from a decree of the Supreme Court of the Territory of New Mexico affirming the decree of the District Court of that Territory in favor of the complainant, Pedro Perea, administrator, etc., against George W. Harrison et al., defendants, for an accounting for the property and assets of the estate of José L. Perea, Second. The decree found the amount due from defendant to complainant and decreed its payment. Reversed, and cause remanded, with instructions to enter judgment in conformity with the opinion, etc.

See same case below, 7 N. M. 666.

Statement by Mr. Justice Peckham:

The bill in the first above entitled suit was filed in a district court of the territory of New Mexico in chancery, by Pedro Perea, as sole surviving administrator of the estate of José L. Perea, Second, deceased, and as one of his heirs at law, against the defendant, George W. Harrison, individually and as administrator of the estate of his wife, Guadalupe Perea de Harrison, and also against the other heirs at law of José L. Perea, Second. It was brought to compel an accounting by the defendant George W. Harrison, individually and as administrator of the estate of his wife, for the property and assets of the estate of José L. Perea, Second, which had come into his hands.

The bill in substance alleged the following facts: José *Perea, Second, a resident of [312

New Mexico, died in that territory on the 27th of August, 1887, being about the age of eight years. He left him surviving his mother, Guadalupe Perea, who was then a widow, and his half brothers and sisters as his heirs at law. On the 23d of July, 1884, his mother had been appointed his guardian and had taken possession of his property. In September, 1885, she married the defendant, George W. Harrison. She continued guardian of her son up to his death, in August, 1887. In September, 1887, the complainant was appointed administrator and the mother was appointed administratrix of the estate of the minor. They both gave bonds and took the requisite oaths. On the 6th of March, 1888, the mother made what she termed a final report of her guardianship to the probate court, which showed a balance of over $17,000 in her hands belonging to the estate of the minor. Under the influence of her husband she claimed, from the time of her son's death down to her own decease, to hold the property as guardian, and not as administratrix, and while acting under that influence she refused to permit the complainant, after his appointment as administrator, to assist in the administration of the estate, or to have possession or control over any of its assets. Objections were made by the complainant to the report filed by the mother in March, 1888, called the guardian's final account, and these objections were sustained by the probate court. An appeal from that order was taken by the mother, but no further proceedings were had therein, and the same was practically abandoned. The mother died October 20, 1889. Her husband then unlawfully took possession of the property of the minor in her hands at the time of her death, and subsequently and on the 6th of January, 1890, he took out letters of administration on her estate, she dying intestate. He then claimed to hold the estate of the minor by reason of being administrator of his wife's estate. He took possession of the minor's estate individually, with full knowledge of its trust character, placed it to his own credit in bank, mingled it with his own funds and claimed the right to retain possession and control thereof, and refused the demand to pay over the estate to him, which the 313] *complainant made in his capacity as sole surviving administrator of the estate of the minor. It was also alleged that the mother of the deceased minor, acting under the influence and by the direction of her husband, and the defendant Harrison himself, individually, did by their actions cause great damage to the estate of the minor, and relief was demanded against the defendant Harrison as administrator of his wife's estate, and individually for an accounting in relation to the estate of the minor, of which he was in possession, and for a recovery of the amount found to be in his possession.

The defendant Harrison demurred to the bill, his demurrer was overruled, and he then answered both individually and as administrator of the estate of his deceased wife. In that answer the defendant denied many of the material allegations contained in the bill. He alleged that he and the defendant Grover William Harrison, who was minor child of himself and his deceased wife, Guadalupe Perea de Harrison, had succeeded to all the interest and rights of his said wife in and to the property of the estate of José L. Perea, Second, and for that reason the complainant was not entitled to a decree for anything upon the accounting. The answer also alleged that the complainant was a son and also one of the three administrators of the estate of the late José L. Perea, Senior (two of the complainant's brothers being the other administrators), and that those administrators had failed to account for a large sum of money which was due from the estate of José L. Perea, the elder, to José L. Perea, Second, in his lifetime, and afterwards to his estate; and it was alleged that large amounts of property had come into the hands of such administrators of the estate of the deceased father, José L. Perea, Senior, of which no account had been made, and that the pro rata share of the minor, José L. Perea, Second, in these assets so unaccounted for would amount to $30,000.

The complainant excepted to so much of the answer as contained the above allegations relating to the estate of the elder Perea and the action of the administrators with regard thereto upon the ground of impertinence.

The defendant, by leave of court, also filed a cross bill, in *which in very great detail [314 he set forth the condition of the estate of the elder Perea and the action of the administrators thereof. Among other things it was alleged that the elder Perea in 1842 married his first wife and they lived together until 1877, when she died; that he had by her six daughters and six sons, and that he brought into the marriage community a large amount of property, real and personal, amounting to $100,000, acquired by him by inheritance, bequest, and other means, and in addition personal property of the value of about $300,000, and that at the time of his marriage his wife owned in her right and brought into the marriage community real property situate in the territory of New Mexico of the value of $30,000 and personal property to the value of $30,000; that this property of the husband and wife became upon their marriage property of the marriage community, and so continued to remain the property of the parties, to which large accretions and additions were made by the industry and labor of the husband and wife, so that at the time of the death of the wife in 1877 the full value of the united property was $300,000 of realty and $500,000 of personalty, and that all of this property, except the amount brought into the marriage community, was gain and increase of that property and belonged in equal parts to the husband and wife.

It was further alleged that in 1883 the elder Perea died, and that his estate had not been properly administered; that property belonging to the estate had not been inventoried as such; that the conduct of the administrators had been wasteful, the estate had not been properly taken care of, and that the administrators had expended large amounts of the community property in the purchase of real property, so that such property had been unlawfully converted into worthless real property. It was also alleged that a pretended settlement had been made before the probate judge in New Mexico, and the administrators had made an accounting before the court, and had obtained their discharge and the cancelation of their bonds by that court; that this set-315] tlement before and discharge *by the probate court was a fraudulent one and fraudulently obtained, and that the decree should be set aside. It was also alleged that the defendant Harrison and his wife had before her death commenced a suit against the complainant and the other defendants who were administrators of the estate of the elder Perea, asking for an accounting in regard to the identical matters and things set up in this cross bill; and that such suit was still pending and undetermined at the time of the commencement of this suit by the complainant herein.

Various other matters in relation to the management of the estate of the elder Perea were set forth in the cross bill at very great length, and relief was demanded in accordance with what was alleged to be his rights by such complainant. This relief was of all varieties, including an investigation into accounts and matters relating to community property arising out of the marriage of the elder Perea in 1842, and an inquiry as to what was such property and its proper increase; also injunctions, accountings, decrees for conveyance, for distribution, for removal of the administrators; for the annulling of the pretended and fraudulent decree discharging the administrators and finally settling their accounts, and for the appointment of a receiver of the estate of the elder Perea.

To this cross bill the complainant herein demurred upon several grounds, the substance being that it was multifarious in that it was brought in regard to matters having no connection with the subject-matter of the original bill, and not proper to be investigated in this suit.

The exceptions to the answer and the demurrer to the cross bill were argued at the same time, and, after hearing counsel, the court allowed the exceptions and struck out the matter excepted to, and it also sustained complainant's demurrer to the cross bill.

The case then being at issue was duly referred to a master, before whom both parties appeared and introduced their proofs, after which the master made his report. Upon that report and the evidence taken before the master, the case was brought to a hearing, and the court found, in substance, that the allegations set forth in complainant's bill were true. The 316] *court also found that José L. Perea, Senior, died about the 21st day of April, 1883, and left his widow, Guadalupe Perea (who afterwards married the defendant George W. Harrison), and the other defendants in this suit, with the exception of George W. and Grover William Harrison, his heirs at law. José Perea, Second, was the son of the elder Perea by his second wife, Guadalupe Perea. After the death of the elder Perea, his widow married, as heretofore stated, the defendant George W. Harrison, and by him she had issue, Grover William Harrison, one of the defendants herein. With these exceptions all of the defendants were children of the elder Perea by a former wife. Pedro, Mariano, and Jesus M. Perea were appointed administrators of the estate of their deceased father.

The court also found that the defendant George W. Harrison, not only upon the death of his wife had control, but that immediately after their marriage he took control and charge, of the assets of the deceased minor, and at the time of the entry of the decree herein he still retained and had possession of all the moneys belonging to that estate, and that they were subject to his individual control.

At the time of the death of the minor he owed no debts and there were no charges against his estate except his funeral expenses and the expenses of his last illness and certain claims for his maintenance by his guardian. The defendant George W. Harrison, in the name of his wife and in her lifetime, made sundry reports to the probate court as to the condition of the estate, some of which contained false entries to her advantage, and together they obstructed the distribution of the estate among the heirs.

The court also found that George W. Harrison, the defendant, wilfully obstructed the distribution of the assets of the estate of the minor, and by his misconduct rendered it necessary that the complainant should obtain possession of the assets by the institution of this suit, and that the necessity for this suit arose entirely out of the wrongful conduct of the defendant Harrison.

The amount found due from the defendant to the complainant *was stated in the decree[317 to be, with interest up to the date of the entry of the decree, June 19, 1893, the sum of $31,545.32, of which the defendant Harrison was entitled as administrator of the estate of his late wife, Guadalupe Perea de Harrison, to thirteen twenty-sixths, and to three twenty-sixths in addition by reason of the purchase of the interests of some of the heirs of the estate of José L. Perea, Second, and to one twenty-sixth more, as guardian of Grover William Harrison, one of the defendants, being a total of seventeen twenty-sixths; and the other heirs were each decreed entitled to one twenty-sixth of such balance; and it was provided in the decree that the defendant Harrison might, instead of turning over to the complainant, the administrator of José Perea, Second, the full sum found due, retain the amount found due him from the estate, which was stated to be the sum of $16,227.19. The defendant George W. Harrison was also charged with the payment of the costs of the suit individually, including the sum of $1,000 allowed the special master.

From the final decree thus entered the defendant George W. Harrison appealed to the supreme court of the territory of New Mexico, which court, with some modifications, affirmed the judgment of the court below. Those modifications consisted in charging interest upon the full amount of the sum found due by the decree of the court below, from the time of the entry of that decree up to the 26th of August, 1895, which amounted to the sum of $4,324.45, and the defendant was charged in the decree of the last-named date with the full sum of $35,869.77. The fee for the solicitor of complainant was reduced from $5,000 to $3,586.97, being 10 per cent upon the amount found in the hands of the defendant Harrison. The complainant, as administrator was decreed to be entitled to the statutory commission upon the last-named sum found by the court to be due from the defendant Harrison, which commission amounted to $1,943.48. The court also reduced the compensation of the special master from $1,000 to $500. The court also modified the decree against Harrison for the payment of costs individually, by directing 318] "that the *said solicitor's fee, the said commission for said administrator, the said special master's fee, and all of the costs of this case in this court and in the court below, should be paid out of said fund, and that of the remainder the said defendant George W. Harrison may retain in his possession seventeen twenty-sixth parts thereof, and that he shall pay over to said Pedro Perea, as administrator of José L. Perea, deceased, the remaining nine twenty-sixths, to be distributed to the heirs at law of said José Leandro Perea, Second," as directed by the court. From the judgment of affirmance as modified the defendant George W. Harrison has appealed to this court. The complainant also took a cross appeal from the judgment.

Mr. William B. Childers for Harrison.
Mr. Neill B. Field for Perea.

Mr. Justice Peckham delivered the opinion of the court:

The question first arising in this case is in regard to the correctness of the decisions of the courts below in allowing complainant's exceptions to portions of the answer of the defendant Harrison and in sustaining the demurrer to defendant's cross bill. The decision of the two matters rests in this case upon essentially the same foundation. If the allegations of the defendant's answer to the original bill are impertinent, it would follow that in this case the cross bill would be multifarious, and that the demurrer on that ground should be sustained. The allegations in the two pleadings are of the same nature, only in the cross bill they are very greatly extended and set forth in almost infinite detail.

Impertinence is described by Lord Chief Baron Gilbert to be "where the records of the court are stuffed with long recitals, or with long digressions of matter of fact, which are altogether unnecessary and totally immaterial to the matter in question." 1 Dan. Ch. Pl. & Pr. 5th Am. ed. marginal paging, 349. It is also said that impertinence is the introduction of any matters in a bill, answer, or other 319] pleading *in the suit which are not properly before the court for decision at any particular stage of the suit. Wood v. Mann, 1 Sumn. 578. The best test to ascertain whether matter be impertinent is to try whether the subject of the allegation be put in issue in the matter in dispute between the parties. All matter not material to the suit is regarded as impertinent. 1 Daniell, supra.

As to multifariousness, it was said in Shields v. Thomas, 59 U. S. 18 How. 253, at 259 [15: 368]: "There is perhaps no rule established for the conducting of equity pleadings, with reference to which (whilst as a rule it is universally admitted) there has existed less of certainty and uniformity in application than has attended this relating to multifariousness. This effect, flowing, perhaps inevitably, from the variety of modes and degrees of right and interest entering into the transactions of life, seems to have led to a conclusion rendering the rule almost as much an exception as a rule, and that conclusion is, that each case must be determined by its peculiar features. Thus Daniell in his work on Chancery Practice, vol. 1, p. 384, quoting from Lord Cottenham, says: "It is impossible, from the authorities, to lay down any rule or abstract proposition as to what constitutes multifariousness, which can be made universally applicable. The cases upon the subject are extremely various, and the court, in deciding upon them, seems to have considered what was convenient in particular cases, rather than to have attempted to lay down an absolute rule." Continuing his opinion, the learned justice in the above case said: "Justice Story, in his compilation upon equity pleading, defines multifariousness in a bill to mean 'the improperly joining in one bill distinct and independent matters, and thereby confounding them.' . . . Justice Story closes his review of the authorities upon this defect in a bill with the following remark: 'The conclusion to which a close survey of all the authorities will conduct us seems to be, that there is not any positive inflexible rule as to what, in the sense of a court of equity, constitutes multifariousness, which is fatal to a suit on demurrer.'"

Upon consideration of the various cases, we think that in *allowing the exceptions to [320 the answer and in sustaining the demurrer to the cross bill, the courts below committed no error. The facts which the defendant Harrison endeavored to set up in his answer and cross bill were not relevant to the matters properly in issue in this suit. Neither the convenience of the parties nor their rights in regard to the matters set forth in the original bill would be aided by entering upon an inquiry relating to the matters set up in the answer and cross bill. It is clear that an investigation and accounting, such as is asked for in the cross bill, would take a long time, probably many years, to finish, involving as it would an inquiry into the amount of the community property of the elder Perea and his wife in 1842, and what should be found to be the actual increase springing from the same; also an inquiry into the transactions of the administrators of the estate of the elder Perea and into their liability on account of the same, together with the taking of evidence upon the subject of the fraudulent character of the decree of the probate court discharging the administrators of that estate. It would in addition include an inquiry into the question whether the administrators, if the decree were set aside, had been guilty of such conduct in the care and management of the estate coming into their hands as would make them liable for any loss sustained by the estate in consequence of such action. In fine, it is seen that the character of the investigation demanded by the cross bill and of the relief sought thereby is extensive enough to call for an almost interminable amount of research and labor. These considerations are not of the slightest moment when weighed against the legal rights of the parties interested in the question; and their right to have such investigation made and adequate and proper relief granted is not a matter of discretion or favor. If they have not slept upon their rights, and if they come into court at the proper time and in a proper action, the court will enter upon the necessary investigation and grant such relief as they may be entitled to. On the other hand, these considerations are most material and vital upon the question of the necessity or propriety of such an investigation in this suit, which was 321] *brought for a different purpose and which would be necessarily greatly delayed in its termination if such an inquiry should be now entered upon.

Let us look for a moment at the simple character of this suit. It is brought to recover as administrator the assets of the estate of the minor already mentioned, the possession of which the defendant Harrison does not deny. He shows no right to them as against the complainant, because the facts he sets up in his answer form no defense. Nor do the same facts when set forth in the cross bill constitute a cause of action against this complainant, proper to be proved and defended against in this suit, as against the demand of the complainant herein. It is plain that the complainant, as the surviving administrator of the estate of the deceased minor, was entitled to the immediate possession of all the assets of such estate. Upon the death of the minor the guardianship of the mother ceased, and as she was thereupon appointed administratrix her continuing to hold the assets of the estate from the time of such appointment was as administratrix, and not as guardian. The counsel for Harrison says in his brief that he is disposed to concede this proposition. It is plainly true. Her right or duty to account as guardian did not affect the title to the property upon the death of the ward. That title became vested in the administrator and administratrix upon their appointment. 1 Williams, Exrs. 6th Am. ed. 696. The plaintiff herein, as coadministrator, had the same legal title to the assets that she had. The advantage of possession was with her. But on the death of the administratrix the complainant remained the sole surviving administrator, and in him was vested the exclusive title and the right to the immediate possession of the assets of the estate of the deceased minor. Instead of obtaining that possession he finds all the assets in the hands of the defendant Harrison, who refuses to give them up. Their amount is not really in controversy. The defendant shows no right or title whatever to them. It is no answer to the demand that the defendant should pay over the sum which is in substance acknowledged to be in his possession 322] to say that the *minor's estate may be increased after an accounting shall be had and judgment obtained and the money paid over in the matter of the estate of the elder Perea. The claim upon that estate, so far as the defendant Harrison is concerned, either individually or as administrator of his deceased wife, is altogether too remote and too disconnected from the issues properly joined in the original suit herein to make it necessary, on his demand, to turn aside from their decision until that claim shall be hereafter and in this suit determined. It would be entering upon an investigation into matters connected with a different estate, an inquiry into which would involve innumerable questions which would have no bearing upon the decision as to the right of defendant to retain these particular funds now in his individual possession and treated by him as his own.

It must also be borne in mind that the defendant Harrison has an action pending against the complainant herein and the other and surviving administrator of the estate of the elder Perea, together with his other heirs at law, in regard to these very matters which are set up in his cross bill herein. Indeed, this cross bill contains nothing material beyond the allegations which are contained in the complaint in his first suit. The allegations in that suit are reintroduced in the cross bill word for word, and the relief prayed for in the cross bill is the same. From all the facts thus appearing in complainant's original bill, in the answer and the cross bill of the defendant Harrison, it is plain that the matters set up in the answer and in the cross bill in regard to which the defendant seeks investigation in this suit are not proper subjects of inquiry herein, because not connected with the issues sought to be decided in the original bill, and it would result in great and unnecessary delay in the decision of this suit to reverse this judgment and direct an investigation into matters which are foreign to its merits. We are of opinion the court below committed no error in allowing complainant's exceptions to the answer and in sustaining his demurrer to the cross bill.

The decision thus arrived at includes the main question in the case. There are some few other matters to be reviewed.

*Our further examination must proceed[323 upon the finding of facts as made by the court below, for this being an appeal from the supreme court of a territory those findings are conclusive upon this court. The jurisdiction of this court on such an appeal, apart from exceptions duly taken to rulings on the admission or rejection of evidence, is limited to determining whether the findings of fact support the judgment. Stringfellow v. Cain, 99 U. S. 610 [25: 421]; Nesbit v. Wells, 104 U. S. 428 [26: 802]; Eilers v. Boatman, 111 U. S. 356 [28: 454]; Idaho & Oregon Land Improv. Company v. Bradbury, 132 U. S. 509 [33: 433]; Mammoth Mining Company v. Salt Lake Foundry & Machine Company, 151 U. S. 447, 450 [38: 229, 230]; Haws v. Victoria Copper Mining Company, 160 U. S. 303 [40: 436]; Gildersleeve v. New Mexico Mining Co 161 U. S. 573 [40: 812]; Bear Lake & River Water Works & Irrigation Company v. Garland, 164 U. S. 1, at 18 [41: 327, 334].

Objection is made to that portion of the decree which holds the defendant Harrison liable as an individual for the repayment of the amount of the assets of the estate found in his possession. The findings of fact amply justify this action of the court. It is found that immediately upon the intermarriage of the defendant Harrison with the widowed mother of the minor he took entire charge and control of her affairs, including the assets of the minor's estate; that he reduced them to money mingled the same with his own funds, deposited them in bank to his individual credit, and at the time of the final decree he retained the same subject to his individual control. The court also found that he made reports in the lifetime of his wife, and in her name, to the probate court, which contained false entries to the advantage of his wife, and that together they obstructed the distribution of the estate among the heirs; that upon the death of his wife on the 20th of October, 1889, he was in possession of these assets with full knowledge of their trust character, and after her death he refused to pay over on demand, to the complainant as the sole surviving administrator of the estate of the minor, the assets pertaining to that estate. These facts show a persistent, deliberate, and successful attempt to secure and retain the assets of this estate and to con-324]vert them to his own use *individually. The facts found show that he was guilty of such conversion. Cases are cited by defendant's counsel where payments wrongfully made by an administrator to a third person could not be recovered directly from such third person at the suit of a creditor of the estate, the estate itself not being insolvent. Those cases and the one at bar have no resemblance to each other. This is a case where the whole assets of the estate have been wrongfully and knowingly taken and converted to the individual use of this defendant, and the action is brought to recover the same by the sole surviving administrator of the estate. Nor is it a question of following the specific property which was taken by the defendant. The finding is that he reduced the assets and property of the estate to money and mingled the same with his own funds, and has kept control of them ever since. The question of identification has nothing to do with the case. It is a bald case of the conversion of the whole estate of the minor, and his liability to pay it back is plain and clear.

Nor did the court below err to the prejudice of the defendant in the matter of charging him with interest at 6 per cent on the amount of the assets converted by him. The interest is charged by reason of his conversion of the whole assets of the estate. It is not a mere mingling of the funds with his own, while recognizing his liability to repay them and having them at the same time ready to respond when demanded. It is a wholesale conversion of the entire assets. The facts found make sion evidence perfectly clear that such conver- riage with the deed from the time of his mar- entries in the reports of the minor. [illegible] in that direction. [illegible] strong evidence

Neither is it a question of what profits (if any) have been made by an individual who has mingled trust funds with his own and used them for his personal benefit, although never denying his liability to account. In such cases it is sometimes proper to inquire what profits have been made in order to charge the trustee with their amount, if greater than the usual rate of interest. This is not such a question. The defendant has, without 325]the least right or title, taken moneys *belonging to the estate of a deceased minor, and converted them substantially to his own use, while denying the right of the administrator of such estate to the possession thereof. He is properly charged, at least, with the usual interest, without investigation into the question of what profits he may have made.

That portion of the decree which authorizes the complainant as administrator to retain his statutory commissions upon the full fund found due from the defendant is objected to, and the claim is made that he is not entitled to commission on any other sum than that which he actually receives and pays out. The decree determines the amount due from the defendant to the complainant as administrator. Strictly speaking, the complainant was entitled to a decree for the payment of that full sum by the defendant, after which he would be paid the distributive share legally coming to him. If that course had been followed and such a decree given, the complainant would have been entitled to his statutory fees, as administrator, upon the amount thus paid in; but by the favor of the court, the defendant Harrison was permitted, instead of making this formal payment, to retain in his possession the seventeen twenty-sixths of the estate which the court decided he would be entitled to receive from the administrator, upon his making distribution of such estate to the parties entitled to it. The court in pursuance of this course did not relieve the estate from the payment of the full amount of the commissions of complainant as administrator which he would have been entitled to had the amount which the defendant retained been actually and physically paid over into his hands. As to this, the defendant has no good grounds of complaint.

The defendant also objects to the allowance of the solicitor's fee which is charged against the fund. We think no error arises from this action of the court below. By the exertions of the solicitor the fund was recovered, and it was properly made to bear some portion of the expense of its administration. The amount was within the judicial discretion of the court, and in fixing that amount the trial court could proceed upon its own knowledge of the value of the solicitor's services. *Internal [326] Improv. Fund Trustees v. Greenough, 105 U. S. 527 [26: 1157]; Fowler v. Equitable Trust Co. 141 U. S. 411, 415 [35: 794, 796].

These are substantially all the questions which arise upon the appeal of the defendant Harrison.

Upon the cross appeal of the complainant he seeks to modify the judgment of the su- [illegible] in regard to the parties to the dis- distributed, one [illegible] the deceased mother of the fund should be other half among his twelve half brothers of sisters (children of the minor's father), to the exclusion of the minor's half brother, Grover William Harrison (the son of his mother by her husband Harrison), who by the judgment of the court is permitted to share in such distribution. As the trial court made that decree and the complainant did not appeal from it, and the supreme court has simply affirmed that provision, the complainant's appeal from the latter decree does not, in our opinion, bring up this question for review. All that the complainant could claim in the supreme court was the affirmance of the judgment as given in the court below, because, as he had not appealed from it, he could not be heard to ask for its modification or reversal. When the supreme court affirmed that provision of the decree the complainant's appeal from that court would not bring the propriety of the provision for distribution before us.

Upon his cross appeal the complainant also asks for a modification of the decree with regard to the rate of interest charged against defendant, claiming it ought to be 12 instead of 6 per cent. We cannot interfere with the rate charged in the original decree, because the complainant has not appealed therefrom, and we do not thiuk we ought to interfere with the rate of 6 per cent charged by the supreme court upon the total amount of the original decree from the time it was entered. It was to a certain extent discretionary with the latter court, and we think we are not called upon to alter and increase the rate charged by that court.

Although the complainant herein did not appeal from the original decree entered by the trial court, yet upon defendant Harrison's appeal therefrom the supreme court modified the 327] *decree in some particulars, and specially in regard to costs, charging them upon the fund instead of against the defendant Harrison individually, as was the decree below. This was a modification of the judgment against the interest of and unfavorable to the complainant herein, as it reduced the amount of the fund for distribution. This question can be reviewed upon the complainant's cross appeal. We are of opinion that there was no proper ground for the modification of the decree as to costs made by the trial court.

The defendant Harrison, by the finding of the court, has wilfully obstructed the distribution of the assets of this estate, and by his misconduct has rendered it necessary that the complainant should obtain possession of them by the institution of this suit, and the necessity for commencing it arose entirely out of his wrongful conduct. This is the finding as approved by the supreme court of the territory. The other findings, showing the false accounts, the wrongful conversions of these moneys, and the wrongful and persistent refusal to pay them over on demand made by the administrator, altogether make out a gross case against the defendant, and leave no reasonable foundation for permitting him, as the supreme court does, to defend this action entirely at the expense of the fund and with no personal responsibility for costs. We see no plausible ground for this privilege.

A clerical error seems to have been made in the distribution by the supreme court. One twenty-sixth part of the estate is undisposed of by the judgment. It provides for the payment of seventeen twenty-sixths to defendant Harrison, and distributes the remaining nine twenty-sixths, one ninth to each of eight named distributees. One name has been accidentally omitted. This can be corrected on application by the court below.

The provision making all the costs payable out of the fund cannot stand, and the decree should charge defendant Harrison with costs personally, as in the original decree entered by the trial court, with the exception that the amount of the decree of the special master is retained at $500. All the costs in this court must be paid by the defendant *Harrison[328 personally. The decree of the Supreme Court of New Mexico is therefore reversed on the cross-appeal of Perea, and the cause remanded, with instructions to enter judgment in conformity with this opinion, with liberty to change the distribution upon application if it shall appear proper.

2. A partner who assumes to dissolve the partnership before the end of the term agreed on in the partnership articles is liable, in an action at law against him by his copartner for the breach of the agreement, to respond in damages for the value of the profits which the plaintiff would otherwise have received.

3. In a court of equity, a partner who after a dissolution of the partnership carries on the business with the partnership property is liable, at the election of the other partner or his representative, to account for the profits thereof, subject to proper allowances.

4. A partner who ousts his copartner from the business before the expiration of a stipulated period of copartnership, during which each is entitled to an equal share of the profits and a monthly allowance for expenses, cannot complain of a decree which requires him to account for and pay over the ousted partner's share of the capital and one half of the wrongful disbursements, and also one half of the net profits of the business made after the ousting, while monthly allowances to the subsequent period are made to him only, and not to the ousted partner; and it is immaterial in this respect whether the ousting is deemed to effect a dissolution of the partnership or not.

Argued October 27, 28, 1896. Decided November 29, 1897.

APPEAL from a decree of the Supreme Court of the Territory of Utah modifying and as modified affirming the decree of the Third Judicial District Court of that Territory in an action brought by Charles L. Hannaman, plaintiff, against Lewis C. Karrick for the dissolution of a partnership, the appointment of a receiver, the application of the partnership property to the partnership debts, and a division of the remainder between the partners the said parties to the action. Affirmed.

See same case below, 9 Utah, 236.

Statement by Mr. Justice Gray:

This was a suit brought April 17, 1890, in the third judicial district court of the territory of Utah, by Hannaman against Karrick for the dissolution of a partnership, formed Feb-

v. Bradley, 39 N. Y. 129; Masterton v. Brooklyn, 7 Hill, 61, 42 Am. Dec. 38; Bagley v. Smith, 10 N. Y. 489, 61 Am. Dec. 756; Wakeman v. Wheeler & Wilson Mfg. Co. 101 N. Y. 205, 54 Am. Rep. 676; Savery v. Ingersoll, 46 Hun, 179.

The fact that the whole capital provided for by articles of copartnership has been lost is sufficient ground for a refusal by one of the partners to further continue the business, although the time limited by the articles for the continuation of the copartnership has not expired. Van Ness v. Fisher, 5 Lans. 236.

Although copartnership property be transferred to a third person by one of two partners, the other partner need not rely upon his action for damages; he has a right to compel a surrender of his share of the proceeds which have been received by his copartner upon the sale of the partnership property. Tannenbaum v. Armeny, 81 Hun, 582.

A partner who has unlawfully assumed to destroy a partnership contract and to make a new one for his own benefit should be deemed to hold it for the benefit of the firm. Spears v. Willis, 69 Hun, 409.

A partner occupies a fiduciary position with regard to his copartners and the funds of the firm, and will not be permitted to make a personal profit out of the use of such funds. 1 Lindley, Partn. 2d Am. ed. 303; Featherstonhaugh v. Fenwick, 17 Ves. Jr. 298; Anderson v. Lemon, 8 N. Y. 236; Mitchell v. Reed, 61 N. Y. 123, 19 Am. Rep. 252; Riddle v. Whiteroud, 35 U. S. 621 (34: 283); Baldwin v. Von Mich- 20 L. R. Alun. 43; Holmes v. Gilman, 138 N. Y. 377,

Although partners term occupy the position in the strict sense of the other and towards the firm funds, towards each is one of a fiduciary nature, calling for the maintenance and exercise of the greatest good faith between them. Such a relationship authorizes the same remedy on behalf of the wronged partner as would exist against a trustee, strictly so-called, on behalf of a cestui que trust. Re Hallett, L. R. 13 Ch. Div. 696, 712; Holmes v. Gilman, 138 N. Y. 377, 20 L. R. A. 566.

All the partnership property and partnership contracts should be managed for the equal benefit of all partners according to their respective shares and interests therein. If, therefore, any one partner should stipulate clandestinely for any private advantage or benefit to himself to the disadvantage or in fraud of his partners, he will in equity be compelled to divide such gains with them. 2 Story, Partn. § 174; 2 Kent, Com. 51; Spears v. Where A and B carried on trade, as partners, with the funds of A, in the name of B, and without any dissolution of the partnership or rendering any account to A, B afterwards, without the consent of A, entered into a partnership with C, and carried into the new concern all the funds of the former partnership; and A, on the death of B, filed a bill against his administratrix and C, his surviving partner, for a discovery and account: and C demurred to so much of the bill as sought an account from him on the transactions and profits of the partnership between him and the intestate, and of the personal estate of the intestate in his hands,— the demurrer was overruled. Where one partner withdraws funds from the copartnership, contrary to the articles of copartnership, and employs them in trade, he may be required to account, not only for the interest, but for the profits, of that trade. Dimond v. Henderson, 47 Wis. 176.

[illegible] funds in his [illegible] must account not only for moneys or uses the partnership moneys so withdrawn, but for [illegible] speculations, he trade. Stoughton v. Lynch, 1 Johns. Ch. 467.

This principle of this case is restricted to cases in which the partnership funds are clandestinely withdrawn, or fraudulently misappropriated, by one or more partners, without the consent and to the injury of the others. McAdams v. Hawes, 9 Bush, 22.

Where one or more partners of a firm continue the business after dissolution of a firm by death or otherwise, the retiring partner, or the legal representatives of the deceased partner, are entitled to his share of the profits after dissolution. Phillips v. Reeder, 18 N. J. Eq. 99.

Where a partner withdrew money from the concern for his expenses, which claim was rejected as ruary 3, 1886, by an agreement in writing, by which they agreed to become partners in a mercantile and laundry business for the term of five years from that date, with a capital stock of $25,000, of which the plaintiff was to furnish $5,000, and the defendant $20,000; the defendant lent the plaintiff the sum of $5,000 for five years, for which the plaintiff gave a promissory note, payable at the end of that time, and secured by mortgage upon his interest in the partnership property; the plaintiff was to give his entire time and attention to the partnership business, and the defendant was to devote to it only such time as he should see fit; the plaintiff to have the control and management of the business generally and entirely, except as the defendant might designate, and such matters to be subject to mutual agree-329] ment; one half of the *net profits of the business to go to the defendant in repayment of $15,000 of the capital stock furnished by him, and the other half to be allowed to remain in the business, except that each partner might draw out not exceeding $125 a month for personal expenses; the profits and losses to be shared equally, and neither party to have any other salary or compensation for services; and the title and interest of the partners in the partnership property to be proportionate to their respective contributions to the capital.

The complaint alleged the following facts: The parties carried on business in conformity with the agreement until February 1, 1888, when the defendant took exclusive possession of all the partnership business, stock, books, and accounts, and of the premises where the business was carried on, and ever afterwards prevented the plaintiff from participating in any manner in the business or deriving any benefits therefrom. The plaintiff until that date performed his part of the agreement, and was ever after ready and willing to perform it, and so informed the defendant. From that date, the defendant wrongfully, and in fraud of the plaintiff's rights, carried on and controlled the partnership business for his own exclusive benefit, and applied to his own use from the proceeds and profits of the same large sums of money, exceeding the proportion to which he was entitled. On January 1, 1890, the defendant, without the plaintiff's knowledge or assent, sold and delivered to the Bast-Marshall Mercantile Company all the assets and property of the partnership. The complaint prayed for a dissolution of the partnership, the appointment of a receiver, an injunction against interfering with the property, its application to the payment of the partnership debts and a division of the remainder between the partners, the setting aside and cancelation of any transfer or assignment to the Bast-Marshall Mercantile Company, and an account.

The defendant Karrick, in his answer, admitted the partnership, and his own taking possession on February 1, 1888; but denied the other allegations of the complaint; and alleged that the plaintiff mismanaged the business in various particulars specified, and that when the [330]defendant took possession *the partnership was insolvent and heavily in debt, and the plaintiff was owing to it a large sum of money and was insolvent, and the partnership was then dissolved by mutual consent.

The Bast-Marshall Mercantile Company was originally made a defendant, and filed a separate answer. But the plaintiff afterwards dismissed his suit as against that company; the case was referred, by consent of the remaining parties, to a referee to report his findings of fact and conclusions of law to the court; and at the hearing before the referee much evidence was introduced by either party in support of his allegations and denials.

On October 5, 1891, the referee made his report, in which he set forth all the evidence; and by which he found that the facts were as alleged in the complaint, and were not as alleged in the answer of Karrick; and stated an account, resulting as follows:

Unadjusted and undivided profits January 1, 1890, including $2,616.25 then uncollected by defendant		$22,858 18
Profits realized after January 1, 1890		99 90

Astor, 4 Sandf. Ch. 311; Skidmore v. Collier, 8 Hun, 50.

Where a partner holds exclusive possession and excludes the other he is responsible for the restoration of the excluded partner's interest and for its use, to be paid out of the property as a prior claim. Adams v. Kable, 6 B. Mon. 384, 44 Am. Dec. 772; Jones v. Morehead, 3 B. Mon. 377.

Property purchased on partnership account by one partner during the period of his exclusion of his copartner must be accounted for. Settembre v. Putnam, 30 Cal. 490.

A partner who is appointed a receiver of the firm, who speculates with the funds, is accountable for the profits, not to his copartners, but to the court whose officer he is. Whitesides v. Lafferty, 3 Humph. 150.

Where a partnership is continued by executors, and afterwards terminated by them, the firm is no longer accountable for profits. Colgate v. Colgate, 23 N. J. Eq. 372.

Where a partner, who took the assets to wind up the concern, appropriated to himself certain bonds, then worth 78 cents on a dollar, and which afterwards became worth more, he was held chargeable with the present value of those retained, and the value at the time of sale of those sold. Richards v. Burt, Iowa, 723.

A partner in firm's premises after dissolution, exclusive possession of the their rental value. Liquidation is chargeable with Stoughton v. Lynch, 2 Johns. Ch. 209, 109 Ill. 94; Peace, 4 Ired. Eq. 223, 45 Am. Dec. 514; Tennant v. Guy, 19 N. Y. S. R. 667.

Where P undertook, without any just cause, to exclude H, his partner, from an interest in a valuable contract, in which they were equally concerned, and to take in K in his stead, and K, knowing that P could not rightfully exclude H, conspired with P to accomplish that purpose and undertook to appropriate to himself the profits of the contract which of right belonged to H, these acts and doings of K and P had no effect on the rights of H, and he is entitled to one half of the profits of the contract. Pearce v. Ham, 113 U. S. 585 (28: 1067).

When a partnership is dissolved by death of a member, or otherwise, and the other members continue the business, or enter upon new enterprises with the firm property, they may be required to account to the outgoing partner or his representative for the resulting profits. And in some cases it may be optional on his part whether they be required to allow to him a due share of the profits or interest upon his share of the capital. Crawshay v. Collins, 15 Ves. Jr. 218, 1 Jac. & W. 267, 2 Russ. Ch. 325; Featherstonhaugh v. Fenwick, 17 Ves. Jr. 298; Wedderburn v. Wedderburn, 2 Keen, 722, 1 Myl. & C. 41.

And the same rule is applicable where a sale by one member of a firm to his partners is set aside for fraud or other cause. Cook v. Collingridge, Jac. 607; King v. Leighton, 100 N. Y. 386.

The bankruptcy of one member of a firm only works a dissolution of the partnership to the extent of disabling it from entering into new engagements or assuming new obligations, except such as are required to complete its unfinished business and to wind up its affairs. King v. Leighton, 100 N. Y. 386.

It is the duty of the solvent members to take possession of the firm assets, perform its contracts, extinguish its liabilities, and close up its business, and it is the right of the representatives of the bankrupt partner, unless there are peculiar circumstances exempting the particular case in ing, not ... rule, to have an account- ness of the firm, ... completed business unfinished at the dissolution completed afterwards, and, at their option, to ... may be realized from new business entered into and carried on with the assets of the firm. King v. Leighton, 100 N. Y. 386.

In dissolution of a partnership when not the result of mutual agreement there must be notice by the party desiring a dissolution, to his copartner, of his election to terminate the partnership, or his election must be manifested by unequivocal acts or circumstances brought to the knowledge of the other party which signify the exercise of the will of the former that the partnership be dissolved. 2 Lindley, Partn. bk. 4, p. 572, § 1, and cases cited; Spears v. Willis, 151 N. Y. 449.

was not dissolved; but that it expired February 3, 1891, according to the terms of the agreement; that the profits and losses of the partnership business should be divided equally between the parties, after crediting each with his advances to and investments in the partnership; and that the sum of $12,040.53 was therefore owing to the plaintiff. The court adopted the referee's findings of fact and conclusions of law, and entered a decree accordingly.

The defendant appealed to the supreme court of the territory, which held that, for the reasons stated in its opinion (the material part of which upon this point is copied in the margin†), the defendant could not dissolve the 332] partnership *without reasonable cause, and without the plaintiff's consent, before the expiration of the term stipulated in the partnership articles; and therefore that the partnership 333]had not *been dissolved by the acts of the defendant; but that, as each partner was permitted by those articles to draw out of the partnership $125 a month for personal expenses, the defendant should have been allowed the sum of $3,000 as personal expenses for the two years during which he conducted the business of the firm; and that the judgment should be modified by deducting one half of this sum, and, so modified, be affirmed, for the sum of $10,540.53. 9 Utah, 236. The defendant appealed to this court.

A partner can, at any time, if he believes his interest to be endangered by the manner in which the business is being conducted, or if his relations with his associates have become so unpleasant as to be productive of discord and strife, in good faith and without any fraudulent or evil motive, terminate the partnership by his own act, leaving the other member or members of the firm to his or their action for damages upon the contract for any injury he or they may have received thereby.

†"Where the partnership is merely at will, the right of one partner to terminate it must be conceded; but where by agreement it is to continue for a time stipulated the party seeking a dissolution before the expiration of the time ought in justice at least to be required to act in good faith, and at a reasonable time, and in a reasonable manner. In the case of a partnership for a stipulated time of duration, where the business has been established, is becoming profitable, and has good future prospects, to allow one of the partners sua sponte to expel the other and dissolve the partnership with a view to appropriate the business to himself would be to adopt a doctrine at once inequitable and unsupported by either reason or justice. There seems to be no good reason why a person should be allowed to commit a breach of his contract in such case, while in all other cases of flagrant violation, not within the partnership, he would be compelled to specifically perform if it was within his power to do so. Why should a partner be thus allowed to ruin the business of the firm from mere caprice, or of his own volition, without cause, and in violation of his agreement, and sacrifice the entire object of the partnership? That such a violation may entitle the injured partner to damages is no answer, for damages, in many cases, must necessarily prove to be utterly inadequate to compensate for the destruction of a profitable and growing business; and besides, this mode of redress is usually slow and unsatisfactory, and is not a remedy that will or can do complete justice between the parties. Where there is such a breach between the partners as to render continuance in [illegible] its formation, or if for [illegible] the partnership ought to be dissolved before the expiration of the term, then a court of equity is competent to grant relief. But it would scarcely seem to come within the principles of justice to permit one partner to expel another from a profitable business for some real or fancied wrong or mismanagement, and then continue the business himself, and profit by his own wrong, responsible only in damages.

"Mr. Justice Story, in his Commentaries on the Law of Partnership, in § 275, speaking of the power of one partner to dissolve the partnership where the time of duration is stipulated, says: 'In cases where the partnership is by the agreement to endure for a limited period of time the question whether it may within the period be dissolved by the mere act or will of one of the partners, without the consent of all the others, does not seem to be absolutely and definitely settled in our jurisprudence, although it would not seem, upon principle, to admit of any real doubt or difficulty. Whenever a stipulation is positively made that the partnership shall endure for a fixed period, or for a particular adventure or voyage, it would seem to be at once inequitable and injurious to permit any partner at his mere pleasure to violate his engagement, and thereby to jeopard, if not sacrifice, the whole objects of the partnership; for the success of the whole undertaking may depend upon the due accomplishment of the adventure or voyage, or the entire time be required to put the partnership into beneficial operation.' In Gerard v. Gateau, 84 Ill. 121 [25 Am. Rep. 438], Mr. Justice Scott, delivering the opinion of the court, said: 'A party who is the author of the ill-feeling between himself and partners ought not to be permitted to make the relation he has induced the ground of a dissolution of the partnership. His conduct may have been taken with a view to that very result, and it would be inequitable to allow him advantage from his own wrongful acts. It would allow one partner, at his election, to put an end to his own deliberate contract, when the other had been guilty of no wrongful act or omission of duty. The results flowing from a premature dissolution of a partnership might be most disastrous to a partner who had embarked his capital in the enterprise.' So in Henn v. Walsh, 2 Edw. Ch. 129, the vice chancellor said: 'A partnership agreement, like any other, is b[illegible]ing upon the parties. They must adhere from terms. Neither partner is at liberty [illegible] a sufficient it against the will of the other; one partner will [illegible]. Mere dissatisfa[illegible] a bill for a dissolution, not justify him [illegible]ross agreement it is to continue where [illegible] term; and the court will not interfere to dissolve the contract upon such ground.'

"The views thus expressed have the apparent support of most elementary writers and seem to be in conformity with the doctrine prevailing in England. The contrary doctrine, if not indefensible, is founded on reasons exceedingly artificial. It is based on the ground that one partner has the rights to found his claim, real or otherwise, to immediate safety and indemnity on an obvious injury to the interests and rights of another, which is alike inequitable and unjust; and we think it is not supported by the weight of authority. 2 Lindley, Partn. 2d Am. ed. 1263, 1264.

Mr. Justice Gray delivered the opinion of the court:

Much of the argument for the appellant was devoted to a discussion of conflicting evidence, which is not open to examination by this court, its authority upon appeal from the supreme court of a territory being limited to the question whether the facts found by that court support its judgment. Haws v. Victoria Copper Min. Co. 160 U. S. 303 [40: 436]; Harrison v. Perea, just decided [ante, 478].

The principal question of law discussed in the opinion of the supreme court of the territory, and at the argument in this court, was whether a partnership, which by the copartnership articles is to continue for a specified time, can be dissolved by one partner at his own will without the assent of the other before the expiration of that time.

It is universally conceded that a contract of partnership containing no stipulation as to the 334]time during which it shall *continue in force does not endure for the life of the partners, or of either of them, nor for any longer time than their mutual consent, may be dissolved by either partner at his own will at any time. Peacock v. Peacock, 16 Ves. Jr. 49; Crawshay v. Maule, 1 Swanst. 495; Neilson v. Mossend Iron Co. L. R. 11 App. Cas. 298; 3 Kent, Com. 53; Story, Partn. § 269.

Upon the question how far the status or relation of a partnership, which by the partnership agreement is to continue for a certain number of years, can be determined by one partner without the consent of the other before the expiration of that time, there has been some difference of opinion.

The principal reasons and authorities in favor of the position that a contract of partnership for a definite time cannot be dissolved at the mere will of one partner are stated or referred to in the opinion of the supreme court of the territory in this case, reported in 9 Utah, 236.

Those which support the opposite view may be summed up as follows: A contract of partnership is one by which two or more persons agree to carry on a business for their common benefit, each contributing property or services, and having a community of interest in the profits. It is in effect a contract of mutual agency, each partner acting as a principal in his own behalf and as agent for his copartner. Meehan v. Valentine, 145 U. S. 611 [36: 835]. Every partnership creates a personal relation between the partners, rests upon their mutual consent, and exists between them only. Without their agreement or approval, no third person can become a member of the partnership, either by act of a single partner, or by operation of law; and the death or bankruptcy of a partner dissolves the partnership. 3 Kent, Com. 25, 55, 58; Wilkins v. Davis, 2 Low. Dec. 511. So, an absolute assignment by one partner of all his interest in the partnership to a stranger dissolves the partnership, although it does not make the assignee a tenant in common with the other partners in the partnership property. Fourth Nat. Bank v. New Orleans & Carrolton Railroad Co. 78 U. S. 11 Wall. 624, 628 [20: 82, 83]; Marquand v. New York Mfg. Co. 17 Johns. 525, 528, 535. No partnership can efficiently or beneficially *carry on [335 its business without the mutual confidence and co-operation of all the partners. Even when, by the partnership articles, they have covenanted with each other that the partnership shall continue for a certain period, the partnership may be dissolved at any time, at the will of any partner, so far as to put an end to the partnership relation and to the authority of each partner to act for all; but rendering the partner who breaks his covenant liable to an action at law for damages, as in other cases of breaches of contract. Skinner v. Dayton, 19 Johns. 513, 538 [10 Am. Dec. 286]; 3 Kent, Com. 54, 55, 62; Cape Sable Co.'s Case, 3 Bland, Ch. 606, 674; Monroe v. Conner, 15 Me. 178, 180 [32 Am. Dec. 148]; Mason v. Connell, 1 Whart. 381, 388; Slemmer's Appeal, 58 Pa. 168, 176 [98 Am Dec. 255]; Blake v. Dorgan, 1 G. Greene, 537, 540; Solomon v. Kirkwood, 55 Mich. 256, 259, 260. According to the authorities just cited, the only difference, so far as concerns the right of dissolution by one partner, between a partnership for an indefinite period and one for a specified term, is this: In the former case, the dissolution is no breach of the partnership agreement, and affords the other partner no ground of complaint. In the latter case, such a dissolution before the expiration of the time stipulated is a breach of the agreement, and as such to be compensated in damages. But in either case the action of one partner does actually dissolve the partnership.

A court of equity, doubtless, will not assist the partner breaking his contract to procure a dissolution of the partnership, because, upon familiar principles, a partner who has not fully and fairly performed the partnership agreement on his part has no standing in a court of equity to enforce any rights under the agreement. Rutland Marble Co. v. Ripley, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 339, 358 [19: 955, 961]. But, generally speaking, neither will it interfere at the suit of the other partner to prevent the dissolution, because, while it may compel the execution of articles of partnership so as to put the parties in the same position as if the articles had been executed as agreed, it will seldom, if ever, specifically compel subsequent performance of the contract by either party, the contract of partnership being of an essen-336] tially personal character. *Batten, Specific Performance, 165–167; 3 Lindley, Partn. chap. 10, § 4; Pom. Specific Performance, § 290; Scott v. Rayment, L. R. 7 Eq. 112; Satterthwait v. Marshall, 4 Del. Ch. 337, 354; Reed v. Vidal, 5 Rich. Eq. 289; Somerby v. Buntin, 118 Mass. 279, 287 [19 Am. Rep. 459]. Especially, where by the partnership agreement, as in the case at bar, the defendant is to supply all or most of the capital, and the plaintiff is to furnish his personal services, the agreement cannot be specifically enforced against the plaintiff, and will not be enforced against the defendant. Stocker v. Wedderburn, 3 Kay & J. 393, 404; Buck v. Smith, 29 Mich. 166 [18 Am. Rep. 84].

In the somewhat analogous case of a contract of hiring and service, it is well settled that a court of equity cannot compel the performance of the service, although it may in some cases enforce a negative stipulation not to serve any third person within the time agreed. Dietrichsen v. Cabburn, 2 Phill. Ch. 52, 59, and cases cited; Lumley v. Wagner, 1 De G. M. & G. 604; Wolverhampton & Walsall Railway Co. v. London & Northwestern Railway Co. L. R. 16 Eq 433, 440; Whitwood Chemical Co v. Hardman [1891] 2 Ch. 416; Davis v. Foreman [1894] 3 Ch. 654; 13 Law Quarterly Review, 306; Tobey v. Bristol, 3 Story, 800, 824.

We are not prepared, therefore, to assent to the opinion of the court below that a partnership for a definite time cannot be dissolved by one partner at his own will, and without the consent of his copartner, within that time; and consequently that the partnership between these parties was not dissolved on February 1, 1888, when the defendant assumed exclusive possession and control of the business and property of the partnership, and excluded the plaintiff from any participation therein. But it is unnecessary to express an opinion upon this point, because, however it might be decided, it would not affect the conclusion in favor of the plaintiff in the present case.

Even if the partnership should be considered as having been actually dissolved at that date, yet the dissolution did not put an end to the plaintiff's right to his share in the property and the profits of the partnership. In a case in which both parties, *in their pleadings, [337 assumed the partnership to have been dissolved, this court, speaking by Mr. Justice Miller, held that drunkenness and dishonesty on the part of one partner and his consequent exclusion from the business did not authorize his copartner, "of his own motion, to treat the partnership as ended and to take himself all the benefits of their joint labors and joint property," or exempt him from responsibility to account to the excluded partner. Ambler v. Whipple, 87 U. S. 20 Wall. 546, 555, 557 [22: 403–405]. And in a later case, the court, speaking by Mr. Justice Woods, said: "However the question may be decided, whether one partner may by his own mere will dissolve a partnership formed for a definite purpose or period, it is clear that upon such a dissolution one partner cannot appropriate to himself all the partnership assets, or turn over the share of his partner to another with whom he proposes to form a new partnership." Pearce v. Ham, 113 U. S. 585, 593 [28: 1067, 1070].

A partner who assumes to dissolve the partnership, before the end of the term agreed on in the partnership articles, is liable, in an action at law against him by his copartner for the breach of the agreement, to respond in damages for the value of the profits which the plaintiff would otherwise have received. Bagley v. Smith, 10 N. Y. 489 [61 Am. Dec. 756]; Dennis v. Maxfield, 10 Allen, 138. In a court of equity, a partner who, after a dissolution of the partnership, carries on the business with the partnership property is liable, at the election of the other partner or his representative, to account for the profits thereof, subject to proper allowances. Ambler v. Whipple, and Pearce v. Ham, above cited; Hartman v. Woehr, 18 N. J. Eq. 383; Freeman v. Freeman, 136 Mass. 260; Holmes v. Gilman, 138 N. Y. 369 [20 L. R. A. 566]; 3 Kent, Com. 64.

In the case at bar, by the terms of the agreement in writing, dated February 3, 1886, under which the partnership was formed, it was to continue for five years, that is to say, until February 3, 1891; the plaintiff was to contribute $5,000, and the defendant $20,000, to the capital; the defendant lent the plaintiff the sum of $5,000, for which the plaintiff gave his promissory note, payable at the end of five years; the plaintiff was to have the general management of the business; each *part-[338 ner might draw out not exceeding $125 a month for personal expenses; the profits and losses were to be shared equally, and neither partner was to have any other compensation for services; and their title in the partnership property was to be in proportion to their contributions to the capital.

By the facts found by the courts of the territory, it appears that the business was carried on, according to the agreement, for two years, or until February 1, 1888; that the defendant then took exclusive possession of the property and the business of the partnership, and thenceforth carried on the business profitably and for his own benefit, and excluded the plaintiff from any participation in the business or the profits, although the plaintiff was, as he informed the defendant, ready and willing to perform his part of the partnership agreement; and the defendant on January 1, 1890, a year before the expiration of the term agreed on, and without the plaintiff's knowledge or assent, sold out and delivered to a stranger all the property of the partnership.

The judgment of the court of first instance charged the defendant with the amount of capital paid by the plaintiff into the partnership, deducting, however, the whole amount of the plaintiff's promissory note payable to the defendant at the end of the term of five years; and further charged the defendant with half of the net profits of the business during the two years that he carried it on after ousting the plaintiff and before selling out to a stranger, and with half of the wrongful disbursements of the defendant afterwards. The supreme court of the territory, affirming the judgment in other respects, held that, as by the agreement of partnership each partner was permitted to draw out a certain sum monthly for personal expenses, the defendant was entitled to such an allowance monthly for the two years during which he conducted the business, and the same should be deducted from the profits to be accounted for, and the judgment in favor of the plaintiff reduced accordingly. The court made no such allowance to the plaintiff. And, in accordance with the partnership articles, neither partner was allowed any compensation for his services other than his half of the profits.

339] *It does not appear to have been suggested by the defendant in either of the courts of the territory, and could not successfully be contended, that in estimating the damages or the profits which the plaintiff was entitled to recover, any deduction should be made by reason of his not having performed during those two years the services, as manager of the business, which he had agreed by the partnership articles to perform. No finding as to the value of such services was made or requested; and the defendant himself not only refused to let the plaintiff, as he offered to do, perform them during those two years, but in his answer and at the hearing before the referee insisted that the plaintiff's services as manager were of no benefit to the partnership.

The result is that, whether the partnership should or should not be considered to have been dissolved when the defendant ousted the plaintiff and assumed the exclusive possession and control of the property and business of the partnership, the defendant has shown no ground for reversing or modifying the final decree of the supreme court of the territory.

Decree affirmed.

BALTIMORE & OHIO RAILROAD COMPANY.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 339-349.)

Care required of a passenger taking a train—implied invitation to cross the track—questions for jury—contributory negligence of passenger.

1. The care required of a passenger crossing a track from a station platform to reach his train is not to be determined by the rules of law as to travelers upon a highway at a railroad crossing, as the railroad company owes the former a higher degree of care than it owes the latter.
2. The implied invitation to cross a railroad track from a station platform to a standing train waiting for passengers justifies one in assuming that the carrier's business is not so arranged as to expose him to the hazard of danger to life and limb unless he exercises the very highest degree of care and caution.
3. Questions of negligence are for the jury when reasonable men may fairly differ upon them.
4. The negligence of a person in crossing a railroad track from a depot platform to a standing train which he is about to take, when another train is coming which he does not see, is a question for the jury.

Duty of railroad company to protect from injury one who has purchased a ticket and is about to take a train; duty of carrier of passengers, stations and platforms; injuries in getting on trains; running a train past another train standing at station; cable cars; contributory negligence.

A carrier who permits passengers to wait in its depot for trains is liable to one who after purchasing a ticket and so waiting is indecently assaulted by its station agent. St. Louis S. W. R. Co. v. Griffith, 12 Tex. Civ. App. 631.

A common carrier of passengers is bound to use a high degree of care for their safety so far as it is dependent upon the means employed and upon those engaged in the business, and the discharge of such duty requires the exercise of all the care and vigilance that human foresight may suggest. Hurley v. New York & B. Brew. Co. 13 App. Div. 167.

The duty of a common carrier of passengers is to exercise the highest practicable care for their

IN ERROR to the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia to review a judgment of that court affirming the judgment of the Supreme Court entered upon the verdict of the jury in favor of the defendant, the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company, in an action brought by John W. Warner, administrator of Joseph W. Collis, for damages for the killing of said Joseph W. Collis at defendant's station in the city of Washington. Reversed, and case remanded with directions for a new trial.

See same case below, 7 App. D. C. 79.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Rodolphe Claughton, for plaintiff in error:

The responsibility of the carrier begins when the passenger presents himself for transportation; and this he may be said to do when he approaches the place of reception, for the purpose.

Cooley, Torts, 770.

Neither the purchase of a ticket nor the entry into the car is essential to create the relation of carrier and passenger. The plaintiff asked to buy and pay for a ticket, and he was entitled to the protection due to a passenger from the moment he entered upon the premises of the defendant.

Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Galligher, 89 Va. 843.

Plaintiff purchased a ticket on defendant's railway; and that fact created the relation of carrier and passenger.

Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. v. Rector, 104 Ill. 301.

If a passenger leaves a train for the purpose of obtaining refreshments, at a regular station, or transacting business during its stay there, but intending to return and continue his passage, he does not cease to be a passenger, or lose the right of being protected.

safety; and such duty continues in some measure or degree until such passenger has left the premises of the carrier. Illinois C. R. Co. v. Davidson, 46 U. S. App. 300, 76 Fed. Rep. 517, 22 C. C. A. 306.

A passenger upon a railroad train who has paid his fare is entitled to a seat, and is not, as matter of law, guilty of contributory negligence in attempting to pass from one car to another, with due care and caution to obtain it, which will prevent him from recovering where he is thrown from the train and injured. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. v. Clowes, 93 Va. 189.

A railroad company is liable for injuries to a passenger properly upon a platform constructed by it and run down without fault of his own, whether the negligence is in the situation and construction of the platform, or in the running and management of trains, or in both. Illinois C. R. Co. v. Davidson, 46 U. S. App. 300, 76 Fed. Rep. 517, 22 C. C. A. 306.

Passengers obliged to cross railroad tracks to board a train standing at a station have the right to suppose that the company will regulate the movement of its trains on the tracks to be crossed with due regard to their safety. Chicago, St. P. & K. C. R. Co. v. Ryan, 165 Ill. 88.

A passenger at a railway station, who is killed while attempting to cross the track from the platform on one side of the tracks to the one on the other side, when he knew that passengers were required to go from one platform to the other by an overhead bridge instead of by crossing the tracks, is guilty of such contributory negligence as will prevent a recovery for his death. Riester v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 16 App. Div. 216.

One is not, as matter of law, guilty of contributory negligence in using a slope of a platform covered with ice on taking a train instead of steps also provided, although she had been cautioned to be careful as the platform was slippery. Rathgebe v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 179 Pa. 31.

A man standing on a station platform waiting for a train after purchasing a ticket, when he is struck and injured by the body of a person killed by a passing train, has no greater right of action than if he had been injured at any other place where he had a right to be. Wood v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 177 Pa. 306, 35 L. R. A. 199.

A railroad company is liable for injuries to a passenger who, after boarding the train, is required by the conductor to get off and go to the rear of the train where there is no platform and the lowest step of the car is 30 inches from the ground, and who is injured by a sudden and unnecessary jerk by the brakeman, while attempting to get on the car. International & G. N. R. Co. v. Mulliken, 10 Tex. Civ. App. 663.

A street railroad company is liable for an injury to a passenger free from contributory negligence, caused by the conductor's suddenly starting the car after the passenger has stepped upon a footboard upon the side thereof, and before he has entered and taken a safe position or had reasonable time to do so. Anacostia & P. River R. Co. v Klein, 8 App. Dec. 75.

A person intending to become a passenger upon a train is subject to the same rule as other persons as to the care required in going upon a railroad track, and is guilty of negligence in crossing the track for the purpose of boarding a train and stopping at a platform on the opposite side and on another track, without looking to see whether a train is approaching upon the track nearest to him. Warner v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 7 App. D. C. 79.

One is not, as matter of law, guilty of contributory negligence in attempting to board a moving train. Birmingham Electric R. Co. v. Clay, 108 Ala. 233.

One who attempts to board a train moving at a rate of 4 miles an hour, with both arms full of bundles, is guilty of such contributory negligence as will prevent a recovery for his death. Birmingham Electric R. Co. v. Clay, 108 Ala. 233.

An intending passenger who attempts to board a railroad train under increasing speed of 6 to 7 miles an hour is guilty of negligence which will prevent recovery for his injuries, although he is young, vigorous, and has been a constant traveler on railroads, and is told by the conductor to jump aboard, Heaton v. Kansas City, P. & G. R. Co. 65 Mo. App. 479.

A railroad company may without the imputation of negligence continue to use a platform not obviously dangerous, which has been in daily use for years, and uniformly proved adequate and convenient. Illinois C. R. Co. v. Hobbs, 58 Ill. App. 130.

A railroad company is liable for an injury to one free from negligence who was injured by falling over a mail bag thrown on the platform between the waiting-room door and the train which she intended to take, where the platform was insuffi-degree of care on the part of the defendant could afford, under the circumstances.

Mr. Justice White delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was begun in the supreme court of the District of Columbia to recover damages for the killing of the plaintiff's intestate on June 22, 1893, at a suburban station of the city of Washington, located on the line of the defendant's road, known as University station.

It appeared from the evidence that at the station referred to the company operated a double-track road, the tracks running substantially from north to south, the southerly direction leading to Washington and the northerly direction leading away from that city. The two tracks being side by side, one consequently laid to the west and the other to the east. The distance between the rails of each track was 4 feet 8½ inches, *while the [341 distance between the east and west tracks, respectively, was 7 feet 5 inches.

At the place in question the station building was on the outer side of the west track, and contained a waiting room, a ticket office, and the other conveniences of a passenger station. Fronting the station building and beside the track was the necessary platform to enable passengers to enter or descend from any train which might there stop. In the space between the east and west track there was no platform safety of such persons. Illinois C. R. Co. v. Wall, 58 Ill. App. 588.

A railroad company which furnishes a safe and convenient platform in front of its depot is not liable for an injury to a passenger who, while waiting for a train, falls into a pit while walking in the darkness on a platform at the back of the depot which was not intended for passengers,—especially where the exercise of ordinary care would have shown the danger of walking there. Gunderman v. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. 58 Mo. App. 370.

A passenger on a railway train who is injured while leaving a depot belonging to another company, used as a union depot by both companies, because of a defective approach thereto, may recover against both companies for the injuries. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Glenk, 9 Tex. Civ. App. 599.

A railroad company is liable for the negligence of a mail agent in throwing a mail sack upon a station platform, causing the injury of a person thereon, although the company has no right to interfere with the discharge of his duties, if it had notice of his practice to throw sacks in this way. Galloway v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 56 Minn. 346, 23 L. R. A. 442.

The duty of a railway company to keep its station platform properly lighted and free from dangerous obstructions is not confined to passengers alone, but extends to persons coming to the station to meet their friends or see them safely off. New York, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Mushrush, 11 Ind. App. 192.

A passenger who, through heedlessness or forgetfulness, does not recollect having seen, the preceding evening, an obstruction on a platform on the route from the station-house to the train, and stumbles over it, is guilty of such contributory negligence as will prevent a recovery for the injury, although the company was negligent in not having the way clear, or in not having sufficient light to enable passengers to see the obstruction. Wood v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 100 Ala. 660.

The surroundings at a railroad station must be such as not to retard, mislead, or hazard the safety of passengers in their departure from the train. McSloop v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 59 Fed. Rep. 431.

A railway passenger has the right to assume that the approaches, tracks, platforms, and places for entering and leaving cars at stations are in a reasonably safe condition for such purposes. Kentucky & I. Bridge Co. v. McKinney, 9 Ind. App. 213.

A railroad company is not liable to one injured while attempting to board a freight train having a cab attached for the accommodation of passengers, at a place where the train does not usually stop to receive passengers, without the knowledge of the conductor or other person in control of the train, from the starting of the train before such person passes from the platform to the inside of the cab, where the conductor has distinctly announced in the hearing of persons assembled at such place that they should not get aboard there, and that the train would move on and stop for them elsewhere near by, although such person does not hear the announcement. Curry v. Georgia Midland & G. R. Co. 92 Ga. 293.

A railway company is not liable for personal injuries sustained by a passenger by violent contact with the edge of a platform in dangerously close proximity to the train, where he knew of its situation and had ample time to board the train while it was standing still, but neglected to do so for his own convenience, and momentarily forgot the dangerous proximity of the platform. McLaren v. Alabama M. R. Co. 100 Ala. 506.

A railroad company which leaves a car in its accustomed position at the platform, open and apparently ready to receive passengers, is guilty of negligence in suddenly jerking the car forward in such a manner that a child rightfully about to enter as a passenger is thrown off the platform, sustaining injuries from which it dies. Daley v. Port Jervis, M. & N. Y. R. Co. 61 N. Y. S. R. 632.

A railway company is liable for an injury to a passenger who was thrown off a narrow passageway 3 or 4 inches wide provided for passengers, while she was attempting to get upon a train, by reason of the unintentional turning of another passenger, although the station is common to several roads. Redner v. Lehigh & H. River R. Co. 73 Hun, 562.

A person who attempts to board a moving train at a place at which it is not scheduled to stop is guilty of contributory negligence which will prevent recovery for injuries sustained, in the absence of any circumstances preventing the free and untrammeled exercise of his faculties and judgment. Distler v. Long Island R. Co. 78 Hun, 252.

A passenger who unnecessarily and without invitation goes upon a railroad track to take a train, and is injured by being struck by a train, is guilty of contributory negligence, although a few days previously at the request of a conductor he took a train by going upon the track in the same manner. Foreman v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 159 Pa. 541.

or other facility for passengers either to enter or leave the train, hut on the other side of the east track there was a platform which was uncovered, hut which was manifestly constructed for the purpose of facilitating the entry into or departure from any train which might stop at that point on the east track. These east and west platforms were connected by a plank crossing, which came opposite the center of the station huilding.

There was a road crossing adjoining the station, and the travel was such as seems to have necessitated the use of crossing gates and the employment hy the railroad company of a gate watchman. On the east side of the track there was also a settlement known as Brookland, and several of the witnesses who testified at the trial lived in the immediate vicinity of the station in question.

Whilst, as we have said, the substantial direction of the two tracks was north and south, nevertheless the proof showed that in the southward direction of the tracks, that is, towards Washington, the tracks were not perfectly straight, but were somewhat curved. As to the foregoing facts, there seems from the hill of exceptions to have been no conflict of proof.

There was proof tending to show that on the morning of the accident, at about twenty minutes past seven o'clock, the deceased alighted at University station from a local train hound to Washington. One of the stopping points of such train on the way to University station was a small station known as Forest Glen. After attending to some business in the neighborhood of University station, Collis returned to that station at ahout half past eight o'clock on the same morning. He was then seen engaged in conversation with several persons in 342]*or ahout the station building, which we have already described. There was a local train hound out from Washington, that is, going north, which was scheduled to stop at Forest Glen, and which was due to arrive at University station at nine minutes past nine o'clock, whilst there was an express train bound to Washington scheduled to pass the same station at eleven minutes past nine. The proof tended to show that the local train arrived at University station a few minutes late, and that either as it was stopping at the east platform or after it had actually stopped there Collis, who had in his possession a return-trip ticket from University station to Forest Glen, hurriedly went from under the arch of the station building in the direction of the local train. There was conflict in the proof as to whether when Collis started the local train had actually stopped on the east track or was slowing down. There was also conflict in the evidence as to where Collis was when he started to the local train. The engineer of the express train testified "that after he got hy the whistling post he saw Mr. Collis standing on the platform, hut did not think that Collis would go over," and that it was not until Collis started across that he gave the danger signals; whereas another witness for the defense testified that Collis was sitting behind the arch of the station building when the local train arrived, and as it did so he went around the station building "to cross the track and get on his train," and "started straight across, did not stop at all, and did not look in either direction." There was conflict also in the proof as to whether, in crossing towards the train, Collis went on the crosswalk connecting the two platforms, or diagonally upon the track away from the hoard walk and bearing towards the local train. Some of the witnesses testified that as he started toward the local train, not being opposite a platform, hy which to enter a coach, he obliquely directed his course towards the south as though to reach the platform and steps of a car on the local train, whilst other testimony tended to show that as he came out from under the arch and around the huilding he pursued a course directly across the track towards the local train.

*The testimony moreover established [343 that whilst Collis was making the movement towards the local train, in one or the other of the modes above described, the express came down the west track, passed the station, running by the standing or stopping local train at the rate of between 40 and 45 miles an hour, and that by the train so moving Collis was struck and killed. The proof further tended to show that there was a clear view of the track going north from the station for a considerable distance, and that there was a whistling post for the station located 1,500 or 1,600 feet beyond the station. There was no proof, however, showing that a view of the rapidly moving express train was possible from under the archway of the station from which some of the proof tended to show Collis came on his way towards the local train.

There was conflict in the testimony as to whether the express train whistled at the whistling post. Some of the witnesses testified that the only signal given as the train approached the station was the danger signal which was sounded when the engine was only 50 or 60 feet from the point where Collis was killed; while others testified that a long blast for the station was sounded at the whistling post. There was no proof tending to show that any notice or warning, by sign or otherwise, was given, of the danger which might be incurred if a passenger attempted to cross the west track in order to board a train on the east track, nor was there any proof offered tending to show that any warning or notice was given, either by the ticket agent, gate watchman, or the employees of the local train, to passengers actually in waiting at the station, of the fact that the express train was due under its schedule, and, if on time, would pass the station without stopping, and almost simultaneously with the arrival of the local train.

It was proved that a book of rules issued by the company to its employees contained the following:

"No. 441. When one passenger train is standing at a station receiving or discharging passengers on double track no other train, either passenger or freight, will attempt to run past *until the passenger train at the station [344 has moved on or signal is given by the conductor of the standing train for them to come ahead, and the whistle must not be sounded while passing a passenger train on double track or sidings unless it is absolutely necessary."

While the engineer of the express train testified that coming down towards University station he saw the local train and did not know whether it was moving or had stopped entirely, or was going to stop or not, he also admitted that he knew of the existence of rule 441, but that "it was impossible to carry out the rule and make schedule time, and that the rule never was carried out."

At the close of the evidence for both parties the defendant requested a peremptory instruction in his favor, which the court gave, and by reason thereof the jury returned a verdict in favor of the defendant. From the judgment thereupon entered an appeal was taken to the court of appeals of the District of Columbia, where the judgment was affirmed. The case was then brought into this court by writ of error.

The peremptory instruction by the trial court and the affirmance of its action by the appellate court manifestly proceeded, not on the theory that, as a matter of law, there was no negligence on the part of the defendant, but that the proof of contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff was so conclusive as to leave no question for the consideration of the jury. Indeed, apart from any question which may have arisen from the proof as an entirety, and apart from the conflicting evidence as to the failure to give warning or proper signals, in the light of the ruling in Chicago, M. & St. P. Railway Co. v. Lowell, 151 U. S. 345]209 [38:131], *it is obvious there was not room reasonably to claim that it should have been determined, as matter of law, that the railroad company had not been negligent. In the Lowell Case, as in this, it was shown that a rule of the company, applicable where double tracks were operated, prohibited any train, either passenger or freight, from attempting to run past a passenger train standing at a station for the purpose of receiving or discharging passengers, until the passenger train at the station had moved on, or signal was given by the conductor of the standing train for the other train to come ahead. Speaking of such a rule, and after declaring that it could not be seriously contended that the defendant was free from fault in failing to stop its train, in compliance with its own rule, the court said (page 217 [38: 136]): "In view of the frequency of accidents occurring to passengers crossing one track at a station, after alighting from a train standing upon another track, the rule is doubtless a proper one, and if it had been observed on that evening, this accident would probably not have occurred."

The cogency of this language applies with equal force to the state of facts disclosed in this record, where the station in which was the waiting room was so situated, and the trains of the company so operated, that passengers obliged to board a train which was to arrive and depart on the east track could not do so without crossing the west track, over which a train bound in an opposite direction was momentarily to arrive. If the stopping of a train at a station to put off a passenger, as held in the Lowell Case, may, under certain circumstances, justify the passenger in presuming that it is safe for him to alight from the train away from a platform, and does not impose upon him in so doing the same degree of care and caution as would be imposed on him if he were not a passenger, it follows, necessarily, that the same rule would apply to one waiting at a station to take a train and who approaches the train he is to take when it arrives at the station.

The learned court below, in affirming the judgment of the trial court, principally rested its conclusion on the ruling in Elliott v. Chicago, Milwaukee, & St. Paul R. R. Co. 150 U. S. 245 [37: 1068], and *the authorities in [346 that case referred to. But there the question for determination was the negligence of one not a passenger.

The duty owing by a railroad company to a passenger, actually or constructively in its care, is of such a character that the rules of law regulating the conduct of a traveler upon the highway when about to cross and the trespasser who ventures upon the tracks of a railroad company are not a proper criterion by which to determine whether or not a passenger who sustains injury in going upon the tracks of the railroad was guilty of contributory negligence. A railroad company owes to one standing towards it in the relation of a passenger a different and higher degree of care from that which is due to mere trespassers or strangers, and it is conversely equally true that the passenger, under given conditions, has a right to rely upon the exercise by the road of care, and the question of whether or not he is negligent, under all circumstances, must be determined on due consideration of the obligations of both the company and the passenger. As said by the court of appeals of New York in Terry v. Jewett, 78 N. Y. 344:

"There is a difference between the care and caution demanded in crossing a railroad track on a highway and in crossing while at a depot of a railroad company to reach the cars. No absolute rule can be laid down to govern the passenger in the latter case under all circumstances. While a passenger has a right to pass from the depot to the train on which such passenger intends to travel, and the company should furnish reasonable and adequate protection against accident in the enjoyment of this privilege, the passenger is bound to exercise proper care, prudence, and caution in avoiding danger. The degree of care and caution must be governed in all cases by the extent of the peril to be encountered and the circumstances attending the exposure."

And in the case before the court it was held to be a question for the jury, under all the circumstances, whether the plaintiff was chargeable with contributory negligence.

The doctrine of the Terry Case was approved in Brassell v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 84 N. Y. 246, and is supported *by the fol-[347 lowing authorities: Atchison, T. & S. F. R. R. Co. v. Shean, 18 Colo. 368 [20 L. R. A. 729]; Philadelphia, W. & B. R. R. Co. v. Anderson, 72 Md. 529, 530 [8 L. R. A. 673]; Baltimore & Ohio R. R. Co. v. State, Use of Hauer, 60 Md. 463, 465; Pennsylvania Railroad Co. v. White, 88 Pa. 333, 334; Jewett v. Klein, 27 N J. Eq. 550; Wheelock v. Boston & A. R. R. Co. 105 Mass. 203.

To concede the rule and, in a given case, to take a passenger beyond its protection by hold ing that one who goes in proper time to a station for the purpose of taking a train over the road and has a ticket for travel thereon is not to be considered as a passenger until he has manifested by some outward act his intention to board a train and become a passenger, is to admit the rule on the one hand and on the other to deny it. It is also clear that to say that one who goes to a station to take a train must exercise the same circumspection and care as a traveler on the highway or a trespasser, unless by some implication the corporation has invited the person to deport himself as a passenger, and that such implication must be determined as a matter of law by the court and not of fact by the jury, is, in effect, under the form of a qualification to destroy the rule.

The situation of the tracks, the location of the station building and the waiting room, the coming of the local train and its stopping to receive passengers in a position which required the latter to cross a track in order to reach the train, involved necessarily a condition of things which, under one view of the testimony, constituted an implied invitation to the passenger to follow the only course which he could have followed in order to take the train, that is to cross the track to the waiting train. Whilst it is true, as was said in Terry v. Jewett, supra, that such implied invitation would not absolve a passenger from the duty to exercise care and caution in avoiding danger, nevertheless it certainly would justify him in assuming that, in holding out the invitation to board the train, the corporation had not so arranged its business as to expose him to the hazard of danger to life and limb unless he exercised the very highest degree of care and cau-348] tion. *The railroad under such circumstances, in giving the invitation, must necessarily be presumed to have taken into view the state of mind and of conduct which would be engendered by the invitation, and the passenger, on the other hand, would have a right to presume that in giving the invitation the railroad itself had arranged for the operation of its trains with proper care. The doctrine finds a very clear expression in a passage in the opinion in the Terry Case, already referred to, where it was said (p. 342):

"It may be assumed that a railroad corporation, in the exercise of ordinary care, so regulates the running of its trains that the road is free from interruption or obstruction where passenger trains stop at a station to receive and deliver passengers. Any other system would be dangerous to human life, and impose great risks upon those who might have occasion to travel on the railroad."

When a given state of facts is such that reasonable men may fairly differ upon the question as to whether there was negligence or not, the determination of the matter is for the jury. Grand Trunk Railway Co. v. Ives, 144 U. S. 408, 417 [36:485, 489]; Baltimore & Ohio Railway Co. v. Griffith, 159 U. S. 603, 611 [40:274, 278]; Texas & Pacific Railroad Co. v. Gentry, 163 U. S. 353, 368 [41:186, 193]. A like doctrine was thus expressed by the supreme court of Pennsylvania in Pennsylvania Railroad Co. v. White, 88 Pa. 327, 333, a case in many respects analogous to the present one:

"Negligence has been defined to be 'the absence of care according to the circumstances,' and is always a question for the jury when there is reasonable doubt as to the facts, or as to the inferences to be drawn from them. When the measure of duty is ordinary and reasonable care, and the degree of care varies according to circumstances, the question of negligence is necessarily for the jury."

We think the case presented by the record is not one where the facts inferable from the evidence were such that all reasonable men would, of necessity, draw the same conclusion from them, and the question of negligence was not, therefore, one of law for the court.

*It is therefore ordered that the judg- [349
ment be reversed, and the case remanded, with directions to grant a new trial, and for further proceedings in conformity to law.

Mr. Justice Brewer is of the opinion that the deceased was guilty of contributory negligence.

[Nos. 23, 24.]

Argued October 13, 14, 1897. Decided November 29, 1897.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of Minnesota to review a judgment of that court in each of the above-entitled actions, affirming the judgment of the District Court of said State in favor of the defendants, dismissing the two actions which were tried together, one brought by the St. Anthony Falls Water Power Company, plaintiff, and the other by the Minneapolis Mill Company, plaintiff, against the Board of Water Commissioners of the City of St. Paul, for damages for injury from diverting water from the water power of each of the plaintiffs. Affirmed.

Statement by Mr. Justice Peckham:

These actions were brought in a district court of the state of Minnesota, by the respective plaintiffs in error against the defendant in error for the purpose of recovering damages for injury to their alleged rights as riparian owners and otherwise, at St. Anthony Falls on the Mississippi river, and also for a perpetual injunction enjoining the defendant in error from diverting the waters above so as to prevent them [350 from flowing *in their natural course in the Mississippi river and down to the water power of the plaintiffs in error respectively.

The plaintiff in error, the St. Anthony Falls Water Power Company, was incorporated by an act of the territory of Minnesota, approved on the 26th day of February, 1856. The first eight sections of the act relate to the incorporation of the company and to its internal affairs. The 9th section reads as follows:

"Sec. 9. The said corporators are hereby authorized for the purpose of the improvement of the water power above and below the Falls of St. Anthony, in the Mississippi river, to maintain the present dams and sluices, and construct and maintain dams, canals, and water sluices, erect mills, buildings, or other structures for the purpose of manufacturing in any of its branches, or improving any water power owned or possessed by said company, in such manner or to such extent as shall be authorized by the directors of said company, and may construct dams on the rapids above or below the Falls of St. Anthony, with side dams, sluices, and all other improvements in the Mississippi river, upon the property owned or to be owned by said corporators, which may be necessary for the full enjoyment of the powers herein granted: Provided, however, That said corporation shall give a free passage for all loose logs that are to be manufactured on Hennepin or Cataract islands, or between them on the falls through any dam or dams they may erect, on the west side of Nicollet or Hennepin islands, and the passage through the pond, above said dam shall, when needed, be 20 feet wide; Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to authorize said corporation to interfere with the rights of property of any other person or persons whatever."

The Minneapolis Mill Company was also incorporated by an act of the legislature of the territory of Minnesota, approved February 27, 1856, chap. 145, p. 236, the 9th, 11th, and 12th sections of which read as follows:

"Sec. 9. The said corporators are hereby authorized, for the purpose of the improvement of the water power above and *below the [351 Falls of St. Anthony in the Mississippi river, to maintain the present dams and sluices, and to construct dams, canals, and water sluices, erect mills, buildings, or other structures, for the purpose of manufacturing in any of its branches, or improving any water power owned or possessed by said company, in such manner and to such extent as shall be authorized by the directors of said company, and may construct dams on the rapids above or below the Falls of St. Anthony, with side dams, sluices, and all other improvements in the Mississippi river which may be necessary for the full employment of the powers therein granted."

"Sec. 11. This act shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage, and may be amended by any subsequent legislative assembly, in any manner not destroying or impairing the vested rights of said corporators: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to authorize said corporation to interfere with the rights or property of any other person or persons whatever."

"Sec. 12. Provided further, That nothing contained in the act entitled 'An Act to Incorporate the St. Anthony Falls Water Power Company' shall be so construed as to allow the said St. Anthony Falls Water Power Company to maintain or construct dams or sluices extending beyond the center of the channel of the Mississippi river from the western bank of Hennepin island, and said St. Anthony Falls Water Power Company are hereby restricted in the exercise of powers and privileges granted by the 9th section of said act to the space between the western bank of said island and the center of said river: Provided, The said dam shall always be provided with suitable slides and sluices, so as to admit the passage of logs and timber down the Mississippi river, and that any future legislature may amend or modify this act, or the act to which this section is amendatory: And provided further, That the Minneapolis Mill Company shall be restricted in its operations to the center of the main channel of the Mississippi river and to the property belonging to said company."

By the 2d section of the act of Congress, approved February 26, 1857 (11 Stat. at L. 166, chap. 60), authorizing the people *of the terri- [352 tory of Minnesota to form a state Constitution, etc., it was enacted: "That the said state of Minnesota shall have concurrent jurisdiction on the Mississippi and all other rivers and waters bordering on the said state of Minnesota, so far as the same shall form a common boundary to said state and any other state or states now or hereafter to be formed or bounded by the same; and said river and waters, and the navigable waters leading into the same, shall be common highways, and forever free, as well to the inhabitants of said state as to all other citizens of the United States, without any tax, duty, impost, or toll therefor."

Section 2, article 2, of the Constitution of Minnesota has the same provision for the jurisdiction of the state over the Mississippi and other rivers and waters bordering on the state as is provided for in § 2 of the above act of Congress.

The complaints in the two cases are substantially similar, the two companies owning on different sides of the Mississippi river at about the same point, and the complaint in the case of the Minneapolis Mill Company contained the following among other allegations: It alleged the incorporation of the plaintiff in error, under the acts above mentioned, and also the incorporation of the defendant pursuant to an act of the legislature of the state of Minnesota, approved February 10, 1881, which has been amended by various acts supplemental thereto.

Plaintiff further alleged that pursuant to the provisions of its charter it acquired large tracts of land bordering upon the Mississippi river, and on the southwesterly bank thereof, lying within the present limits of the city of Minneapolis and county of Hennepin, and that by reason of the fall in said river at that point, which amounts to some 70 feet in the course of 1,000 feet, there was created a natural water power of great extent and value; that the plaintiff, pursuant to the provisions of its charter and in accordance with the natural right inherent in the ownership of lands abutting upon the waters of said river, constructed dams and water sluices at great expense, for the purpose of making the water power available [353] *for manufacturing and other purposes to which the same was adapted, and by meeting those erected by the other company, and that by the erection of these dams on the opposite side of the river the plaintiff had made available the water power of the river to the extent of about 50 feet fall, leaving still unoccupied a further fall of about 20 feet; that in pursuance of its charter and in accordance with its rights as riparian owner, plaintiff in error had made contracts with different parties for the construction of mills and manufacturing establishments in convenient proximity to its water power, and for a valuable consideration had furnished and was furnishing water power to these different establishments which have use for the power, and that the same is of great value to the plaintiff; that it has reserved to itself large rents and income by leasing to other parties the right to use certain portions of the water.

And the plaintiff alleged that by reason of its ownership of the land bordering upon the river it had acquired and still owned all the riparian rights incident to the ownership of lands bordering upon the Mississippi river, which was stated to be a natural watercourse, in which there naturally flowed a large quantity of water derived from the river and also from numerous tributaries above, and that by reason of its riparian rights the plaintiff was entitled to have and require the natural flow of the waters of the river in the channels, both east and west in said river, adjacent to the lands at said falls without diminution or diversion of such natural flow by any person whatever.

It was further averred that one of the tributaries of the Mississippi river is a natural watercourse and stream known as Rice creek, which drains waters from a large extent of territory within the state, and which are gathered together and have a natural flow or outlet through said creek into the Mississippi river, 8 or 10 miles above the water power of the plaintiff; that Rice creek, in its natural course, flows through a small lake in the county of Anoka, designated as Baldwin lake, and from thence to its connection with the Mississippi river; that the amount of water flowing in that *creek and lake varies [354] with the different seasons of the year, the ordinary amount being about 30 million gallons per day.

It is then further alleged that the defendant acting under the provisions of the act of the legislature above mentioned, approved February 10, 1881, authorizing the city of St. Paul to purchase the franchises and property of the St. Paul Water Company and creating a board of water commissioners, had acquired title to a portion of the land bordering upon Baldwin lake, and had erected thereon pumping works and machinery for the diversion of the waters of the lake into a certain other lake situated in the county of Ramsey, which other lake had a natural outlet through streams flowing into the Mississippi river below the water power of plaintiff, and that the defendant had for the greater part of the time during the two years before the commencement of this action, by means of its works on Baldwin lake, withdrawn from that lake a quantity of water to the amount of 10,000,000 gallons per day, and that the quantity thus pumped from that lake was diverted by the defendant into a lake known as Pleasant lake, and from thence it had been drawn by the waterworks of the defendant into the city of St. Paul, and distributed over that city and used for domestic purposes and for furnishing water for steam engines and other manufacturing purposes, and for the propulsion of elevators and other machinery, and that the waters thus used had been entirely diverted from Rice creek and from that part of the Mississippi river above the water power of plaintiff, and no part thereof had been returned to the Mississippi river above the water power of plaintiff so as in any way or manner to be made useful to plaintiff.

The plaintiff further alleged that the defendant, although assuming to act in accordance with its charter, had not acquired the right to divert the waters naturally flowing in Rice creek, and through Baldwin lake from their natural course, nor had defendant made compensation to plaintiff and other parties beneficially interested in the use of said water, nor had defendant made any provision for computing the amount of compensation due

355]plaintiff *for damages caused by diverting and withdrawing the waters of the river from their natural course; that by reason of this diversion of water the income and profits arising from the maintenance of the water power were diminishing (to an amount stated in the complaint), and that the damages sustained by the plaintiff by reason of the diversion amounted to the sum of $1,500.

Judgment was demanded that the plaintiff should recover its damages already sustained in the sum of $1,500, and that the defendant should be perpetually enjoined from interfering with or diverting the waters which would otherwise naturally flow into lake Baldwin, so as to prevent them from flowing in the natural course to said Rice creek and Mississippi river to the water power of said plaintiff.

The answer of the defendant averred that the defendant existed as a corporation and executive department of the city of St. Paul, of the state of Minnesota, under and by virtue of the acts referred to in the complaint, as approved February 10, 1881, and amended January 25, 1883, and March 4, 1885, and that the defendant, under these acts and under the charter of the city of St. Paul, exercised all of the authority of the city of St. Paul with respect to acquiring lands and franchises for and the construction of water works for the purpose of supplying the city of St. Paul and its inhabitants with pure water for all public purposes.

The defendant also averred that by virtue of the authority granted by the acts of the legislature, above referred to, and by the charter granted to the city of St. Paul, the defendant had secured the right of way from the city of St. Paul to said Baldwin lake, and by the use of mains, ditches, and pumps it had drawn and was drawing from that lake and was bringing to the city of St. Paul water for the use of the city and its inhabitants, and that the defendant and the city of St. Paul are the owners in fee simple of a large tract of real estate bordering on Lake Baldwin, upon which lands it had erected buildings and placed therein pumps, etc., for the purpose of drawing water from that lake for the purpose of supplying the city of St. Paul with water.

356] *Other averments were made not material to be here mentioned.

The defendant claimed a right to take the water from Baldwin lake and conduct the same to the city of St. Paul for the use of said city and its inhabitants (without making any compensation or payment therefor to the plaintiff), by reason of the legislative authority above mentioned.

A similar answer was put in by the defendant in the case of the St. Anthony Falls Water Power Company.

Replies to these answers were put in by the plaintiffs in error taking issue on the matters of fact therein alleged.

Upon these pleadings the two actions came on for trial in the state court and were tried together. Evidence was given upon the part of the plaintiffs tending to support the allegations of the complaints, and after the plaintiffs had rested, the defendant moved that the actions should be dismissed on the ground that there was no liability on the part of the defendant to either of the plaintiffs, because the Mississippi river was a navigable river, its beds and its waters being owned by the state of Minnesota, and that the board of water commissioners, defendant herein, was a part of the city government of the city of St. Paul authorized by the legislature to draw water from any of the lakes of the state for the purpose of supplying water to the city of St. Paul; that the defendant acted as agent of the state and in the name of the state, supplying the citizens of the state with water owned by the state, which the state had a right to use for that purpose, and that such right was paramount to the rights of any riparian owners; also on the ground that nothing but a reasonable use had been shown by the defendant as riparian owner of land on lake Baldwin; also that plaintiff's dams are a purprestre, and that plaintiffs can have no right to the use of water obtained in that way; also that their riparian rights do not extend to the use of water on land not owned by them, or, as against the defendant, to power obtained which requires the flowage of land other than their own.

The motion to dismiss was granted in each case, to which the plaintiff in each case duly excepted.

*A motion for a new trial was made be-[357 fore the trial court upon a case and exceptions, and the motion, after hearing counsel, was denied. The plaintiffs then appealed to the supreme court of the state from the order of the district court denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial and from the whole thereof. The supreme court affirmed the order and directed that the defendant should have judgment accordingly. Upon the affirmance of the judgments by the supreme court the plaintiffs obtained a writ of error in each case from this court, and the records are now before us for review.

Messrs. Rome G. Brown and Charles S. Albert for plaintiffs in error.

Messrs. James E. Markham and Herman W. Phillips for defendant in error.

Mr. Justice Peckham delivered the opinion of the court:

It is claimed upon the part of the plaintiffs in error that by the decision of the court below they have been deprived of their property without due process of law. They urge that they have certain rights as riparian owners of land near St. Anthony Falls, bordering upon the Mississippi river, to the use of all the water as it would naturally flow past their land, and that this right is property; that its existence and extent are to be determined by the general law applicable to riparian owners in like situation, which right is not determined conclusively by a state court, and that being property it cannot be taken away or impaired either by other private owners or by the state, except that if the latter should require the use of any portion of the water for any public purpose it may only be taken or diverted upon due compensation being made. These rights, it is claimed, are protected by the Federal Constitution, and that as such claim was duly presented before the state tribunal, the question is now open for review by this court.

358] *If wrong in their above claim the plaintiffs in error then urge that if it be assumed that the state originally had the power to make a diversion of some portion of the water in the Mississippi river for the purpose of supplying the city of St. Paul with water, yet that through the action of the territorial legislature in 1856, in granting these plaintiffs in error their charters, with the powers and rights therein named, the territory gave and released to plaintiffs in error the right to use all of the water naturally flowing in the river past their lands for the purpose of power free from the right of any subsequent territorial or state legislature to divert the waters in the manner complained of herein without making compensation.

These charters are claimed by the plaintiffs in error to be contracts, the obligations of which no subsequent legislature could impair, and it is argued that the act of 1881 and the subsequent acts amendatory thereof, granting to the defendant in error a right to use water for the purposes therein named, do impair the obligations of these contracts, and therefore are absolutely void.

They also urge that, even if their riparian rights are to be governed by the general rules of law laid down by the highest court of Minnesota, it will be found that the former decisions of that court upon that subject have fixed in plaintiffs the property rights which they here claim, and that this court should not be bound by the last decision of the state court upon the question, as evidenced by the judgment under review, because it is wholly inconsistent and at war with all the prior decisions of the state court, and ought not to be followed.

These contentions on the part of the plaintiffs in error are now to be examined.

(1) In regard to the first proposition, we are of opinion that the property rights of the plaintiffs in error, as riparian owners, are to be measured by the rules and decisions of the state courts of Minnesota. This principle, we think, has been announced and adhered to by this court from its very early days, and no distinction has been made between the rights of the original states and those which were sub-

359] sequently admitted *to the Union under the provisions of the Federal Constitution. The provisions of the act of Congress already cited (act of February 26, 1857, 11 Stat. at L. 166, chap. 60, § 2), making the Mississippi river a common highway for the inhabitants of the state and all other citizens of the United States, do not impair the title and jurisdiction of the state over the navigable waters within her boundaries more than rights of that nature are limited with regard to the original states. This has been uniformly held, and is so stated in many of the cases hereinafter cited where similar language has been used in the acts admitting states into the Union.

Preliminarily, it may be said that the Mississippi river at the point in question is a navigable stream. In order to be navigable it is not necessary that it should be deep enough to admit the passage of boats at all portions of the stream. One witness for the plaintiffs in error said that in its natural state the river at this point was not navigable at ordinary stages of the water for ¼ mile below St. Anthony Falls, and in its natural state it was not navigable immediately above the falls, but that it was navigable in its natural state above Nicollet island. He also stated that when he said the Mississippi river was not navigable at these falls, he meant that it was not navigable for boats; that boats could not go up and down in its natural condition; that it was always used for logs with chutes that are artificially prepared. It was navigable below the rapids and navigable above the rapids, and that the dam made it so. It was navigable above the rapids for the purpose of running shallow boats and for floating logs. What is said hereafter in regard to the river is based upon the really unquestionable fact that it is a navigable river at all points referred to in these records.

In Martin v. Waddell, 41 U. S. 16 Pet. 367 [10: 997], it was held that, when the American Revolution was concluded, the people of each state became themselves sovereign, and in that character held the absolute right to all their navigable waters and the soils under them for their own common use, subject only to the rights since surrendered by the Constitution to the general government. The action was ejectment for 100 acres of land *covered [360 with water in Raritan bay in the township of Perth Amboy, in the state of New Jersey. The claim of the plaintiff was founded upon the charters of Charles II. to his brother, the Duke of York, in 1664 and 1674, for the purpose of enabling him to plant a colony on the continent of America, the land in controversy being within the boundaries of the charters and in the territory which now forms the state of New Jersey. Those letters patent, as construed by this court, conveyed to the Duke of York all the prerogatives and powers of government residing at the time of their execution in the King of Great Britain, and passed from the jurisdiction of Great Britain to the people of each state after the Revolution. Although the question in that case arose in regard to lands covered with water in Raritan bay, yet the principles upon which the case was decided have been stated to apply to the rights of the states in regard to all navigable waters within their jurisdiction.

In Pollard v. Hagan, 44 U. S. 3 How. 212 [11: 565], the question arose in regard to the rights of the state of Alabama in the shores of navigable waters and the soils under them within her limits. The 6th section of the act of Congress, passed on the 2d of March, 1819 (3 Stat. at L. 489, chap. 47), for the admission of the state of Alabama into the Union, provided: "That all navigable waters within the said state shall forever remain public highways, free to the citizens of said state and of the United States, without any tax, duty, impost, or toll therefor imposed by the said state." It was held that the government of the United States did not by reason of that enactment possess any more power over the navigable waters of Alabama than it possessed over the navigable waters of other states under the provisions of the Constitution, and that Alabama had as much power over those navigable waters as the original states possessed over the navigable waters within their respective limits. It was also held that the shores of navigable waters and the soils under them were not granted by the Constitution of the United States, but were reserved to the states respectively, and the new states had the same rights, sovereignty, and jurisdiction over the subject as the original states.

361 *In Goodtitle [Pollard] v. Kibbe, 50 U. S. 9 How. 471 [13: 220], the decision of this court in Pollard v. Hagan, supra, was referred to and affirmed, and it was said that, by the admission of the state of Alabama into the Union that state became invested with the sovereignty and dominion over the shores of the navigable rivers between high and low water mark, and that after such admission Congress could make no grant of land thus situated.

In Barney v. Keokuk, 94 U. S. 324 [24: 224], it was recognized as the law that the title and rights of riparian proprietors upon the banks of the Mississippi were to be settled by the states within which the lands were included. Mr. Justice Bradley, in stating the opinion of the court in that case, said (at page 338 [24: 228]): "And since this court, in the case of The Genesee Chief [The Genesee Chief v. Fitzhugh], 53 U. S. 12 How. 443 [13: 1058], has declared that the Great Lakes and other navigable waters of the country, above as well as below the flow of the tide, are, in the strictest sense, entitled to the denomination of navigable waters, and amenable to the admiralty jurisdiction, there seems to be no sound reason for adhering to the old rule as to the proprietorship of the beds and shores of such waters. It properly belongs to the states by their inherent sovereignty, and the United States has wisely abstained from extending (if it could extend) its survey and grants beyond the limits of high water. The cases in which this court has seemed to hold a contrary view depended, as most cases must depend, on the local laws of the states in which the lands were situated. In Iowa, as before stated, the more correct rule seems to have been adopted after a most elaborate investigation of the subject."

It was also said by the same learned justice in speaking of the English idea of navigable waters being necessarily tide waters: "It had the influence for two generations of excluding the admiralty jurisdiction from our great rivers and inland seas; and under the like influence it laid the foundation in many states of doctrines with regard to the ownership of the soil in navigable waters above tide water at variance with sound principles of public policy. Whether, as rules of property, it would now be safe to change these doctrines where they have been applied, as before remarked, is for the sev 362 eral states themselves *to determine. If they choose to resign to the riparian proprietor rights which properly belong to them in their sovereign capacity, it is not for others to raise objections. In our view of the subject the correct principles were laid down in Martin v. Waddell, 41 U. S. 16 Pet. 367 [10: 997]; Pollard's Lessee v. Hagan, 44 U. S. 3 How. 212 [11: 565], and Goodtitle [Pollard] v. Kibbe, 50 U. S. 9 How. 471 [13: 220]. These cases related to tide water, it is true; but they enunciate principles which are equally applicable to all navigable waters."

In St. Louis v. Myers, 113 U. S. 566 [23: 1131], this court held that the act of March 6, 1820 (3 Stat. at L. 545, chap. 22), admitting the state of Missouri into the Union, left the rights of riparian owners on the Mississippi river to be settled according to the principles of state law. Mr. Chief Justice Waite, in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "The act of Congress providing for the admission of Missouri into the Union (act of March 6, 1820, 3 Stat. at L. 545, chap. 22), and which declares that the Mississippi river shall be 'a common highway and forever free,' has been referred to in the argument here, but the rights of riparian owners are nowhere mentioned in that act. They are left to be settled according to the principles of state law."

In Packer v. Bird, 137 U. S. 661 [34: 819], it was held, that as the highest court of California had decided that the Sacramento river being navigable in fact, a title upon it extends no farther than to the edge of the stream, this court would accept that decision as expressing the law of the state. That case asserted the right of each state to determine the extent of the title and of the rights of the riparian owners in waters within the territory of the state. It was also stated that the Federal courts must construe grants of the general government without reference to the rules of construction adopted by the states for grants by them, but that whatever incidents or rights attach to the ownership of property conveyed by the United States bordering on navigable streams would be determined by the states in which it is situated, subject to the limitation that their rules do not impair the efficacy of the grant, or the use and enjoyment of the property by the grantee. It was further said that, "as an incident of such ownership the right of the riparian owner, where the waters are above the influence of *the tide, will be limited [363 according to the law of the state, either to low or high water mark, or will extend to the middle of the stream."

It does not impair the efficacy of the grant or the use and enjoyment of the property by the grantee to hold that riparian rights are to be decided by the state courts, inasmuch as the grant, if by the Federal government, has been held in the cases already cited not to include title over navigable waters within or bounded by the states.

In Hardin v. Jordan, 140 U. S. 371 [35: 428], it was held that grants by the United States of its public lands bounded on streams and other waters, made without reservation or restriction, are to be construed, as to their effect, according to the law of the state in which the lands lie, and that it depends upon the law of each state to what extent the prerogative of the state to lands under water shall extend. In the opinion, after stating that the title to the shore and lands under water is in the state and is regarded as incidental to its sovereignty, it is said: "Such title being in the state, the lands are subject to state regulation and control under the condition, however, of not interfering with the regulations which may be made by Congress with regard to public navigation and commerce. . . . Sometimes large areas

[of land] so reclaimed are occupied by cities, and are put to other public or private uses, state control and ownership therein being supreme, subject only to the paramount authority of Congress in making regulations of commerce, and in subjecting the lands to the necessities and uses of comm[illegible]." (Citing cases.) Continuing, the court said: "This right of the states to regulate and control the shores of tide waters and the land under them is the same as that which is exercised by the Crown in England. In this country the same rule has been extended to our great navigable lakes which are treated as inland seas; and also, in some of the states, to navigable rivers, as the Mississippi, the Missouri, the Ohio, and, in Pennsylvania, to all the permanent rivers of the state; but it depends on the law of each state to what waters and to what extent this prerogative of the state over the lands under water shall be exercised."

364] *Mr. Justice Brewer, in his dissenting opinion in the above-cited case, which was concurred in by Mr. Justice Gray and Mr. Justice Brown, agreed "that the question how far the title of a riparian owner extends is one of local law. For a determination of that question the statutes of the state and the decisions of its highest court furnished the best and the final authority." And the dissent was based upon the theory that although the right of the state to determine this matter was not questioned in the prevailing opinion, there was, nevertheless, error committed by the majority of the court in refusing to follow a decision of the state court on the very question then under review, and in following instead thereof previous decisions of the state court inconsistent therewith.

In St. Louis v. Rutz, 138 U. S. 226 [34: 941], cited in the dissenting opinion above referred to, it was said by Mr. Justice Blatchford, in delivering the opinion of the court: "The question as to whether the fee of the plaintiff, as a riparian proprietor on the Mississippi river, extends to the middle thread of the stream, or only to the water's edge, is a question in regard to a rule of property which is governed by the local law of Illinois."

In Kaukauna Water Power Company v. Green Bay & M. Canal Company, 142 U. S. 254 [35: 1004], Mr. Justice Brown, in delivering the opinion of the court, said at page 271 [35: 1010]: "It is the settled law of Wisconsin, announced in repeated decisions of its supreme court, that the ownership of riparian proprietors extends to the center or thread of the stream, subject, if such stream be navigable, to the right of the public to its use as a public highway for the passage of vessels. (Citing cases.) In City of Janesville v. Carpenter, 77 Wis. 288, 300 [8 L. R. A. 808], it is said of the riparian owner: 'He may construct docks, landing places, piers, and wharves out to navigable waters if the river is navigable in fact, but if it is not so navigable he may construct anything he pleases to the thread of the stream, unless it injures some other riparian proprietor or those having the superior right to use the waters for hydraulic purposes. . . . Subject to these restrictions, he has the right to use his land under water the same as above wa-

365] ter. *It is his private property under the protection of the Constitution, and it cannot be taken, or its value lessened or impaired, even for public use, "without compensation," or "without due process of law," and it cannot be taken at all for anyone's private use.' With respect to such rights we have held that the law of the state as declared by its supreme court is controlling as a rule of property."

In Shively v. Bowlby, 152 U. S. 1 [38: 331], it was again said that the new states admitted into the Union since the adoption of the Constitution have the same rights as the original states in the tidewaters and in the lands under them within their respective jurisdictions. It was also remarked that, upon the question how far the title of the owner of land extends, bounding upon a river actually navigable, but above the ebb and flow of the tide, there is a diversity in the laws of the different states; and that the title and rights of riparian or littoral proprietors in the soil below high-water mark are governed by the laws of the several states, subject to the rights granted to the United States by the Constitution.

The suit was in the nature of a bill in equity brought to quiet title to lands below high water mark in the city of Astoria, the question involving the rights in navigable waters as between the state and others. The opinion at page 57 [38: 352] states as follows: "By the law of the state of Oregon, therefore, as enacted by its legislature and declared by its highest court, the title in the lands in controversy is in the defendants in error; and, upon the principles recognized and affirmed by a uniform series of recent decisions of this court, above referred to, the law of Oregon governs the case." The opinion refers to all the cases which we have above cited and many others, upon the various questions which are discussed in the case, and recognizes the rule that it belongs to the states to decide as to the character and extent of the riparian rights of owners upon navigable waters within such states.

It is true that in these various cases the exact point in controversy in this case in regard to the rights of the state as against riparian owners has not arisen. The dispute has generally been as to the extent and character of the title as between *the United States or the [366 state and the riparian owner to lands under water, and as to the right of the riparian owner to build out from the shore piers or wharves so as to reach the navigable portion of the stream; but the principles laid down in all of these cases necessarily include the right of the state courts to decide, as a matter of local law, the point now under discussion, subject to the acknowledged jurisdiction of the United States under the Constitution in regard to commerce and the navigation of the waters of rivers. The jurisdiction of the state over this question of riparian ownership has been always, and from the foundation of the government, recognized and admitted by this court. The extent of the plaintiff's riparian right of property was therefore the subject of adjudication by the state court, and the rule has been definitely stated by that court in its judgment which is now under review.

(2) It is claimed, however, by the plaintiffs in error that this judgment is the only case in the state where the ruling made therein has been adopted, and that this particular judgment is at war with and opposed to every other ruling upon the subject heretofore made by the supreme court of that state; and they contend that upon the authority of Hardin v. Jordan, supra, this court should disregard the judgment of the state court in this case and follow the previous decisions of that court on this subject. As to the case of Hardin v. Jordan, it may be said that it went as far as this court ought to go in refusing to follow the latest decision of the highest court of a state in regard to a matter upon which the judgment of that court is regarded as conclusive. It will be observed, however, that the decision in Hardin v. Jordan, in refusing to follow the ruling of the supreme court of Illinois, in Trustees of Schools v. Schroll, 120 Ill. 509 [60 Am. Rep. 575], was placed upon the asserted fact that such ruling of the supreme court of Illinois was not necessary to the decision of the case, and that, being opposed to the entire course of the previous decisions of that state, it should be disregarded. It is not so here. The ruling of the state court was necessary to the decision of this case and stands as the latest, 367] if not the only, exposition *of the views of that court upon the question involved. We ought, therefore, to follow that case.

However, with regard to the decisions of the state court upon this subject, cited by counsel for the plaintiffs in error, we think there is not one of them which is inconsistent with the decision of that court in the cases now under review. The question did not arise in any of them upon the right of the state as against plaintiffs in error, or anyone in like situation, to divert a portion of the flow of the water in the Mississippi river to any public purpose so long as it did not interfere with the navigation of the river.

The cases of Schurmeier v. St. Paul & P. Railway Company, 10 Minn. 82 [88 Am. Dec. 59]; Brisbine v. St. Paul & S. C. Railroad Company, 23 Minn. 114; Morrill v. St. Anthony Falls Water Power Company, 26 Minn. 223 [37 Am. Rep. 399]; State of Minnesota v. Minneapolis Mill Company, 26 Minn. 229; Union Depot, Street R. & Transfer Co. v. Brunswick, 31 Minn. 297 [47 Am. Rep. 789]; Hanford v. St. Paul & D. R. Company, 43 Minn. 104; and St. Anthony Falls Water Power Company v. City of Minneapolis, 41 Minn. 270, are cited to sustain the contention of the plaintiffs in error.

An examination of these cases shows that the question did not arise and was not decided in any of them. Some of the cases relate to the question as to what was the proper boundary, high or low water mark, of lands mentioned therein, and in others the question arose as to the riparian right of owners of lands adjoining the Mississippi river to build piers or docks out to the navigable portion of the stream, or to fill up and build upon a portion of the river out to its navigable part; or it was a question of the right of a riparian proprietor to compensation from a railway company seeking to condemn for the purposes of its railway a certain portion of land owned by him between the center of a street and the center of the channel of the river. In none of the cases was there involved the right of the state to divert for public purposes a portion of the flow of a river, while not in the slightest degree or in any way affecting the navigability of the stream.

In Union Depot, Street R. & Transfer Co. v. Brunswick and in Brisbine v. St. Paul & S. C. R. Company, supra, substantially the same questions arose, and in the latter case, in [368 speaking of some of the riparian rights of an owner upon the banks of a navigable stream, the court said:

"What these rights are, especially in regard to land acquired originally from the United States, and bordering, as this does, upon the Mississippi river, we regard as fully and correctly settled by the Federal Supreme Court. Dutton v. Strong, 66 U. S. 1 Black, 23 [17: 29]; St. Paul & P. Railroad Company v. Schurmeier, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 272 [19: 74]; Yates v. Milwaukee, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 497 [19: 984]. According to the doctrine of these decisions, the plaintiff possessed the right to enjoy free communication between his abutting premises and the navigable channel of the river, to build and maintain, for his own and the public use, suitable landing places, wharves, and piers, on and in front of his land, and to extend the same therefrom into the river to the point of navigability, even though beyond low-water mark, and to this extent exclusively to occupy, for such and like purposes, the bed of the stream, subordinate and subject only to the navigable rights of the public, and such needful rules and regulations for their protection as may be prescribed by competent legislative authority. The rights which thus belonged to him, as riparian owner of the abutting premises, were valuable property rights, of which he could not be devested without consent, except by due process of law, and, if for public purposes, upon just compensation. Yates v. Milwaukee, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 497 [19: 984].

In Union Depot, Street R. & Transfer Company v. Brunswick and others, 31 Minn. 297 [47 Am. Rep. 789], it was held to be the settled law of Minnesota that a riparian owner upon a navigable stream has the fee to low-water mark; and that in addition he owns as an incident to his ownership certain riparian rights, among which are the right to enjoy free communication between his abutting premises and the navigable channel of the stream, to build and maintain suitable piers, landings, or wharves on and in front of his land, and to extend the same therefrom into the stream to the point of navigability even beyond low-water mark, and to this extent exclusively to occupy for such and like purposes the bed of the stream, subordinate only to the paramount public right of navigation. *These riparian [369 rights the court held to be property, and that they were not to be taken by the state without paying just compensation therefor. The rights which were held subordinate only to the paramount public right of navigation were those mentioned by the court, and not a word was said as to the right of flowage, which was not involved and was not alluded to.

In Morrill v. St. Anthony Falls Water Power Company, supra, the supreme court of Minnesota held that the riparian owner of lands upon a navigable stream may use the water flowing past his land for any purpose, so long as he does not impede navigation, in the absence of any counterclaim by the state or the United States. It will be seen that this case does not refer to the right to receive the full amount of the natural flowage from above, but only to the right to use that which does flow, in the absence of any counterclaim by the state or the United States.

The same general statement of the rights of riparian owners is made in Hanford v. St. Paul & D. R. Company, supra. That case treats of the right of a riparian owner in the bed of the stream above low water mark as subject to the right of the public to use the same for the purposes of navigation, and adds that "restricted only by that paramount public right, the riparian owner enjoys valuable proprietary privileges, among which we shall consider particularly the right to the use of the land itself for private purposes. . . . Subject only to the limitation that he shall not interfere with the public right of navigation he has the unquestionable and exclusive right to construct and maintain suitable landings, piers, and wharves into the water and up to the point of navigability, for his own private use and benefit. (Citing cases.) And it is obviously immaterial if the public interests be not prejudiced, whether the submerged land be covered with wharves of timber or stone, or be reclaimed from the water by filling in with earth so that it becomes dry land. The land may be so reclaimed." It is also said in the course of the opinion: "The limit to the private right is imposed by the public right, and the private right exists up to the point beyond which it would be inconsistent with the public right."

370] *All this was said in regard to the case then under discussion, which related to the right of a riparian proprietor to reclaim the submerged land to the point of navigability, and to alienate the same so that the alienee might have the rights of the riparian owner, although having no interest in the original riparian estate. The question here involved was neither decided nor considered.

In Schurmeier v. St. Paul & Pacific Railroad Company, 10 Minn. 82 [88 Am. Dec. 59], which was affirmed in 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 27 [19: 74], it was held that the grantee from the United States had his land bounded by the river, at least to low-water mark, and when after the grant was made to him he platted it into blocks as part of the town of St. Paul that he still retained in the land over which the streets and landing were laid the fee, subject only to the use of the public for the purposes designated, and that the railroad company, having no legal authority to use the streets or landing for railroad tracks, and such use being a special injury to the plaintiff, he was entitled to an injunction. In that case Mr. Chief Justice Wilson, in the state court, was of the opinion that the riparian proprietor went to the middle of the river; that that was the rule at common law, and, in his opinion, there was no reason to doubt that the common law prevailed in Minnesota as to that question; but while so holding, as his individual opinion, he said that other authorities regarded the boundary line of the riparian proprietor to be low-water mark, and even on that assumption the place in dispute was within the title of the riparian proprietor.

The state court subsequently decided that the title of a riparian owner on a navigable stream went only to low-water mark.

St. Anthony Falls Water Power Company v. City of Minneapolis, supra, does not decide the point contended for by the plaintiffs in error. It was a contest between private parties as to the effect of a certain deed in reserving rights to the grantor and as to the extent of the right of flowage contained in the deed. The question here under discussion was not even remotely affected.

*We have looked in vain among all the [371 cases in the state court, cited by counsel for the plaintiffs in error, for any decision upon this question. Whatever may be the rights of the plaintiffs in error under their charters, or as the riparian owners of land, to build and maintain their dams to the center of the stream, there is no decision cited which holds that they are entitled to the use of all the water which would naturally flow past their lands and over their dams so constructed, nor has the state court decided that the only right of the state, to which this alleged right of the plaintiffs in error is subject or subordinate in any way, is limited to the right of the state to control or use the bed of the stream and the waters therein for purposes of navigation only. That limitation has never been placed upon the state with reference to the point here in question. The state supreme court in deciding this particular case was not therefore announcing a rule which was at all inconsistent with or opposed to any of its former decisions; and as the extent of the riparian rights in this case was a subject committed to the jurisdiction of the state of Minnesota, we are bound, so far as this question is concerned, to follow the decision of the highest court of that state, as announced in this case.

(3) If wrong in their above contentions, the plaintiffs in error then assert that their charters, granted in 1856, and set forth so far as material in the foregoing statement of facts, gave and guaranteed to them the right to use and develop the water power of St. Anthony Falls, and authorized them to build such structures in and upon the river as were necessary to develop that power, and that when these provisions of their charters were accepted and acted upon, they became contract obligations between the state of Minnesota and the plaintiffs, and that the statute above mentioned, authorizing the defendant to divert some portion of the natural flow of the water without compensation to the plaintiffs, was in violation of the Federal Constitution as impairing the obligation of the contracts contained in the charters referred to.

We think this contention cannot be maintained. We are of opinion that the true construction of these territorial *charters does not [372 give such contract rights as are claimed by the plaintiffs in error. They were grants of power to the respective companies under which they were licensed to build their dams out into the river for the purpose of utilizing the power and of using the water that flowed down the river. These grants were in legal effect subject at all times to the paramount right of the state as trustee for the public to divert a portion of the waters for public uses, and they were also subject to the rights in regard to navigation and commerce existing in the general government under the Constitution of the United States. See also, upon this subject, Watuppa Reservoir Co. v. Fall River, 147 Mass. 548 [1 L. R. A. 466]; City of Auburn v. Union Waterpower Co. [90 Me. 576, 38 L. R. A. 188], 38 Atl. 561. There was no contract by virtue of these charters that the companies should always and for all time be entitled to all the natural flow of the water in the river without regard to the right of the state as above mentioned. The claims made by the companies seem to us most extravagant. The state or any particular subdivision thereof acting under its authority would, if these claims were valid, be forever thereafter prevented from using any portion of the waters of the river for any public purpose unless compensation for such use were first made these plaintiffs. This construction of the meaning of the charters assumes the power of a territorial or state legislature to bind future legislatures in dealing with these public rights, and it prevents the latter from providing for the use of any portion of the waters for public purposes of the most important character without first making compensation to the plaintiffs for that use. If we should assume the validity of an act of the legislature of such a character (which, under the decision of this court in Illinois C. Railroad Co. v. State of Illinois, 146 U. S. 387 [36: 1018], is at least doubtful), it is clear that we ought not to adopt a construction leading to that result unless the legislative act be plain and beyond all doubt. We are of opinion that these particular charters of the plaintiffs are not to be thus construed. The sections of the acts which are material upon this point simply authorize the companies to [373] maintain their dams and sluices, *and permit them to construct and maintain other dams, etc., for the purpose of manufacturing, or for improving any water power owned or possessed by the companies, in such manner or to such extent as shall be authorized by the directors. But there is no language in the acts providing that the companies shall thereafter and always have the right to the use of all the natural flow of the water down the river. Nor is such right a necessary and legal consequence of the language used. They may have acquired by these acts the right to build dams, etc., and the right to use such water as in fact and from time to time should flow down to their dam, but there is nothing in the language of the charters showing or implying that it was the intention of the state to grant to these parties the rights now claimed by them. It is difficult to believe that a legislature would ever grant to individuals or companies rights of that nature, even if it be assumed it had the power. It was proper and in accordance with a wise public policy to grant a privilege to these companies to build dams, etc., as stated in the charters, and to permit them, by virtue of the dams and sluices, to use the water that in fact and from time to time might come down the river, but it cannot be supposed that the legislature meant by any grant of this kind to warrant that for all future time no part of the water that might otherwise naturally flow down the river should ever be used under the authority of the state for any public purpose, without compensating the plaintiffs for that diversion.

In Rundle and Others, Trustees, etc., v. Delaware & Raritan Canal Company, 55 U.S. 14 How. 80 [14: 335], this court held that by the law of Pennsylvania the Delaware river was a public navigable river held by its joint sovereigns (the states bordering thereon) in trust for the public; that riparian owners in that state had no title to the river, or any right to divert its waters, unless by license from the states; that such license was revocable and in subjection to the superior right of the state to divert the water for public improvements, either by the state directly, or by a corporation created for that purpose; and that the proviso to the provincial acts of Pennsylvania and New Jersey of 1771 did not operate as a grant of the usufruct of the waters of the river to Adam *Hoops and his assigns, but only as a li- [374] cense or toleration of his dam. It appeared in this case that the plaintiffs in error, being plaintiffs below, were the owners of certain mills in Pennsylvania opposite the city of Trenton in New Jersey; that the mills were supplied with water from the Delaware river by means of a dam extending from the Pennsylvania shore to an island lying near and parallel to it, and extending along the rapids to the head of tidewater. The plaintiffs claimed that by virtue of a proviso in the acts of the provincial legislatures of Pennsylvania and New Jersey their predecessors had become entitled to the free and uninterrupted enjoyment of the river Delaware for the use of their mills, and that, notwithstanding, the defendants had erected a dam in the river above plaintiff's mills, and had dug a canal and diverted the water to their great injury. A demurrer was interposed, upon which the court below gave judgment for the defendants, and this court was asked to review and reverse that judgment. It was held that the proviso was nothing more than a license to keep the dam up, which could at any time be revoked.

A careful consideration of the acts in question persuades us that they are not to be construed as plaintiffs claim, and that under them the plaintiffs took no contract rights which have been impaired in any degree by the subsequent acts under which defendants claim the rights set up in their respective answers.

These views lead us to the opinion that the judgments of the Supreme Court of Minnesota in these cases are right, and they are therefore affirmed.

375] UNITED STATES, Appt.,
v.
FRANK B. CROSTHWAITE.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 375–381.)

Compensation of special attorneys and counselors—certificate of attorney general.

1. Attorneys and counselors specially employed to render legal services for the United States cannot be compensated for such services, in the absence of the certificate of the Attorney General required by U. S. Rev. Stat. § 365.

2. One who receives a commission as special assistant to the district attorney for particular cases, or for a single term of the court, or for a limited time, is not an assistant district attorney within the meaning of U. S. Rev. Stat. § 365, and cannot recover compensation without a certificate of the attorney general.

Submitted November 1, 1897. Decided November 29, 1897.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Court of Claims in favor of Frank B. Crosthwaite against the United States for the value of services rendered by him as a special assistant to the attorney of the United States for the District of Idaho. Reversed, with directions to dismiss the action.

See same case below, 30 Ct. Cl. 300.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Louis A. Pradt, Assistant Attorney General, for appellant.

Messrs. John C. Chaney and John R. Garrison for appellee.

Mr. Justice Harlan delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from a judgment against the government in the court of claims for the sum of $300, which was found to be the value of certain services rendered by the appellee, as a special assistant to the attorney of the United States for the district of Idaho, at a called term of the circuit court.

The facts found by the court of claims, and upon which the appellee's claim for compensation depends, may be thus summarized:

On the 22d of June, 1892, the appellee, an examiner in the Department of Justice, received from the Attorney General an order directing him to discontinue the investigations then being made by him in Utah, and proceed at once 376] to Idaho for *the purpose of conferring with the author of a certain confidential communication which had been received by the Department of Justice. The order also directed him to examine the offices and accounts of the United States attorney, the United States marshal, the clerk of the United States court, and the United States commissioners, investigate the manner in which business was conducted by those officers, inform himself as to the character and qualifications of the various officials, and report to the department the results of his examination.

While thus engaged in Idaho the plaintiff received by telegraph, August 9, 1892, an order from the acting Attorney General of the United States, directing him to "report to and assist the United States attorney at a special term to be called by Judge Beatty at Coeur d'Alene City, Idaho."

On the 13th of August, 1892, he was appointed by the acting Attorney General "a special assistant to the attorney of the United States for the district of Idaho, to aid him in the preparation and prosecution of all criminal business properly coming before the court during its special term, ordered at Coeur d'Alene for August 8, 1892." The order of appointment stated: "Your compensation will be determined by the Attorney General upon completion of your service. Execute the customary oath of office and forward the same to this department without delay."

It should be stated that on the 14th day of August, 1892, while at Boisé City, and after his above appointment had been made, but before receiving notice thereof, the appellee mailed to the Attorney General an official communication in relation to the criminal proceedings then being instituted in Idaho against rioters and conspirators, in which he said: "I will proceed to Wallace to morrow for the purpose of preparing the cases for trial, and to select the necessary witnesses, in order that none may be subpœnaed unnecessarily. The marshal has been instructed to provide a sufficient guard for the term to be held, and everything appears to be moving along smoothly. In order that no question may be raised by the defense as to my status, and that I may be able to appear before the grand jury, I beg to suggest the advisability of my appointment as *a special assistant to the United [377 States attorney, without compensation, for these cases."

The plaintiff took the required oath of office and performed the duties assigned to him. He appeared on behalf of the United States before the United States Commissioner at Wallace, Idaho, for the purpose of having him "discharge" a large number of rioters who had been held to appear before that officer, examined witnesses before the grand jury, rendered daily service at the trial of the cases, "and generally rendered the professional assistance of an assistant district attorney from the 23d of August, 1892, to the 28th of September, 1892." He performed also his duties as examiner of the Department of Justice.

At the time of rendering service as special assistant to the district attorney he was receiving in his capacity as an examiner in the Department of Justice a salary of $2,500 per annum. He was also reimbursed for his traveling expenses during the time he acted as special assistant to the district attorney.

Upon the conclusion of his services as above stated, the appellee, although he had suggested that his appointment should be without compensation, sent to the Attorney General a statement of his services as special assistant to the district attorney, saying: "I send this statement to you, considering that it is necessary, if it shall be determined that I shall be compensated for the services performed as ass't U. S. att'y. I have left the amount to be inserted at the department in accordance with your action thereon." But the Attorney General expressed his surprise that the appellee should claim special compensation and refused to fix any compensation for his services, saying, in a communication to the plaintiff: "As an examiner of this department you receive $2,500 a year and expenses, and what you have been doing is clearly within the line of your duty in the premises."

The question as to the employment of special counsel on behalf of the United States has frequently been the subject of legislation by Congress.

By the 2d section of the act of August 2, 1861, 378]*entitled "An Act Concerning the Attorney General and the Attorneys and Marshals of the Several Districts" (12 Stat. at L. 285, chap. 37), it was provided "that the Attorney General be, and he is hereby empowered, whenever in his opinion the public interest may require it, to employ and retain (in the name of the United States) such attorneys and counselors at law as he may think necessary to assist the district attorneys in the discharge of their duties, and shall stipulate with such assistant counsel the amount of compensation."

This section was repealed by the act of March 3, 1869, making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1870. 15 Stat at. L. 282, 294, chap. 121. But by the act of April 10, 1869, entitled "An Act Concerning the Attorney General," the above act of March 3, 1869, was itself repealed, so far as it repealed the 2d section of the act of August 2, 1861, and that section was declared to be in full force; and it was made the duty of the Attorney General to report "at the commencement of the next session of Congress, and to each succeeding session, the names of all the persons employed for the purposes aforesaid, and where and upon what business employed, with the compensation paid to each." 16 Stat. at L. 46, chap. 25.

Next came the act of June 22, 1870, establishing the Department of Justice (16 Stat. at L. 162, 164, chap. 150), the 16th and 17th sections of which were preserved and reproduced in the following sections of the Revised Statutes:

"Sec. 363. The Attorney General shall, whenever in his opinion the public interest requires it, employ and retain, in the name of the United States, such attorneys and counselors at law as he may think necessary to assist the district attorneys in the discharge of their duties, and shall stipulate with such assistant attorneys and counsel the amount of compensation, and shall have supervision of their conduct and proceedings.

"Sec. 364. Whenever the head of a department or bureau gives the Attorney General due notice that the interests of the United States require the service of counsel upon the examina-379]tion *of witnesses touching any claim, or upon the legal investigation of any claim, pending in such department or bureau, the Attorney General shall provide for such service.

"Sec. 365. No compensation shall hereafter be allowed to any person, besides the respective district attorneys and assistant district attorneys, for services as an attorney or counselor to the United States, or to any branch or department of the government thereof, except in cases specially authorized by law, and then only on the certificate of the Attorney General that such services were actually rendered, and that the same could not be performed by the Attorney General, or Solicitor General, or the officers of the Department of Justice, or by the district attorneys.

"Sec. 366. Every attorney or counselor who is specially retained under the authority of the Department of Justice to assist in the trial of any case in which the government is interested shall receive a commission from the head of such department, as a special assistant to the Attorney General, or to some one of the district attorneys, as the nature of the appointment may require; and shall take the oath required by law to be taken by the district attorneys, and shall be subject to all the liabilities imposed upon them by law."

The object of these statutory provisions is manifest. While giving the Attorney General full power to employ counsel for the United States to assist those upon whom regularly devolved the duty of representing the government in the courts without special compensation, Congress intended to restrict the exercise of that power to the extent indicated in § 365. It was left to that officer to determine whether the public interests required the employment of special counsel. But that the discretion given to him might not be abused, and that unnecessary expense might be avoided, it was declared (§ 365) that except in the cases of the respective district attorneys and assistant district attorneys no compensation should be allowed to any person as an attorney or counselor for the United States unless specially authorized by law, and then only on the certificate of the Attorney General that such services were actually rendered, and that the same could *not have been performed by the Attor- [380 ney General, or by the Solicitor General, or by the officers of the Department of Justice, or by the district attorneys. The giving of such a certificate was thus made a condition of the right of the court to give judgment, as upon contract, against the government for any amount whatever as compensation for legal services rendered in its behalf by counsel specially employed or retained by the Attorney General to assist those whose duty it is to represent the United States in its legal business. Attorneys and counselors specially employed to render legal services for the United States cannot, therefore, under existing legislation, be compensated for such services in the absence of the certificate of the Attorney General required by § 365 of the Revised Statutes. In accepting such employment they take the risk of that officer giving such a certificate as ought to be given. If he fails or refuses to give the required certificate, Congress alone can provide for compensation. The courts cannot disregard the express command of the statute forbidding compensation to be allowed for legal services rendered by special counsel when the claim therefor is not accompanied by the prescribed certificate of the Attorney General.

This construction of the statute necessarily requires a reversal, with direction to render judgment for the United States, unless it be held that the plaintiff, while acting under his commission as "a special assistant to the attorney of the United States" during a single term of the circuit court of the United States for the district of Idaho, and mainly for a particular class of cases, was an assistant district attorney within the meaning of the words in § 365, "besides the respective district attorneys and assistant district attorneys;" for, in the cases of the officers last named, no formal certificate is required from the Attorney General. But we cannot so interpret the statute. The assistant district attorneys referred to in that section are those who are regular assistant district attorneys, serving the government at fixed salaries, and employed, not for special cases or particular legal business, nor for a specified term of court, but generally and regularly for all the business of the government that may arise in 381]the courts *of the district in which they serve. This interpretation finds support in many appropriation acts. In the sundry civil appropriation act of October 2, 1888 (25 Stat. at L. 505, 545, chap. 1069), the distinction is made between "regular assistants to the United States district attorneys, who are appointed by the Attorney General at a fixed annual compensation," and "assistants to United States district attorneys in special cases." The distinction has been made in subsequent appropriation and deficiency acts. 25 Stat. at L. 565, 585, chap. 1210; 26 Stat. at L. 939, 977, chap. 411; 26 Stat. at L. 371, 409, chap. 837; Id. 504, 528, 548, chap. 1126; Id. 862, 892, chap. 510; Id. 948, 986, chap. 542; 27 Stat. at L. 282, 310, chap. 311; Id. 349, 386, chap. 380; Id. 572, 609, chap. 208; Id. 646, 661, 668, chap. 210; 28 Stat. at L. 58, 61, chap. 61; Id. 372, 416, chap. 301; Id. 910, 957, chap. 189; 29 Stat. at L. 17, 26, chap. 33; Id. 267, 297, 310, 313, chap. 373; Id. 412, 450, chap. 420.

We are of the opinion that the better construction of § 365 is that one who receives a commission as special assistant to the district attorney for particular cases, or for a single term of the court, or for a limited time, is not an assistant district attorney within the meaning of that section; and therefore the certificate of the Attorney General prescribed therein, which even that officer cannot dispense with, is a prerequisite to the allowance of compensation. Any other construction of the statute would defeat the object of its passage, which was to protect the treasury from the expense incident to the employment of special counsel, where the government did not have the assurance of the head of the Department of Justice in the form of a certificate, that the services to be rendered were actually rendered and could not be performed, either by himself or by the Solicitor General, or by some officer of that department, or by the proper district attorney. In this view it was error to have rendered judgment against the government.

The judgment is reversed, with directions to dismiss the action

Extortion by Chinese inspector—U. S. Rev. Stat. § 5481—indorsements on indictment—arrest of judgment on one count—joint trial—evidence—testimony of reputation—statement by prosecutor in the presence of jury.

1. Extortion by a Chinese inspector is not committed under the authority "of any revenue law," within the meaning of U. S. Rev. Stat. § 3169, or "of any internal revenue or custom law, or any revenue provision of any law of the United States," within the meaning of the act of February 8, 1875.
2. The offense of extortion under color of office, defined by U. S. Rev. Stat. § 5481, includes extortion by a Chinese inspector under color of his office.
3. Indorsements on the margin of an indictment, referring to certain statutes which do not support it, although they may have been erroneously supposed to do so by the district attorney who drew it, do not make the indictment invalid if it properly charges an offense under another statute.
4. The arrest of judgment on one count of an indictment is not subject to review on writ of error taken by the defendant.
5. Two indictments against the same person, in which the offenses charged are of the same kind and are provable by the same kind of evidence, may be consolidated and tried together, where it can be done without embarrassing the accused in making his defense, or working any prejudice to him.
6. Evidence which merely tends to show the possession at different times of money which was deposited in a bank to the credit of the accused or his wife is inadmissible on a trial for extortion in taking specified sums of money where the amounts do not correspond with the amounts shown to have been in his possession and there is no evidence of any connection between them.
7. Testimony that the reputation "in the custom-house" of a Chinese inspector was bad, when the witness states that he does not know his general reputation outside the custom house, is inadmissible.

On the trial of a Chinese inspector for extortion, in which it is claimed for him that his record for sending back Chinese women is unusually good, a statement by the prosecutor in the presence of the jury that no doubt he sent back every woman who did not pay him, if not withdrawn and an objection thereto is overruled, tends to

IN ERROR to the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of California to review a judgment convicting Richard S. Williams, an officer of the Department of the Treasury, of extortion in exacting moneys from Chinese immigrants for permission to land and remain within the United States and sentencing him to fine and imprisonment. Reversed in each case, with directions for a new trial.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. George D. Collins for plaintiff in error.

Mr. Jas. E. Boyd, Assistant Attorney General, for defendant in error.

By an indictment returned in the district court of the United States for the northern district of California, it was charged that the plaintiff, an officer of the Department of the Treasury, duly appointed and acting under the authority of the laws of the United States, and designated as Chinese inspector at the port of San Francisco, and by virtue of his office being authorized, directed, and required to aid and assist the collector of customs of that port in the enforcement of the various laws and regulations relating to the coming of Chinese persons and persons of Chinese descent from foreign ports to the United States, "did then and there, as such officer, wilfully, knowingly, corruptly, and feloniously, for the sake of gain and contrary to the duty of his said office and by color thereof, ask, demand, receive, extort, and take of one Wong Sam, a Chinese person, a certain sum of money, to wit, one hundred dollars, which said sum of money was not due to him, the said Richard S. Williams," and which he was not, "by virtue of his said office, entitled to ask, demand, receive, or take"—that is to say, that "on the thirty-first day of August, in the year of our Lord one thousand, eight hundred and ninety-five, there arrived at the port of San Francisco aforesaid from a foreign port or place, to wit, the port of Hong Kong, in the Empire of China, a male person of Chinese descent, to wit, one Wong Lin Choy who claimed to the collector of customs that he was entitled to land, be, and remain within the United States on the ground that he was a native born of said United States; that thereafter such proceedings were had and taken before said collector of customs in accordance with law that the said Wong Lin Choy was by said collector of customs adjudged to be entitled to and permitted to land at said port as a native born of said United States of Chinese descent, and to be and remain in the said United States; that thereafter, . . . on the eighteenth day of September, 1895, . . . the said Richard S. Williams corruptly and extorsively, for the sake of gain and contrary to the duty of his said office and under color there-384]of, *did extort, receive, and take of said Wong Sam, who was then and there interested in the application or claim of said Wong Lin Choy as aforesaid, a sum of money, to wit, the sum of one hundred dollars as aforesaid, the said Richard S. Williams, under color of his said office, having previously, to wit, on the thirty-first day of August, 1895, at said city and county, state and district, aforesaid, feloniously and corruptly obtained and exacted a promise from said Wong Sam for the payment thereof by him to the said Richard S. Williams, by then and there falsely and corruptly representing to the said Wong Sam that without the payment thereof to him, the said Richard S. Williams, the said Wong Lin Choy would not be permitted to land at said port, be, or remain within the United States, but would be returned to said foreign port from whence he came, against the peace and dignity of the United States of America," etc.

A second count—describing the official character and duties of Williams as in the first count—charged that he wilfully and corruptly and under color of his office did "take and receive of one Wong Sam, who was then and there interested in the claim of one Wong Lin Choy to be permitted to land at the port of San Francisco aforesaid, a sum of money, to wit, one hundred dollars as and for a fee, compensation, and reward to him, the said Richard S. Williams, for the services of him, the said Richard S. Williams, under color of his said office, in the matter of the application of said Wong Lin Choy, who then and there claimed to the collector of customs of said port to be entitled to land at said port of San Francisco from a foreign port, to wit, the port of Hong Kong, in the Empire of China, and to be and remain in the United States under the claim that he was a native born of the said United States, which said application was then and there pending and under investigation before said collector of customs as aforesaid, whereas in truth and in fact no fee, compensation, or reward was then or at any other time due or owing from the said Wong Sam or any other person to the said Richard S. Williams for such service or any services of him, the said Richard S. Williams, in connection with said matter or at all, nor was he, the *said [385 Richard S. Williams, entitled to the same by law, against the peace and dignity of the United States of America," etc.

A second indictment containing two counts was returned in the same court against the plaintiff in error, describing his official character and duties, and charging him in one count with having wilfully, knowingly, corruptly and feloniously, and in the second, with having wilfully and corruptly, under color of his office, taken from one Chan Ying, a Chinese person, the sum of $85, in consideration of his being permitted to come into and remain within the United States.

The record states that on the margin of each indictment was an indorsement in these words: "Sec. 3169, Rev. Stat. subs. 1 & 2, and sec. 23, act of Feb'y 8, 1875, vol. 1, 2d ed. Supp. Rev. Stat." This indorsement, it is contended, indicates the statutes under which the prosecutions were intended to be instituted.

A demurrer to each indictment having been overruled, the accused was duly arraigned in each case, and pleaded not guilty. The two cases were then, on motion of the government, consolidated and tried together. The result was a verdict of guilty in each case. Judgment on the verdicts having been asked, the accused interposed a motion in arrest of judgment on the second count of each indictment, and also a motion for a new trial in each case. The first motion was sustained, and the second one having been overruled, the defendant was sentenced in each case to pay a fine of $5,000, to be imprisoned for three years to date from September 22, 1896, and to be further imprisoned until the fine imposed on him was paid or until he should be otherwise discharged by due process of law.

The first question to be examined is whether these prosecutions are authorized by any existing statute of the United States. It was presumed by the learned judge who presided at the trial that the indictments were founded upon § 3169 of the Revised Statutes and § 23 of the act of February 8, 1875, entitled "An Act to Amend Existing Customs and Internal Revenue Laws, and for Other Purposes." 18 Stat. at L. 307, 312, chap. 36.

386] *Section 3169 of the Revised Statutes is part of chapter I of title 35, Internal Revenue, and was brought forward from the act of July 20, 1868, entitled "An Act Imposing Taxes on Distilled Spirits and Tobacco, and for Other Purposes." 15 Stat. at L. 125, 165, chap. 186, § 98. By that section, which is given in full in the margin,† it is declared that "every officer 387] or *agent appointed and acting under the authority of any revenue law of the United States, first, who is guilty of any extortion or wilful oppression under color of law; or, second, who knowingly demands other or greater sums than are authorized by law, or receives any fee, compensation, or reward, except as by law prescribed, for the performance of any duty. . . . shall be fined not less than $1,000 nor more than $5,000, and be imprisoned not less than six months nor more than three years. The court shall also render judgment against the said officer or agent for the amount of damages sustained in favor of the party injured, to be collected by execution. One half of the fine so imposed shall be for the use of the United States, and the other half for the use of the informer, who shall be ascertained by the judgment of the court."

Section 23 of the above act of February 8, 1875, provides: "All acts and parts of acts imposing fines, penalties, or other punishment for offenses committed by an internal revenue officer or other officer of the Department of the Treasury of the United States, or under any bureau thereof, shall be, and are hereby, applied to all persons whomsoever, employed, appointed, or acting under the authority of any internal revenue or customs law, or any revenue provision of any law of the United States, when such persons are designated or acting as officers or deputies, or persons having the custody or disposition of any public money."

We are of opinion that these prosecutions cannot be sustained under the above statutes. The words "extortion or wilful oppression under color of law," and the knowingly demanding "other or greater sums than are authorized by law," or the receiving "any fee, compensation, or reward, except as by law prescribed, for the performance of any duty"—illegal acts described in subdivisions one and two of § 3169 of the Revised Statutes—refer to offenses committed by officers or agents "appointed and acting under the authority of any revenue law of the United States." The accused, in his capacity of Chinese inspector, did not act under any law that could properly be regarded as a revenue law. He was appointed *pursuant to acts of Congress appropri- [388 ating money to be used by the Treasury Department "to prevent unlawful entry of Chinese into the United States, by the appointment of suitable officers to enforce the laws in relation thereto, and for expenses of returning to China all Chinese persons found to be unlawfully within the United States." 26 Stat. at L. 371, 387, chap. 837; Id. 948, 968, chap. 542; 27 Stat. at L. 572, 589, chap. 208; 28 Stat. at L. 41, chap. 37; Id. 372, 390, chap. 301; Id. 636, 637, chap. 43; Id. 843, 846, chap. 187; Id. 910, 932, chap. 189; 29 Stat. at L. 413, 431, chap. 420. The Chinese exclusion acts have no reference to the subject of revenue, but are designed to exclude persons of a particular race from the territory of the United States. Clearly, Chinese inspectors, proceeding under the acts providing for their appointment, have no connection with the revenue system of the government, although the execution of the acts referred to is committed to the Treasury Department.

Nor can the prosecutions be sustained under the 23d section of the act of February 8, 1875. That section does nothing more than subject persons employed, appointed, or acting under the authority "of any internal revenue or customs law, or any revenue provision of any law of the United States," to the same fines, penalties, or other punishment for offenses committed by an internal revenue officer or other officer of the Treasury, or under any bureau thereof. The words, "internal revenue or customs law," do not include the statutes providing for the exclusion of Chinese persons from this country.

But there is a statute under which, in our judgment, a Chinese inspector guilty of extortion under color of his office can be prosecuted and subjected to fine and imprisonment. It is § 5481 of the Revised Statutes, providing that "every officer of the United States who is guilty of extortion under color of his office shall be punished by a fine of not more than $500, or by imprisonment not more than one year, except those officers or agents of the [389] United States otherwise *differently and specially provided for in subsequent sections of this chapter."

It is said that these indictments were not returned under that statute, and that the above indorsement on the margin of each indictment shows that the district attorney of the United States proceeded under other statutes that did not cover the case of extortion committed by a Chinese inspector under color of his office. It is wholly immaterial what statute was in the mind of the district attorney when he drew the indictment, if the charges made are embraced by some statute in force. The indorsement on the margin of the indictment constitutes no part of the indictment and does not add to or weaken the legal force of its averments. We must look to the indictment itself, and if it properly charges an offense under the laws of the United States that is sufficient to sustain it, although the representative of the United States may have supposed that the offense charged was covered by a different statute.

That the first count of each indictment makes a case of extortion under color of office, within the meaning of § 5481, is too clear to admit of dispute. The court below, therefore, while erroneously adjudging that the prosecutions were embraced by § 3169 of the Revised Statutes and the above act of February 8, 1875, did not err in overruling the demurrer to the first count of the respective indictments. We say nothing as to the second count in either indictment, because judgment on that count was arrested, and that action of the court is not subject to review on this writ of error. United States v. Sanges, 144 U. S. 310 [36: 445].

It is proper also to observe that there was error in the judgment as to the fine and imprisonment imposed upon the accused. Section 5481 of the Revised Statutes provides that the fine should not exceed $500, nor the imprisonment more than one year. If this were the only error complained of, the result would not be an entire failure of the prosecutions for it would only be necessary for the court below to enter a new judgment, imposing such fine or imprisonment, or both, as the statute permitted.

*But other errors are assigned relating [390 to the conduct of the trial. They must be examined, because if any of them affect the substantial rights of the accused, a new trial must be the result in each case.

It is assigned for error that the district court consolidated the two cases, and tried them at the same time and by the same jury. This objection is without merit. By § 1024 of the Revised Statutes it is provided: "When there are several charges against any person for the same act or transaction, or for two or more acts or transactions connected together, or for two or more acts or transactions of the same class of crimes or offenses, which may be properly joined, instead of having several indictments the whole may be joined in one indictment in separate counts; and if two or more indictments are found in such cases, the court may order them to be consolidated." The accused having been charged with different acts or transactions "of the same class of crimes or offenses," it is scarcely necessary to say that the transactions referred to in the indictments, being of the same class of crimes, could properly, that is, consistently with the essential principles of criminal law, be joined in one indictment against a single defendant without embarrassing him or confounding him in his defense. Pointer v. United States, 151 U. S. 396, 400 [38: 208, 211]. The plaintiff in error cites McElroy v. United States, 164 U. S. 76 [41: 355], as sustaining his objection to the consolidation. This is a misapprehension. The inquiry in that case was "whether counts against five defendants can be coupled with a count against part of them or offenses charged to have been committed by all at one time can be joined with another and distinct offense committed by part of them at a different time." It was held that the statute did not authorize that to be done. The Chief Justice, speaking for the court, said: "It is clear that the statute does not authorize the consolidation of indictments in such a way that some of the defendants may be tried at the same time with other defendants charged with a crime different from that for which all are tried." Here, the indictments were against the same person, the offenses charged were of the same kind, were *provable by the same kind of evidence, [391 and could be tried together without embarrassing the accused in making his defense.

If the offenses could be joined in one indictment, it would follow, under the statute, that separate indictments could, in the discretion of the court, be consolidated and tried at the same time and before the same jury. Nothing in the record shows that the consolidation of these cases worked or could have worked any prejudice to the defendant.

At the trial below the government read in evidence, over the objections of the accused, his affidavit filed in a divorce suit brought against him by Isabella M. Williams in the supreme court of San Francisco. That affidavit, made June 1, 1896, was as follows: "I have read the affidavit of plaintiff in reply on her motion for alimony, etc., and in reply thereto I desire to say it is untrue that prior to the time I entered the employment of the United States government I was without means and had had no money for quite a time before, or that I had to borrow money to pay my living expenses. On the contrary, when I entered the employment of the United States government, on or about the 28th day of September, 1893, I was worth more money then than I am at the present time, being worth about $5,000, and since then having inherited some property; that the $3,000 referred to in said affidavit was not acquired by me during the time I was in the employment of the United States government, as set forth in said affidavit, but is a portion of the $5,000 heretofore referred to. The statement in said affidavit that I have in my possession or had in my possession, in addition to the said sum of $3,000 aforesaid, the sum of $5,000, instead of $4,000, is false and untrue; that, to my knowledge, plaintiff was not in the habit of carrying said sum of $5,000 in the bosom of her dress. On the contrary, there was on deposit in the Hibernia Savings & Loan Society in her name, belonging to me, the sum of about $4,000, which was a part of the $5,000 possessed by me at the time I entered the employment of the United States government. The $3,000 in bank referred to is a portion of said sum so deposited in the name of plaintiff [392] in the Hibernia *Savings & Loan Society. In answer to the statement contained on page 2 of said affidavit, to the effect that plaintiff paid for the piano therein referred to and the bill therefor was made out in her name, I simply desire to annex the bill for said piano to this affidavit, showing the bill to be made out in the name of P. S. Williams. The property at Nos. 420 and 422 Scott street, mentioned on page 2 of said affidavit, was acquired by my stepfather, Henry Monsferran, now deceased. He was a foreigner, unaccustomed to speaking the English language, and the details of the purchase were made by me, but the money that paid for said property was solely and exclusively the money of the said Henry Monsferran. The deed to the property was taken in his name. It is untrue that at the time plaintiff left our residence on the 29th day of April, 1896, she left said sum of $5,000 in greenbacks. On the contrary, as above stated, there was no such sum, and the money referred to by her as having been drawn from the Hibernia Savings & Loan Society is $3,000, so deposited in the savings bank. It is untrue, as stated in said affidavit, that I avoided the service of the summons and complaint in this action, or that by reason thereof plaintiff incurred an expenditure of $11.25."

It is stated in the bill of exceptions that, independently of that affidavit, there was no evidence whatever before the court relative to the matters therein referred to, except certain bank books offered and read in evidence over the objections of the accused.

The bill of exceptions states that at the trial the prosecution offered in evidence a book of the deposit of moneys in the San Francisco Savings Union, a banking corporation of the state of California, which book and deposits were in the name of the defendant; also a book of the deposit of moneys in the Hibernia Savings & Loan Society, a banking corporation of the state of California, which latter book and deposits were in the name of Isabella M. Williams. The deposits in the San Francisco Savings Union, as evidenced hy the hook first mentioned, were as follows: October 29, 1893, $350; November 18, 1895, $400; December 17, 1895, $550, making a total *of $1,300. [393] The deposits in the Hibernia Savings & Loan Society, as evidenced hy the bank book in the name of Mrs. Williams, were as follows: Septemher 10, 1895, $300; September 24, 1895, $150; October 8, 1895, $800; October 23, 1895, $700; Decemher 2, 1895, $1,000, making a total of $3,450.

It is stated in the bill of exceptions that these bank books and affidavit were the only evidence hefore the court relative to such deposits, and that there was no evidence indicating the existence of any privity or relation between the defendant and Mrs. Williams at the time the above deposits were made by her or at any other time, except as indicated in the above affidavit.

It may he also observed that when the affidavit and bank accounts were offered in evidence, no suggestion was made that the prosecution would at some stage of the trial show that the sums alleged to have heen received by the accused under color of his office were part of any sum referred to in the affidavit and bank books.

The defendant duly excepted to the action of the court in allowing the affidavit and bank books to be read in evidence.

The manner in which the trial court dealt with this evidence appears from the following extracts from its instructions to the jury:

"There has been some testimony in support of the allegations of these indictments respecting the pecuniary condition of the defendant, and also testimony as to the extent of his compensation by the government for services. This evidence was admitted in compliance with a well-known rule which establishes the relevance of evidence of this character where the charge is such as that alleged in these indictments. If the salary of the defendant, during the time alleged in the indictments and before then, was $4 or $5 per day, and if the testimony shows to your satisfaction that he has deposited in bank or there was deposited to his credit in hank in the neighborhood of $4,750 from September 10, to December 17, 1895, alleged in the indictments, then such testimony may be considered by you with a view of ascertaining how or by what means the defendant obtained that amount of *money [394] at a time when his compensation by the government, as is claimed by the prosecution, was not to exceed about $150 per month. Where did he get such large sums of money? From what source other than the source named in the indictments did he acquire this money? Has he furnished evidence explaining to your satisfaction the possession of these sums of money? These are all questions which you will consider, and if any explanation made by the defendant as to how he came hy this money seems incredible, irrational, and unsatisfactory you are at liberty to reject it and to act upon the other testimony in the case. If, after doing all this, you feel to a moral certainty and beyond a reasonable doubt that he took the money, as alleged in the indictments, then your verdict should be guilty. In reference to the testimony which has been introduced in the case showing the pecuniary condition of the defendant, that if testimony explaining how, when, and by what means the defendant acquired possession of the sums of money shown to have been deposited in the San Francisco Savings Union and Hibernia bank could have been offered by defendant, and he failed to produce such testimony, then such failure may very properly be taken into consideration by the jury in determining the defendant's guilt or innocence. Where probable proof is brought of a state of facts tending to criminate the accused, the absence of evidence tending to a contrary conclusion may be considered, although this attitude of the case alone would not be entitled to much weight, because the burden of proof lies on the prosecution to make out the whole case by sufficient evidence; but when proof of inculpating circumstances had been produced tending to support the charge, and it is apparent that the accused is so situated that he could offer evidence of all the facts and circumstances as they existed, and to show, if such was the truth, that the suspicious circumstances can be accounted for consistently with his innocence, and he fails to offer such proof, the natural conclusion is that the proof, if produced, instead of rebutting, would tend to sustain the charges. Therefore, if in this case the defendant could have produced testimony explaining his several deposits in the San Francisco Savings Union 395] and the *Hibernia bank during the months of September, October, November, and December, 1895, and has failed to produce such testimony, then you are at liberty to infer that any explanation in his power to make would have been, if made, adverse and prejudicial to the defense."

After referring to some authorities announcing the general rule that a party in omitting to produce evidence in elucidation of the subject-matter in dispute which is within his power, and which rests peculiarly within his own knowledge, frequently affords occasion for the presumption that such evidence, if adduced, would operate to his prejudice, and after referring to the affidavit made by Williams in the divorce suit, the court proceeded in its instructions: "It is the duty of the jury to ascertain from said affidavit and from the other testimony in the case what portions of the same are true. The jury is then at liberty to believe one part of it and to disbelieve the other part. Such affidavit was introduced upon the theory that it constituted an admission on the part of the defendant as to his ownership of certain funds referred to therein. The defense then insisted, as they had a right to, that the entire affidavit should be read. The whole of it is now before you, and it is for you to determine, from all of the circumstances of this case, the situation of the defendant, and all of the evidence that has been introduced, as to what portion of said affidavit, if any, is true. You are at liberty to believe or reject such portions of it as you think may be worthy of belief or disbelief. In this respect I call your attention to the deposits as they were made. . . . These deposits were made, as you will observe, at different times. In September he appears to have deposited the sum of $450; in October he deposited $1,650; in November he deposited $1,100, and in December, up to the 17th, he deposited $1,550, making a total, as I said, of $4,750; nine deposits in three months and seventeen days. Does the defendant's affidavit satisfactorily explain or account for the receipt of these sums of money?"

We are of opinion that the affidavit and the bank books were not admissible in evidence against the accused. There *was nothing [396 before the jury in respect of the matters referred to in the affidavit except the affidavit itself, and nothing relating to the deposits except that disclosed by the affidavit and the bank books. Taking the case to be as presented by the bill of exceptions, the utmost the evidence tended to show was that the accused had in his possession at different times certain sums that were deposited by him in bank to his credit or to the credit of his wife. It is to be observed that no sum so deposited corresponded in amount with the sums which he was charged with having extorted under color of his office as Chinese inspector. Upon the face of the transactions referred to there was no necessary connection between the deposits and the specific charges against the defendant. And yet the jury were in effect told that the failure of the accused to explain how he came by those sums, aggregating nearly $5,000, was a circumstance tending to show that if he had given that explanation it would have operated to his prejudice in meeting the particular charges against him, of extorting at one time $100, and at another $85, under color of his office. There was no such connection shown between the possession by the defendant of the sums specified in the affidavit and bank books, and the alleged extortion by him of two named sums from certain persons, under color of his office, as required him to explain how he acquired the moneys referred to in the affidavit and bank books. The manifest object and the necessary effect of this evidence were merely to give color to the present charges, and to cause the jury to believe that the accused had in his possession more money than a man in his condition could have obtained by honest methods, and, therefore, he must be guilty of extorting the two sums in question. The present case does not come within the rule of evidence referred to by the learned court. The jury may have been unable to say from the evidence where the defendant obtained the moneys deposited in bank and specified in the bank book, aggregating $4,750 between certain dates. But that did not justify the conclusion that he had, under color of his office as Chinese inspector, extorted $100 upon one occasion and $85 *upon another occasion. [397 The accused was entitled to stand upon the presumption of his innocence, and it cannot be said from anything in the present record that he was under any obligation arising from the rules of evidence to explain that which did not appear to have any necessary or natural connection with the offense imputed to him. In our judgment the court, under the circumstances disclosed, erred in not excluding the affidavit and bank books as evidence, as well as in what it said to the jury on that subject.

Another assignment of error relates to the admission, against the objection of the defendant, of certain evidence as to character. A witness called by the prosecution was permitted to testify that the defendant's reputation "in the custom house" was bad, although he had distinctly stated, upon preliminary examination, that he did not know the general reputation of the accused "outside of the custom house." This was error. Assuming (although the record is silent on the subject) that the accused introduced evidence of his general reputation for integrity, it is clear that evidence, on behalf of the prosecution, that among the limited number of people employed in a particular public building his character was bad, was inadmissible. The prosecution should have been restricted to such proof touching the character of the accused as indicated his general reputation in the community in which he resided, as distinguished from his reputation among a few persons in a particular building. The estimate placed upon his character by the community generally could not be shown by proof only as to the estimate placed upon him by persons in the custom-house.

Another assignment of error deserves to be noticed. One of the witnesses for the defense was the collector of customs for the port of San Francisco. He was asked to whom, upon his return from Washington, was assigned the investigation of female cases. The court having inquired as to the purpose of this testimony, the attorney for the accused said: "It has been sworn to by Mr. Tobin that Mr. Williams asked for certain cases to be assigned to him and show the result. We propose to show by Mr. Wise that on his re-398] turn from Washington *he assigned to Williams the investigation of Chinese female cases, and while Mr. Williams was acting in that behalf there were more females sent back to China than ever were sent back before or after." The representative of the government objected to this evidence as irrelevant, saying in open court, and presumably in the hearing of the jury, "No doubt, every Chinese woman who did not pay Williams was sent back." The attorney for the accused objected to the prosecutor making any such statement before the jury. The court overruled the objection, and the defendant excepted. The objection should have been sustained. The observation made by the prosecuting attorney was, under the circumstances, highly improper, and not having been withdrawn, and the objection to it being overruled by the court, it tended to prejudice the rights of the accused to a fair and impartial trial for the particular offenses charged.

For the several errors committed at the trial, to which we have referred, the judgment is reversed in each case, with directions to grant a new trial.

Mr. Justice Brewer did not hear the argument in this case, and did not participate in the decision.

Mr. Justice Brown concurred in the result.

ELIZABETH NOBLES, by Her Next Friend, W. W. Baughn, Plff. in Err.,

v.

STATE OF GEORGIA.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 398-409.)

Question of insanity of criminal—state construction of state statutes—finding of fact in opinion—trial of question of insanity of a convict—due process of law.

1. The words "after conviction," in § 4666a of Ga. Code 1882, providing for determination of the question of insanity, are not to be construed as limited to persons who have also been sentenced, by force of the preceding § 4666, on the subject, which prescribes an investigation after a convict has been sentenced.

2. A construction of state statutes by the court of last resort of the state will be followed by this court.

3. This court takes notice of a finding of fact in an opinion of the supreme court of Georgia on writ of error to that court.

4. A trial of the question of the insanity of a convict, suggested after verdict and sentence, is at common law in the discretion of the judge, without an absolute right on his part to have the issue tried before a court and jury.

5. The determination of the insanity of a person after his conviction and sentence, which by Ga. Code [1882], 4666, and Ga. Code [1895], 1047, 1049, is to be done by a jury summoned by the sheriff with the concurrence and assistance of the ordinary, is not insufficient to constitute due process of law on the ground that the investigation is not judicial in character, but the manner in which the questions shall be determined is purely a matter of legislative regulation.

Argued November 9, 10, 1897. Decided November 29, 1897.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of Georgia to review a judgment of that court affirming the judgment of the Superior Court of Twiggs County, Georgia, convicting Elizabeth Nobles of murder and sentencing her to death. Affirmed.

See same case below, 98 Ga. 73.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Marion W. Harris, W. C. Glenn, and D. W. Rountree for plaintiff in error.

Mr. J. M. Terrell for defendant in error.

NOTE.—Jurisdiction of United States Supreme Court; it is for state courts to construe their own statutes; supreme court will not review their decision except when specially authorized by statute, —see note to Commercial Bank v. Buckingham, 12: 169.

As to what is due process of law, see note to Pearson v. Yewdall, 24: 436.

As to examination and confinement of insane persons, see note to Chavannes v. Priestly (Iowa) 9 L. R. A. 193.

As to constitutional right to notice of lunacy proceedings, see note to Evans v. Johnson (W. Va.) 23 L. R. A. 737.

Mr. Justice White delivered the opinion of the court:

In July, 1895, Elizabeth Nobles was tried in the superior court of Twiggs county, Georgia, upon an indictment for murder, and and was found guilty and sentenced to death. The bill of exceptions in the record now before us recites that "the said sentence of death, having been regularly and legally suspended and superseded by the order of the court the case came on again to be heard before the court on the 23d day of June," the object of the hearing being, as stated, "for the purpose of passing sentence of death by the court upon the said Elizabeth Nobles in said stated case;" that is to say, in consequence of the order which had suspended the sentence of death previously imposed in July, 1895. On the date of the appearance for resentence, June 23, 1896, W. W. Baughn, the present plaintiff in error, appeared on behalf of the convict and presented a motion or petition. The paper recited that the said Elizabeth Nobles should not be sentenced—

"First, because, as petitioner avers, the said Elizabeth Nobles is now insane.

"Second, because, the said Elizabeth Nobles being now insane, it is contrary to the policy of the law and is illegal that the sentence of death should be imposed upon her by the court.

"And petitioner further says that under article 14 of the Amendments to the Constitution of the United States, it is provided as follows: 'Nor shall any state deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.'

"Petitioner says that due process of law means law in its regular course of administration through courts of justice, and that by the 14th Amendment above quoted, whilst the states have power to deal with crime within their borders, no state can deprive any person [400] of equal and impartial justice *under the law, and that law in its regular course of administration through courts of justice is due process, and, unless the same take place through courts of justice, the constitutional requirement above quoted is nullified.

"Petitioner therefore specially sets up and claims the right of due process of law through its regular administration through courts of justice, under and by virtue of the constitutional guaranty under the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States above quoted.

"Petitioner says that it is essential to due process of law within the meaning of the above requirement that a jury be impaneled on the issue now tendered by this petition, and that trial take place before a judge of the superior court of the state of Georgia, according to the due and regular form of proceedings in our courts. Whenever an issue of fact is made in a superior court in the state of Georgia the trial of the questions thereby raised is a function of the superior court of the county having jurisdiction; and that the trial of the question raised by this petition is a function of the superior court of Twiggs county, in which said court the said Mrs. Nobles was convicted of murder.

"Petitioner further says that the proceedings contemplated under § 4666 of the Code of Georgia are not due process of law for these reasons, to wit."

The grounds alleged were eight in number, and in substance charged that the method of inquiry provided by the Georgia statutes for ascertaining whether one who had been convicted of crime was insane at the time of the inquiry was not due process of law under the Constitution of the United States, because the investigation which the law authorized was not judicial in character. The detailed enumeration of why the remedy provided by the statute was asserted in the petition not to be judicial, as well as the prayer of the petition, are set out in the margin.†

*The court refused to grant the petition, [401] and resentenced the prisoner to the death penalty. Thereupon the petition was again presented, and, upon its being again refused, exceptions were noted. The case, on the exceptions reserved, as just stated, was taken to the supreme court of the state of Georgia, where the action of the lower court was affirmed, and to this judgment of the supreme court of the state of Georgia this writ of error is prosecuted. There is no question *raised that the statutes of [402] Georgia do not afford adequate means for trying by court and jury any question made as to the insanity of the accused at the time of the commission of a crime.

The statute law of Georgia directly applicable to and involved in this controversy is as follows:

Georgia Code (1882), 4666; Code (1895), 1047, 1049. Become insane after conviction. "If, after any convict shall have been sentenced to the punishment of death, he shall become insane, the sheriff of the county, with concurrence and assistance of the ordinary thereof, shall summon a jury of twelve men to inquire into such insanity; and if it be found, by the inquisition of such jury, that such convict is insane, the sheriff shall suspend the execution of the sentence directing the death of such convict, and make report of the said inquisition and suspension of execution to the presiding †"1st. Because the same does not take place in any court of this state.

"2d. Because no rules of evidence or method of procedure are prescribed in such inquisition, and no proper method for the drawing, summoning, and impaneling a jury, and for the subpœnaing and examination of witnesses is provided.

"3d. Because no judge or presiding officer is charged with the function of ruling in or out evidence which may be tendered on said issue.

"4th. Because no judge or presiding officer is provided in said proceeding whose duty it is to instruct the jury on the law involved in the questions raised, and to make rulings on evidence which may be tendered for or against the person said to be insane.

"5th. Because there is no method of moving for a new trial or of correcting any errors which may take place in said proceeding.

"6th. Because said proceeding is one not known to the common law in ascertaining the facts involved according to the settled principles of the law of the land.

"7th. Because the supreme court of the state of Georgia has held that the said proceeding is in no sense a judicial proceeding, but is a mere inquisition from which there is no appeal.

judge of the district, who shall cause the same to be entered on the minutes of the superior court of the county where the conviction was had. And, at any time thereafter, when it shall appear to the said presiding judge, either by inquisition or otherwise, that the said convict is of sound mind, the said judge shall issue a new warrant, directing the sheriff to do 403] execution *of the said sentence on said convict at such time and place as the said judge may appoint and direct in the said warrant, which the sheriff shall be bound to do accordingly. And the said judge shall cause the said new warrant, and other proceedings in the case, to be entered on the minutes of the said superior court."

The provisions of this section are a reproduction in the Code of prior legislation (Georgia Acts of 1855–56, p. 36; 1859, p. 50):

Georgia Code 1882, 4666(a); Code 1895, 1048. Lunatics, how disposed of. "When any person shall, after conviction of a capital crime, become insane, and shall be so declared in accordance with the provisions of § 4666 of the Code, it shall be the duty of the judge to certify the fact, and the said convict shall be received into the lunatic asylum, there to be safely and securely kept and treated as other adjudged insane persons."

The provisions of this section are a reproduction in the Code of an act passed in 1874, Georgia Acts of 1874, p. 30.

The above sections, as existing in the Georgia Code of 1882, were cited by the supreme court of Georgia as controlling, and the brief for the plaintiff in error also states this to be the case. We have given the corresponding sections in the Code of 1895, although such sections as reproduced in the latter Code are in three sections and are somewhat altered in phraseology, but not so as to be material to the issue before us.

In the argument at bar the contention was that these sections of the Georgia law afforded an opportunity to investigate the question of the insanity of a person convicted of crime only when the suggestion of insanity was made after conviction and sentence, and, therefore, that the statutes furnished no means of testing the question of insanity arising after conviction and before sentence, and this fact, it was asserted, amounted to a denial of due process of law under the 14th Amendment of the Constitution of the United States. The construction of the statutes upon which this proposition was predicated is as follows: Although the text of § 4666 (a), which provides for an investigation into the question *of insanity, when[404 "any person shall, after conviction of a capital crime, become insane," is conceded to be broad enough to cover all cases arising between conviction and sentence, yet, the words "after conviction" it is urged should be construed as applying only to insanity arising after conviction and sentence, because § 4666 provides only for an investigation "after the convict shall have been sentenced." That is to say, the construction contended for, instead of treating the two sections of the Code as in pari materia, and construing them together so as to give effect to both, restricts and limits the natural and obvious meaning of the later statute by incorporating into it the provisions of the earlier one. If the contention that the words "after sentence" in the earlier statute only apply to cases where insanity is suggested after sentence, and not to those where it is claimed to have arisen between conviction and sentence, then the provision in the subsequent section, extending the remedy to cases arising "after conviction," cured the omission, if any there was, in the first statute. Instead, then, of construing the earlier as controlling the later statute, the elementary rule of interpretation would require that the later be considered as amplifying and providing for the thing omitted in the prior statute. While these conclusions are obvious, we are nevertheless relieved from the necessity of so deciding, since the opinion of the supreme court of the state in the case before us expressly holds that "the provisions of the Code relating to inquisitions in such matters are sufficiently comprehensive to cover all cases where the alleged insanity begins at any time after the rendition of the verdict of guilty." We follow the interpretation given by the supreme court of the state of Georgia to the statutes of that state.

Indeed, the question which arises on the record does not require a consideration of what would be due process of law under the 14th Amendment where insanity was suggested between verdict and sentence, or even at the time of sentence. This results from the fact

"8th. Because no manner of review whatever is permissible from the findings of said inquisition.

"9th. Because the proceedings before said inquisition do not take place before a court in the due course of the administration of justice. And petitioner says that the inquisition provided for a denial by the state of such due process of law as is guaranteed by the Constitution of the United States, and petitioner especially claims the privilege and right, under the United States Constitution, to have due process of law for the ascertainment of the truth of the issue now here tendered to the court.

"Petitioner further says that by the settled principles of the common law the ascertainment of the fact of sanity or insanity at any stage of the proceedings in the course of a legal investigation was a function of the trial court; that is, of the court having jurisdiction of the crime itself and of the criminal, whether before or after arraignment, before or after conviction, or after conviction and before execution, or before or after judgment, and that the settled and orderly course of procedure was the summoning of a jury and a trial of this issue under the forms of law, by introduction of evidence under the rulings of the judge of the said court, and whose duty it was to instruct the jury upon the law of the issues involved and to aid them in making a verdict. And petitioner says that each and all and every one of these proceedings named, and also the right to the court's process for the compelling the attendance of the witnesses to testify upon said issue, as well as such other proceedings and process and rights as are usually incident to trials before the superior courts of state, are essential to due process of law within the meaning of the Constitution of the United States, and petitioner now here claims the right to such proceedings under and by virtue of the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

"Wherefore, petitioner, now in behalf of the said Elizabeth Nobles, whom petitioner avers is mentally incapacitated because of her present insanity to take any legal steps in her own behalf, the premises considered, prays the court for a trial by jury of the said question of insanity; that the court cause jurors to be regularly summoned and impaneled to try said issue, and that such other proceedings be had in that regard as are usually incident to trials in said court; and that petitioner have the right to the court's process to compel the attendance of witnesses and to such other processes as may be right and necessary, and that said sentence be postponed and suspended till the final adjudication of the question raised by this petition."

that the suggestion of insanity relied on was made, not at the time of sentence, but long after the sentence had been imposed. As stated, 405] the bill *of exceptions recites that the accused had been sentenced to death at the term of court where the verdict of guilty was found, that is, in July, 1895, and that when called into court again, in June, 1896, it was for a resentence upon the verdict, because of the previous sentence "having been regularly and legally superseded by the order of court." In the opinion of the supreme court of Georgia in this case it finds this fact and holds that under the Georgia statutes the proceeding had in June, 1896, although called a resentence, was in legal effect but a fixing of a new date for the execution of the previous sentence, the date fixed in the prior sentence having expired. In other words, the supreme court of Georgia holds that the prior sentence remained in force, and that the subsequent action of the court was but a mere fixing of the date for its execution We take notice of the finding of fact (Egan v. Hart, 165 U. S. 188 [41: 680]) and follow the legal conclusions of the court, and are bound by them, since they involve but a construction by the court of last resort of the state of Georgia of the statutes of that state regulating the effect of a resentence in case the date fixed in a former sentence has lapsed.

From these considerations it follows that the only question which we are called upon to determine is whether, after a regular conviction and sentence a suggestion of a then existing insanity is made, it is necessary, in order to constitute due process of law, that the question so presented should be tried by a jury in a judicial proceeding surrounded by all the safeguards and requirements of a common-law jury trial, and even although by the state law full and adequate administrative and quasi-judicial process is created for the purpose of investigating the suggestion. Without analysis of the contention, it might well suffice to demonstrate its obvious unsoundness by pointing to the absurd conclusion which would result from its establishment. If it were true that at common law a suggestion of insanity after sentence created on the part of a convict an absolute right to a trial of this issue by a judge and jury, then (as a finding that insanity did not exist at one time would not be the thing adjudged as to its nonexistence at another) 406] it would be wholly at the *will of a convict to suffer any punishment whatever, for the necessity of his doing so would depend solely upon his fecundity in making suggestion after suggestion of insanity, to be followed by trial upon trial. Nor is this so extreme a possibility that it should not be supposed, since in the argument at bar it was admitted that the sentence first imposed was suspended because the record was taken to the supreme court of Georgia, where the question of the existence of insanity was either directly or indirectly adversely decided.

Blackstone, it is urged, supports the proposition that at common law there was an imperative duty, on the suggestion of the insanity of a convict, to try the issue by judge and jury. The text to which reference is made is as follows (4 Bl. Com. 24, 25):

"Also, if a man in his sound memory commits a capital offense, and before arraignment for it he becomes mad, he ought not to be arraigned for it, because he is not able to plead to it with that advice and caution that he ought. And if, after he has pleaded, the prisoner becomes mad, he shall not be tried; for how can he make his defense? If, after he be tried and found guilty, he loses his senses before judgment, judgment shall not be pronounced; and if, after judgment, he becomes of nonsane memory, execution shall be stayed: for, peradventure, says the humanity of the English law, had the prisoner been of sound memory, he might have alleged something in stay of judgment or execution."

And 1 Hale, P. C. 34, 35, is referred to as being to the same effect. But nothing in these citations is pertinent to the issue under consideration. It is agreed that at common law an insane person was not to suffer punishment. The question here is, What, after conviction and sentence, was the method by which the existence of insanity in the convict was to be ascertained when a suggestion of such insanity was made? In speaking on this subject, Blackstone says (book 4, p. 396):

"Another cause of regular reprieve is, if the defendant becomes non compos, between the judgment and the award of execution: for regularly, as was formally observed, though a man be compos when he commits a capital crime, yet if he *becomes non compos [407 after, he shall not be indicted; if after indictment he shall not be convicted; if after conviction, he shall not receive judgment; if after judgment, he shall not be ordered for execution; for 'furiosus solo furore punitur,' and the law knows not but he might have offered some reason, if in his senses, to have stayed these respective proceedings. It is therefore an invariable rule, when any time intervenes between the attainder and the award of execution, to demand of the prisoner what he hath to allege why execution should not be awarded against him; and if he appears to be insane, the judge in his discretion may and ought to reprieve him."

In other words, by the common law, if, after conviction and sentence, a suggestion of insanity was made, not that the judge to whom it was made should, as a matter of right, proceed to summon a jury and have another trial, but that he should take such action as, in his discretion, he deemed best. In Laros v. Commonwealth, 84 Pa. 200, where a suggestion of insanity was made after verdict, the court said (p. 210):

"The last three assignments of error raise a single question upon the power of the court to inquire by inspection and per testes into the insanity of the prisoner since verdict. We have no precedents in this state, known to us, how the inquiry shall be conducted when such a plea in bar of sentence is put in. It seems to us, however, that no right of trial by jury is involved in the question. A jury having found a verdict against the plea of insanity when set up as a defense to conviction, subsequent insanity cannot be set up in disproof of the conviction. The plea at this stage is only an appeal to the humanity of the court to postpone the punishment until a recovery takes place, or as a merciful dispensation. The rights of the prisoner as an offender on trial for an offense are not involved. He has had the benefit of a jury trial, and it is not the court only which must be satisfied on the score of humanity. If the right of trial by jury exist at all it must exist at all times, no matter how often the plea is repeated alleging insanity occurring since the last verdict. Such a right is inconsistent with the due administration of 408]* justice. There must be a sound discretion to be exercised by the court. If a case of real doubt arise, a just judge will not fail to relieve his own conscience by submitting the fact to a jury."

In Bonds v. State (1827) Mart. & Y. 143, the accused was convicted of the crime of murder, and, upon being led to the bar and asked by the court if he had anything to say why sentence of death should not be pronounced against him, through his counsel, alleged that he was at the time a lunatic, and that sentence could not be passed upon him, and offered to plead his lunacy in bar of the sentence, and further demanded of the court that a jury be called to try the issue of fact arising upon the plea. But the court, upon the inspection of the prisoner and upon consideration of the case—because nothing was shown to render it probable that the defendant was a lunatic, or to make that matter doubtful—refused to allow the prisoner his plea aforesaid, and denied him the privilege of a jury to try the question of his sanity or insanity, and passed upon the accused the sentence of death. In support of his claim that the right to have a jury try the plea of insanity was absolute, and that it was not a matter of choice or discretion with the court to deny the application, counsel for the accused relied upon a statement made in 1 Chitty, Crim. Law, 761, to wit, that "the judge may, if he pleases, swear a jury to inquire, ex officio, whether the prisoner is really insane, or merely counterfeits; and, if they find the former, he is bound to reprieve him till the ensuing session." But the reviewing court said, "The meaning of this passage, giving it a reasonable construction, must be that if, upon the question made, the judge is not satisfied, or has doubts, he may call in to his assistance the aid of a jury, and submit the matter to them. The law on this point is more fully stated in 1 Hawk. P. C. p. 3, in the notes, where it is said: 'Every person of the age of discretion is presumed of sane memory until the contrary appears, which may be either by the inspection of the court (1 Hale, 33; Tr. per pais 14; O. B. 1783, No. 4); by evidence given to the jury, who are charged to try the indictment (3 Bac. Abr. 81; 1 Hale, 33, 35, 36; O. B. 1784, No. 288).
409] Or, being a collateral *issue, the fact may be pleaded and replied to ore tenus, and a venire awarded, returnable instanter, in the nature of an inquest of office. Fost. 46; Kel. 13; 1 Lev. 61; 1 Sid. 72; 4 Comm. Appen. § 3. And this method, in cases of importance, doubt, or difficulty, the court will, in prudence and discretion, adopt. 1 Hale, 35; Sav. 50, 56; 1 And. 154. From this it appears that inspection by the court is one of the legal modes of trying the fact of insanity; and nothing appears in the record of this case to show that the discretion of the court, in adopting the mode pursued, was erroneously exercised. This court therefore is of opinion that there is no error in the matter of the first bill of exceptions." (In making the foregoing quotation we have corrected what seem to be typographical errors in the extract from the marginal note to section 4, chapter 1, book first of Hawkins' Treatise, conforming it to the note as found in the 6th edition, by Leach.)

It being demonstrated by reason and authority that at common law a suggestion made after verdict and sentence of insanity did not give rise to an absolute right on the part of a convict to have such issue tried before the court and to a jury, but addressed itself to the discretion of the judge, it follows that the manner in which such question should be determined was purely a matter of legislative regulation. It was therefore a subject within the control of the state of Georgia. Because we have confined our opinion exclusively to the question before us, that is, the right arising on a suggestion of insanity after sentence, we must not be understood as implying that a different rule would prevail after verdict and up to and including sentence, or as passing upon the question whether, under the 14th Amendment, a state is without power to relegate the decision of a question of insanity, when raised before conviction, to such apt and special tribunal as the law might deem best.

to the right, whatever the occasional effect of the sinuosities of the channel.

3. A speed of 5½ knots through the water, aided by a tide force of 2 knots, is a fault contributing to a collision in a river when the vessel is approaching another vessel so as to involve the risk of collision, and does not slacken her speed or stop and reverse, and therefore is unable to stop before collision after that becomes imminent and she finds that her effort to crowd the other vessel off her rightful course must be unsuccessful.

6. Only a pro rata share of the value of a vessel which was in fault for a collision and for the value of which a bond has been given in limited liability proceedings can be recovered by the underwriters of the cargo of the other vessel when the latter as well as its cargo was injured and was not itself in fault, while the amount of the bond is insufficient to pay the entire loss.

7. Each of two vessels approaching each other is entitled to presume that the other will act lawfully and pursue the customary course, regulating her actions so as to avoid danger.

8. A vessel which gives a signal to correct the error of another is entitled to rely upon it until it is made apparent, by a further cross signal, or from a change of heading, that the other is persisting in her wrongful course.

9. Failure of a vessel to station a lookout on the bows will not constitute a fault with respect to a collision, if the absence of the lookout did not contribute thereto.

Argued October 28, 29, 1897. Decided November 29, 1897.

ON A WRIT of certiorari to the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit to review a decree of that court modifying the decree of the District Court for the Eastern District of Virginia and as modified confirming the same in a libel filed by the master of the steamer Victory against the steamer Plymothian, and in a libel filed by the underwriters of the Plymothian's cargo against the Victory and the Plymothian, seeking to hold them both liable for damages thereto. The District Court held the Victory solely in fault for the collision, and decreed a recovery by the owner of the Plymothian and the underwriters of her cargo pro rata, to the extent of the bond filed by the owners of the Victory in a limitation proceeding. The said Circuit Court of Appeals concurred with the District Court as to the fault found against the Victory, but held that the Plymothian was also at fault to a slight degree, and modified the decree of the District Court by awarding the whole of the Victory's bond to the cargo and that any amount remaining unsatisfied should be paid by the owner of the Plymothian. Decree of the Circuit Court of Appeals reversed, and decree of the District Court affirmed, with certain provisions as to costs.

See same case below, 63 Fed. Rep. 631, 25 U. S. App. 271.

Statement by Mr. Chief Justice Fuller:

On the 12th day of November, 1891, the steamers Victory and Plymothian came into collision in the Elizabeth river between Lambert's Point and Craney Island light. The Plymothian, laden with a cargo of cotton, was outward bound. The Victory was inward bound in ballast. The Plymothian and her cargo were seriously damaged. The Victory was also damaged about the bows.

On the 14th of November, the master of the Victory filed a libel against the Plymothian in the district court for the eastern district of Virginia; and on November 27 a libel*was[411 filed in that court by the underwriters for the Plymothian's cargo against the Victory and the Plymothian, seeking to hold them both liable for damage thereto. The Port of Plymouth Steamship Company, owner of the Plymothian, filed a petition in said district court on the 3d of December, praying for a limitation of its liability for damages growing out of the collision, and giving notice of its intention to contest its liability for any part thereof. A similar petition was filed the same day by MacIntyre and others, owners of the Victory. The value of the owners' interest in the Plymothian and her pending freight was fixed at $45,221, less $5,000 salvage, or $40,221; the value of the interest of the owners of the Victory at the sum of $67,500; each gave bond. The damages to the Victory were proved at $14,363.80; to the Plymothian, at $41,684.12; and to the cargo, at $71,427.97.

The cause was heard upon pleadings and evidence, and the district court held the Victory solely in fault for the collision, and decreed a recovery by the owners of the Plymothian and the underwriters of her cargo, pro rata, to the extent of the bond filed by the owners of the Victory in their limitation proceeding. 63 Fed. Rep. 631. The underwriters of the cargo and the owners of the Victory severally appealed from the decree of the district court to the circuit court of appeals for the fourth circuit. That court concurred with the district court so far as concerned the faults found against the Victory, but held that the Plymothian was also in fault to a slight degree, and modified the decree of the district court by awarding the whole of the Victory's bond to the cargo, and that any amount remaining unsatisfied should be paid by the owner of the Plymothian. 25 U. S. App. 271.

The owners of the Victory and the owner of the Plymothian thereupon severally petitioned for the writ of certiorari from this court under § 6 of the judiciary act of March 3, 1891 (26 Stat. at L. 826, chap. 517); and the writ was accordingly issued.

The facts as stated in substance by the district court and the circuit court of appeals were as follows:

The Victory was a British steamer of 1,774 tons net tonnage, 338 feet in length, 38½ feet [412] in breadth, inward bound in *ballast, drawing 17 feet aft and 13 feet forward. Her officers and crew numbered thirty-one all told.

The Plymothian was a British steamer of 1,016 tons net register, 260 feet long, laden with a cargo consisting of 3,682 compressed bales of cotton. Her officers and crew numbered twenty-one all told. She was outward bound from Galveston to Liverpool, having come in through Hampton Roads to take in coal at Lambert's Point. Her draft was 14 or 16 feet. Both vessels were in charge of pilots, and their masters were on their bridges respectively, each acting as lookout, and seeing that the orders of the pilots were executed. Neither ship had a special lookout forward of the bridge on her bows. The collision occurred in a straight stretch of the channel of the Elizabeth river between Craney Island lighthouse and the turn in the channel at the buoys opposite Lambert's Point. There were two of these buoys, a red one, No. 22, known as the Merrimac buoy, on the west side, and a black one, No. 9, on the east side. The distance from buoy No. 9 to Craney Island lighthouse was 1,967 yards on the chart, or about 1¼ miles.

The place of collision was at black buoy No. 7 at the easterly edge of the eighteen-foot curve of the channel, 1,200 yards south of the Craney Island lighthouse and 767 yards north of the black buoy No. 9. The channel is 250 yards wide at Craney Island and 450 yards wide at buoy No. 9.

The diagram of the channel on the opposite† page sufficiently indicates the situation.

The Plymothian had been taking coal at Lambert's Point pier, a short distance from buoy No. 9. She left the pier at 4 P. M., heading out off the buoy, the course from the pier to the turning point down the channel being northwesterly at an angle of 45 degrees. The usual departing signal was given as she moved from the pier. Proceeding outward to round buoy No. 9, with the helm slightly aport, the engines were at half speed until the buoy was close aboard on the starboard bow. The engines were then put at full speed and the helm hard aport, and, rounding the buoy, she set her course down the easterly side of the channel. [414] *At this time, the Victory was seen both by the captain and the pilot of the Plymothian to be coming up the channel, southward, below Craney Island light, to the westerly side of the mid-channel and on their port bow. The Plymothian thereupon blew a passing signal of one whistle, just as she passed buoy No. 9, and a minute later repeated it, without hearing any reply from the Victory. The vessels were over 1 mile apart at this time with a bend of the channel between them. The wind was southwesterly, with force enough to enable sailing vessels to make 2 or 3 knots against the tide. The Victory had in the meantime been maintaining her general course so as to pass well clear port to port. She had ported her helm, so as to show her port quarter to those on the Plymothian, straightening up to the channel course of S. ¼ W. from Craney Island light. She had been moving at the rate of 10 miles an hour, but at Craney Island she slackened her speed and proceeded at the rate of 6 or 7 miles an hour, assisted by a flood tide running southward with a force of 2 knots. The Plymothian in straightening out at buoy 9 had begun to move against the tide at the rate of about 4 knots an hour, keeping well to the eastern side of the channel.

As the vessels were thus proceeding, the Victory, shortly after passing Craney Island light, apparently directed her course towards the easterly side of the channel, as if under a starboard helm. The pilot of the Plymothian blew a single blast on his whistle, and, receiving two in reply, immediately reversed his engines, sending them full speed astern; blew a danger signal of three blasts, and put the helm hard aport. The Victory somewhat later also blew a danger signal, and then, or shortly afterwards, reversed her engines three lengths away from buoy No. 7, but not in time to stop her headway, due to high speed and the force of the flood tide. The Victory claimed that she gave two two-blast signals, and there is a conflict of evidence as to her position when the first of them was sounded. The Plymothian heard but one such signal, just preceding the danger blasts.

The Plymothian came practically to a standstill before the collision, with buoy *No. [415] 7 close under her starboard bow, but the Victory came on and struck the Plymothian's port side at the bridge, at an angle variously estimated at from 45 to 60 degrees, penetrating about 15 inches into the ship, through her three steel decks, stringer plates, and beams. The force of the blow threw the Plymothian's head around to the starboard, so that buoy No. 7, which prior to the collision had been under her starboard bow, was seen to come around in front of her stem to her port bow.

The Plymothian rapidly filled with water, and to prevent her sinking in the channel her engines were put at full speed ahead until she grounded on the mud flats to the eastward of the channel, where she sank in shallow water. She was subsequently raised, repaired temporarily at Newport News, and finally in England, on the completion of the voyage. The Victory was able to proceed to Norfolk. She was also temporarily repaired at Newport News and finally in England.

Of the cargo of 3,682 bales of cotton shipped on the Plymothian at Galveston, 1,671 bales were shipped under bills of lading, containing the provisions, among others, that the vessel should not be liable for loss or damage occasioned by collisions or other accidents of navigation, even though occasioned by negligence, and that the contract should be governed "by the law of the flag of the vessel carrying the goods."

On reaching Galveston this cotton was delivered to the Plymothian, which issued bills of lading or receipts to the inland carrier, containing the negligence and flag clauses. The bills of lading given by the inland carriers had the negligence but not the flag clause.

Messrs. J. Parker Kirlin and Floyd Hughes, for the Plymothian:

The Victory's navigation was reckless in the extreme.

The starboard hand rule does not apply to cases of vessels approaching around bends in channels.

The Velocity, L. R. 3 P. C. 44; The Ranger, L. R. 4 P. C. 519; Marsden, Martime Collisions, 3d ed. 344, 427, 466, 468, 513.

Each pilot is bound, with peculiar exceptions not applicable here, to keep well over to the side on his starboard hand, and the fact that the bends in the channel might at times bring one on the starboard of the other, does not affect this rule.

The Victory was to blame for attempting to cross the Plymothian's course from the right to the left hand side of the channel without obtaining a previous agreement by whistle signals.

She was in fault for too great speed in a channel way and for failure to slacken speed or stop and reverse earlier.

The excuses the Victory immediately set up for being on the wrong side of the channel at the time of the collision are an acknowledgment of guilt.

The Plymothian had a right to assume that when the Victory reached Craney Island she would make the change called for by the bend at that point.

The faults of the Victory being clear and gross, the burden rests upon her, in order to make a case for apportionment, to establish fault on the part of the Plymothian by clear and convincing proof. In such case the contributing fault must be established beyond a fair doubt.

Because of the exception of "collision" in all the bills of lading, the cargo rests under the same burden.

As between the two ships the application of this rule can hardly be contested. It has been laid down in terms of unmistakable plainness in The Carroll v. Green (The Carroll), 75 U. S. 8 Wall. 302, 306 (19: 392); Thompson v. The Great Republic (The Great Republic), 90 U. S. 23 Wall. 20, 35 (23: 55, 59); Alexandre v. Machan (The City of New York), 147 U. By reason of the exception of "collision" in all the bills of lading, the same rule should be applied as against the cargo.

As soon as the carrier shows the damage is within an exception in the bill of lading, the burden of proof shifts, and the shipper, to defeat the operation of the exception, must prove want of skill or diligence.

The Plymothian was not in fault for failing to stop and reverse earlier.

The Victory's position when she sounded her first two-blast signal is involved in a conflict of testimony, but, on the clear weight of the evidence, she was then to the north of Craney Island.

The Plymothian was justified in presuming the Victory would pass port to port until some contrary sign appeared which produced an actual risk of collision.

When these vessels were as far apart as buoy 9 and Craney Island they were in no risk of collision, and the only rule then applicable to them was that each should keep to its own starboard side of the channel, so as to avoid any risk as they came nearer. Each was entitled to presume that the other would act lawfully; would keep to its own side; if temporarily crowded out of her proper course would return to it as soon as possible; and that each would pursue the customary track of vessels in the channel, regulating its action so as to avoid danger rather than to incur it.

So long as the vessels were port to port the Plymothian proceeding at moderate speed was not bound to stop or reverse, against the chance that the other vessel might depart from the rules of the navigation. So long as she was not seen to be departing from them, the Plymothian was not in fault for keeping on.

Marshall v. The Adriatic (The Adriatic), 107 U. S. 512 (27: 497); The Jesmond, L. R. 4 P. C. 1; The John King, 1 U. S. App. 64, 49 Fed. Rep. 469, 1 C. C. A. 319.

The Plymothian would not have been bound to stop and reverse at once if she had heard a prior two-blast signal from the Victory at the time she claims to have blown it.

No fault on the part of the Plymothian has been established, nor indeed alleged, under inspectors' rule 8.

The court of appeals erred in overruling the finding of fact made by the district judge on the conflicting evidence of witnesses produced before him, that the headway of the Plymothian was completely stopped at the time of collision.

The Corsica v. Schuyler (The Corsica), 76 U. S. 9 Wall. 630 (19: 804); The Umbria, 166 U. S. 404 (41: 1053).

The appellate court should not reverse a finding of fact made by the district court upon conflicting testimony of witnesses produced before him, unless it appears to be clearly against the weight of evidence.

The Plymothian, if in any degree at fault for the collision, is freed from responsibility to her cargo by the express provisions of the bills of lading under which she carried it.

The bill of lading No. 48 of the Gulf, Colorado, & Santa Fé Railway Company was a contract to carry to the seaboard merely, and to forward the goods from there upon the terms and conditions of the steamship's form of bill of lading, and that the shipper, by the terms of the contract, made the first carrier his agent, to agree upon carriage from the seaboard to the port of destination, upon the terms and conditions in the form of the steamship's bill.

Where it appears expressly that the parties contracted with reference to a common law, it is the law of this country that such foreign law prima facie should be applied in expounding the contract.

Cox v. United States, 31 U. S. 6 Pet. 203 (8: 370).

A state court called upon to administer the law of another state or of a foreign state or of a foreign country could refuse to do so, upon grounds which would justify this court in a similar refusal, yet in practice they do not regard the public policy of their own state as a sufficient ground for applying their own law, instead of the foreign law, where the latter would otherwise be applicable.

If any fault be found on the part of the Plymothian, not covered by the bills of lading, it was slight as compared with the faults of the Victory, and the court should therefore apportion the damages in accordance with the degree of the faults.

The vessels were not in fact a thousand yards apart at that time, for the Plymothian had already proceeded some distance down the river; but even if they had been a thousand yards apart they were, when their respective rates of speed are considered, distant from each other less than three minutes of time. Under cross signals, if such had been recognized, it was the duty of the Plymothian to act instantly for safety; a duty which was recognized by her when at a later stage she did hear a cross signal from the Victory.

The true test applied by this court to determine the validity of any provision in a bill of lading is the measure of what is "just and reasonable in the eye of the law."

While the more frequent practice in this country undoubtedly follows the rule of equal division the result is often reached that a greater burden is thrown upon one vessel than upon another in order to afford complete indemnity to owners of cargo, or to other persons who have sustained damage, though free from fault themselves. Such instances have arisen when one of two faulty vessels was of insufficient value to pay her full one half. Then the other guilty vessel has been compelled to make up the deficiency.

The George Washington v. Cavan (The Washington and The Gregory), 76 U. S. 9 Wall. 513, 516 (19: 787, 788); The Alabama v. De Las Casas (The Alabama and The Game-Cock), 92 U. S. 677 (27: 99).

Aside from these instances where the greater loss has been thrown upon one vessel through accidental circumstances, it has not been unprecedented to make a decree imposing a heavier burden upon one because of her graver fault.

416] *Mr. Chief Justice Fuller delivered the opinion of the court:

The district court and the circuit court of appeals concurred in finding the Victory grossly in fault, and we see no reason for arriving at any other conclusion. In our opinion the collision was the direct consequence of the Victory's disregard of the rule of the road and her reckless navigation.

In any aspect of the case, the rule of the road was to keep to the right.

By rule 18 of the regulations prescribed by the act of April 29, 1864, carried forward in § 4233 of the Revised Statutes, "if two vessels under steam are meeting end on, or nearly end on, so as to involve risk of collision, the helms of both shall be put to port, so that each may pass on the port side of the other."

The first rule of the supervising inspectors is to the same effect.†

417] *And this was proved to be the usage in the navigation of the Elizabeth river, and known to the master of the Victory.

These vessels were approaching each other in such directions and with such bearings as required them to keep to the right. The distance between Craney Island light and buoy No. 9 was about 1⅛ miles. When the Plymothian was at buoy No. 9 the Victory was somewhat to the north of or near Craney Island. As the Plymothian straightened down the channel, opposite buoy 9, she was near the eastern side and heading straight down the channel course N. ¼ or ½ E. She was obliged to swing, on leaving the pier, to round the buoy, but had steadied down as she passed it. The evidence thoroughly established that she was never on the westerly side of the channel. We think the district judge was amply justified in finding as he did that the Plymothian had not, "in coming out from Lambert's pier, gone over to the west of the channel near to red buoy No. 22; and had not, after doing so, recrossed the channel to reach its position near buoy 9, as claimed by the Victory's counsel. The tide was not strong enough to force her over there, and it would have been out of her course to have gone there. The testimony is conclusive to that effect."

The Victory when in the neighborhood of Craney Island was either in mid-channel or to the westward of it, and on the Plymothian's port bow. The Victory's witnesses admitted starboarding twice for different schooners and hard starboarding just before the collision; but both of the lower courts, in accordance with the great weight of evidence, found that the Victory was not prevented by other vessels in the channel, either from going on the westerly side or from staying there, *while the testimony of the Victory's pi- [418 lot indicated that his object in heading over for the easterly side of the channel was to cut off some of the distance into port by passing close to buoys Nos. 7 and 9.

Moreover, as immediately after straightening down the Plymothian ported a little and then hard ported, even if the Victory had been heading at a gradual angle across the channel all the way from Craney Island the vessels would have been approaching each other from an oblique direction, which would have brought the inspectors' second rule into play, that vessels so situated "shall pass to the right of each other as if head and head, or nearly so."

† "Rule I.—When steamers are approaching each other 'head and head' or nearly so, it shall be the duty of each steamer to pass to the right or port side of the other; and the pilot of either steamer may be first in determining to pursue this course and thereupon shall give as a signal of his intention one short and distinct blast of his steam whistle, which the pilot of the other steamer shall answer promptly by a similar blast of his steam whistle, and thereupon such steamers shall pass to the right or port side of each other; but if the course of such steamers is so far on the starboard of each other as not to be considered by pilots as meeting 'head and head' or nearly so, the pilot so first deciding shall immediately give two short and distinct blasts of his steam whistle, which the pilot of the other steamer shall answer promptly by two similar blasts of his steam whistle, and they shall pass on the left or on the starboard side of each other.

"Note.—In the night steamers will be considered meeting head and head so long as both the colored lights on each are in view of the other.

"Second situation.—Here the green light only will be visible to each, the screens preventing the red light from being seen. They are therefore passing to starboard, which is rulable in this situation, each pilot having previously signified his intention by two blasts of the steam whistle."

Rule II.—When steamers are approaching each other in an oblique direction (as shown in diagram of the fourth situation), they shall pass to the right of each other, as if meeting head and head or nearly so, and the signals by whistles shall be given and answered promptly as in that case specified."

"Rule III.—If when steamers are approaching each other the pilot of either vessel fails to understand the course or intention of the other, whether from signals being given or answered erroneously, or from other causes, the pilot so in doubt shall immediately signify the same by giving several short and rapid blasts of the steam whistle; and if the vessels shall have approached within half a mile of each other, both shall be immediately slowed to a speed barely sufficient for steerageway until the proper signals are given, answered, and understood, or until the vessels shall have passed each other."

The starboard-hand rule had no application. Although when the Plymothian started from the pier her starboard side must necessarily have been down stream as she turned, the vessels were never starboard to starboard after she had rounded buoy 9 and straightened down the channel and the Victory had passed Craney Island and straightened up S. ¼ W. Indeed, the rule applicable when two vessels "are crossing so as to involve risk of collision," that "the vessel which has the other on her own starboard side shall keep out of the way," is ordinarily inapplicable to vessels coming around bends in channels, which may at times bring one vessel on the starboard of the other. It has often been held as a general rule of navigation that vessels approaching each other in narrow channels, or where their courses diverge as much as 1¼ or 2 points, are bound to keep to port and pass to the right, whatever the occasional effect of the sinuosities of the channel. New York & B. Transportation Co. v. Philadelphia & S. Steam Navigation Co. 63 U. S. 22 How. 461 [16: 397]; Union S. S. Co. v. New York & V. S. S. Co. 65 U. It is interesting to note that Union Steamship Co. v. New York & V. Steamship Co. was a case of collision in the channel of the Elizabeth river, where the steamship Jamestown, outward bound, took the eastern side of the 419]channel, rounding *Lambert's Point near the buoy, and proceeded on her course N. ¼ E. She was struck by the Pennsylvania, coming up, by reason of the Pennsylvania putting her helm to starboard instead of keeping her proper course, or porting when it became known that the Jamestown was approaching; and it was held that the Pennsylvania was solely to blame.

The principle was embodied in article 21 of the international regulations adopted by the act of March 3, 1885 (23 Stat. at L. 438, chap. 354), providing that "in narrow channels every steamship shall, when it is safe and practicable, keep to that side of the fairway or mid channel which lies on the starboard side of such ship," which is article 25 of the regulations adopted August 19, 1890 (26 Stat. at L. 320, chap. 802), and put in operation, after some postponements and amendments, in 1897 (29 Stat. at L. 885, 893); and of the act of June 7, 1897 (30 Stat. at L. 96, chap. 4).

In The Pekin [1897] A. C. 532, articles 21 and 22 of these regulations were considered. Article 21 is given above and article 22 read as follows: "Where by the above rules one of two ships is to keep out of the way, the other shall keep her course."

That was an appeal from the decision of the supreme court for China and Japan, sitting in admiralty, in which the steamship Normandie was alone held to blame for a collision which took place between her and the steamship Pekin in the river Whangpoo on April 3, 1896. The case was thus stated by Sir Francis Jeune, delivering judgment in the privy council: "At Pootung Point the Whangpoo makes a sharp bend towards the south, returning indeed on its course at something more than a right angle, and to the eastwards of that point the stream is divided by a line of buoys into two navigable channels, the northern being called the inside, and the southern the outside, channel. The westernmost of these buoys is known as the Old Dock buoy. The Pekin was proceeding up the inside channel along the line of buoys, that is to say on the starboard side of that channel, and the Normandie was coming down the river to the southward of mid-channel. It is clear *that when near the Old Dock buoy [420 the Pekin ported, and that at or about the same time the Normandie starboarded. The Normandie afterwards endeavored to port, but her helm failed to act, owing to what is termed the 'Chow Chow' water, which is, it would appear, a well-known area of eddies or whirlpools off Pootung Point. The result was that a collision occurred well to the north of the river, and somewhat to the eastwards of Pootung Point, the stem of the Normandie striking the port bow of the Pekin. The evidence is not clear as to the whistles given by the two vessels. The learned Chief Justice of the Supreme Court has found that 'at the same time two blasts of the Normandie's whistle were blown as a signal to the Pekin, those on board the Pekin simultaneously blew one blast of her whistle.' Those on the Pekin dispute the double blast of the Normandie; but their Lordships think that, accepting as they do the above finding as correct, it may well be that one of the two whistles of the Normandie coincided with the one whistle of the Pekin, and so those on the Pekin heard only one whistle from the Normandie, and believed that only one was given."

The appeal raised the question of the conduct of both vessels. The Normandie was manifestly in fault. As to the conduct of the Pekin two charges were insisted on by counsel, and after setting them forth, the opinion thus proceeded: "The first of these charges raises the question, Were those two vessels crossing vessels within the meaning of article 22? and also the further question whether the Pekin kept her course. The effect of article 22 has been made clear by several authorities. The cases of The Velocity, L. R. 3 P. C. 44; The Ranger, L. R. 4 P. C. 519, and The Ocean, L. R. 3 Prob. Div. 60, have explained and illustrated the distinction which exists in the effect of this rule as regards vessels navigating the open sea and those passing along the winding channels of rivers. The crossing referred to in article 22 is 'crossing so as to involve risk of collision,' and it is obvious that while two vessels in certain positions and at certain distances in regard to each other in the open sea may be crossing so as to *involve risk of collision, it [421 would be completely mistaken to take the same view of two vessels in the same positions and distances in the reaches of a winding river. The reason, of course, is that the vessels must follow, and must be known to intend to follow, the curves of the river bank. But vessels may, no doubt, be crossing vessels within article 22 in a river. It depends on their presumable courses. If at any time two vessels, not end on, are seen, keeping the courses to be expected with regard to them respectively, to be likely to arrive at the same point at or nearly at the same moment, they are vessels crossing so as to involve risk of collision; but they are not so crossing if the course which is reasonably to be attributed to either vessel would keep her clear of the other. The question, therefore, always turns on the reasonable inference to be drawn as to a vessel's future course from her position at a particular moment, and this greatly depends on the nature of the locality where she is at that moment. Their lordships have restated these propositions because they appear to them decisive of this part of the present case. They are advised by their assessors, and it appears to them clear, that, having regard to the features of the locality at the time the Pekin ported her helm, that is to say when she was near the Old Dock buoy, the vessels were not crossing vessels within the meaning of article 22. It was reasonable for those on the Pekin, as, without fault on their part, they did not hear the double blast of the Normandie before they took action with their helm, to assume that the Normandie would take the outside channel, in which case their courses would not cross, or would take the southern side of the inside channel, in which case their courses would indeed cross, but not so as to involve risk of collision."

We ought to add that, in the case before us, even if the steamers had been so far on the starboard of each other as to justify the pilots in considering that they were not meeting "head and head," or nearly so, there was no pretense of an agreement to go starboard to starboard under inspector's rule I.; nor was this a case for the application of rule III.

Testing the Victory's conduct by settled [422] rules, she was *plainly in fault for not keeping to the right, and in attempting to cross the Plymothian's course, and her speed renders her conduct still more blameworthy. It does not seem to be controverted that at the time of leaving the lighthouse her speed was 5½ knots through the water, and there was a tide force of 2 knots, which would make 7½ knots over the ground. The circuit court of appeals found that from Craney Island up her speed through the water was 6 or 7 miles an hour, with a two-mile tide assisting her, which would make her speed over the bottom 8 or 9 miles. Certainly she must be held to have known that she was approaching the Plymothian so as to involve the risk of collision, and should have slackened her speed under rule 21, and have stopped and reversed sooner than she did, when she was informed by sight and hearing that her effort to crowd the Plymothian off her rightful course must be unsuccessful.

If she could not port and keep on her own side, she should have reversed at least as early as when her second two-blast signal was blown and not assented to by the Plymothian, yet it was the Plymothian that immediately reversed on hearing that signal and blew three danger signals, while the Victory did not blow her danger signals until after that, and manifestly did not reverse as early as the Plymothian. At the collision the Plymothian's headway had been stopped, but the Victory had such headway on that she threw the Plymothian's bows around to starboard, while her own bows cut through the Plymothian's three decks and stringer plates, a distance of at least 15 inches, and were damaged as far back as 3 feet.

None of the excuses the Victory set up for being on the wrong side of the channel tended to palliate her guilt. The only time at which the Plymothian could have been on the Victory's starboard bow was when the Victory was below Craney Island, and she was bound to govern herself by the bearings of the vessels as they were after she straightened up the channel course from Craney Island south, and then the vessels were port to port. The Victory met a few steamers, *but her captain and [423] pilot admitted that they did not force the Victory out of her course, and they were passed near Craney Island, or the lighthouse, or far below the place of collision. So there were two or three schooners in the channel, but both the courts below found that they did not prevent the Victory from doing her duty by porting and keeping to the right, and her presence near them at all was attributable to her having left the western side of the channel.

We need not elaborate in view of the concurrence of the courts below, and have gone so far into the evidence on this branch of the case because it illustrates the point on which those courts were at variance.

As between these vessels, the fault of the Victory being obvious and inexcusable, the evidence to establish fault on the part of the Plymothian must be clear and convincing in order to make a case for apportionment. The burden of proof is upon each vessel to establish fault on the part of the other.

The recognized doctrine is thus stated by Mr. Justice Brown in The Umbria, 166 U. S. 404, 409 [41: 1053, 1057]: "Indeed, so gross was the fault of the Umbria in this connection that we should unhesitatingly apply the rule laid down in The City of New York [Alexandre v. Machan], 147 U. S. 72, 85 [37: 84, 90], and The Ludvig Holberg, 157 U. S. 60, 71 [39: 620, 624], that any doubts regarding the management of the other vessel, or the contribution of her faults, if any, to the collision, should be resolved in her favor."

"Collision" was an exception in all the bills of lading, and, laying out of view the "negligence" and "flag" clauses, as the damage was occasioned by collision and within the exception, it rested upon the underwriters in this case to defeat the operation of the exception by proof of such negligence on the part of the Plymothian as would justify a decree against her if sued alone. Clark v. Barnwell, 53 U. S. 12 How. 272, 280 [13: 985, 988]; Western Transportation Co. v. Downer, 78 U. S. 11 Wall. 129 [20: 160]; The City of Hartford and The Unit [The Hartford v. Rideout], 97 U. S. 323, 325 [24: 930]; The Ludvig Holberg, 157 U. S. 60 [39: 620].

Apparently it is a hardship for the underwriters on the Plymothian's cargo to be compelled to bear a portion of their own loss, but if the Plymothian was free from fault, this is merely *the result of the limitation of li- [424] ability acts, the value of the victory not being sufficient to pay the entire damages sustained.

The circuit court of appeals and the district court arrived at different conclusions in respect of the Plymothian's entire freedom from fault. The district court held that the Plymothian was without blame, while the circuit court of appeals was of opinion that she was not wholly blameless, because she kept her course "without taking any precaution whatever until too late, and when the pending collision became inevitable." Whether she may not have been slightly in fault may be a close question. This is often so when subsequent knowledge of what might have prevented disaster tends to qualify the inquiry as to the prior duty to avert it. But after all, the question is, as pointed out by Mr. Justice McLean in Williamson v. Barrett, 54 U. S. 13 How. 101 [14: 68], whether it was the duty of the master, in the exercise of due care and caution in the management of his vessel, to give a particular order. And on a careful consideration of the evidence, we think that the Plymothian was not bound to change her course, or to stop and reverse earlier than she did, and these are the only elements of fault imputed to her.

Were the position and course and signals of the Victory such that the Plymothian was bound to change her course or to stop and reverse sooner than she did?

The Plymothian in passing the buoy straightened down the channel course on the easterly side. The only change she made after straightening down was by porting her helm, which put her closer to the easterly edge of the channel at the time of the collision. She left her pier at 4 o'clock P. M., under half speed until she rounded the buoy, when the engines were put full speed ahead, 767 yards from the point of collision. The full speed of the Plymothian was 7 knots. The tide was running against her with a force of 2 knots. She had her engines at full speed against the tide perhaps five minutes, and both the courts below found her speed over the ground was about 4 miles an hour. The Victory blew two double-blast signals and a three-blast signal before the 425]collision. *The evidence of her crew was that the two-blast signals were sounded within a half a minute or a minute of each other, when the steamer was half way between Craney Island and buoy No. 7, and that the three-blast followed a minute or so later. The Plymothian heard only one two-blast signal and the three-blast signal, at that time, as appeared from disinterested evidence on both sides. None of these independent witnesses heard two double blasts and a three-blast signal from the Victory in short succession. All of them, who saw or heard the first two blasts, testified that that signal was blown when the Victory was to the north of or about Craney Island. And, in her petition for limitation of liability, the Victory claimed to have blown that signal "soon after passing Craney Island light," and placed the Plymothian at that time as "apparently starting down the river from opposite Lambert's Point." But if she blew two blasts twice, where her captain and pilot said she did, they were blown close together. The Plymothian's evidence showed that she heard but one, and if the Victory blew two blasts twice within such a short interval as she claims, it would seem that one of them overlapped the whistle from the Plymothian, or it may be that the last two blasts were overlapped by the Plymothian's danger signal.

The evidence largely preponderates that only one signal of two blasts and the signal of three blasts could be heard in the neighborhood of the Plymothian at the time the Victory claims she repeated the two-blast signal and followed it up with three; and we think the conclusion is sustained by the weight of evidence that the Victory's first two-blast signal was blown before she passed Craney Island, when the vessels were so far apart that the Plymothian would not have been bound to stop if she had heard or seen that signal, and as there were at least two river steamboats between the vessels at the time her pilot might have supposed that the Victory's two blasts were intended for one of them rather than for him. However, the Plymothian did not see or hear that signal, and cannot be held in fault as contributing to the collision because she failed to see or hear what would not have *been[426 followed by any change of course; and if there were two two-blast signals within a half a minute, then it is fair to conclude on the evidence that one of them was overlapped by the whistle of the Plymothian. The Plymothian acted immediately and effectively on hearing the two-blast signal she did hear, and succeeded in stopping her headway, and this when the risk of collision first appeared, which was when the Victory last starboarded. The course of the Victory was, we have said, along mid-channel or to the west of it, and did not involve a risk of collision until she made a change to port under a starboard helm, just before sounding the two-blast signal heard by the Plymothian. Her witnesses admit that they were starting straight up the channel after passing Craney Island light, heading S. ¼ W. The channel course below Craney Island, as shown by the chart, was S. by E., and in heading S. ¼ W. her helm must have been ported, and the vessels were port to port. The testimony of the Plymothian's officers and crew was to the effect that the Victory was on their port bow all the way up from below Craney Island to the point where she changed her course just before blowing a two-blast signal, and they are corroborated by independent and disinterested witnesses. The Victory's witnesses testified to starboarding for two or three schooners, who were near the point of collision, and this would account for her sheer to port, as observed on the Plymothian, when she took her precautions for safety. Each of these vessels was entitled to presume that the other would act lawfully; would keep to her own side; if temporarily crowded out of her course would return to it as soon as possible; and that she would pursue the customary track of vessels in the channel, regulating her action so as to avoid danger. The Servia [Nichels v. The Servia], 149 U. S. 144 [37: 681]; The City of New York [Alexandre v. Machan], 147 U. S. 72 [37: 84]; Belden v. Chase, 150 U. S. 674 [37: 1218].

The rule applicable to them was that each should keep to her own starboard side of the channel. So long as the vessels were port to port, the Plymothian, proceeding at moderate speed, was not bound to stop and reverse on the chance that the other vessel might depart from 427] the rules of navigation. *Nor would the Plymothian necessarily have been bound to stop and reverse at once if she had heard a two-blast signal from the Victory at the time when the Victory claims to have blown it. That was, the Victory says, half way between buoy No. 7 and Craney Island, which would be 600 yards from the buoy, while the Plymothian was 300 yards above the buoy, which would make the distance between the vessels 900 yards or ½ mile, as the district judge found. The Plymothian was entitled to rely on her repeated single blast to correct the error of the Victory until it was made apparent by a further cross signal or from a change of heading that she was persisting in her wrongful course.

The case of The Stephanotis and The Horton, cited to us from the Shipping Gazette and Lloyd's List, of July 26, 1894, was similar in its main features to the one before us. The collision occurred on the river Tyne. On the part of the Stephanotis it appeared that she was bound up on the north side of the channel, at a moderate speed, in a snowstorm, when the Horton was observed about 250 yards off, also on the north side of the river, in such a position as to make it impracticable for the Stephanotis to pass up between the Horton and the buoys. She thereupon sounded two short blasts and starboarded her helm, afterwards repeating the signal. A short blast was then heard from the Horton, which was seen to be approaching as if under a port helm. The Stephanotis came ahead, helm a-starboard, her engines going full speed ahead, as the only means of avoiding a collision. The case for the Horton was that she was keeping to the south of mid-channel, going down the river at about 4 knots. The Stephanotis was seen coming up the river ½ mile away, bearing right ahead. The Stephanotis thereupon blew one blast, and the Horton responded with one blast, and then ported and steadied her helm. When the vessels were in a position to clear port to port, the Stephanotis blew two short blasts, and the Horton, after replying with one short blast, again slightly ported her helm. The Stephanotis, however, blew two more 428] blasts, and *as she was then seen to be under a starboard helm, the Horton's whistle was blown a short blast, and her engines were set full speed astern, but the Stephanotis struck the Horton, doing her great damage.

The master of the rolls, Lord Esher, said: "The advice which we have received from the gentlemen who assist us is precisely that which struck me the moment I heard the circumstances of this case. The advice to us is that there was time and distance for the Stephanotis to have ported after the Horton blew one blast, and that the master of the Horton might reasonably have expected that he would do so. When the master or pilot of the Horton heard the first two whistles which were the beginning of the other man's starboarding; and when at that moment starboarding could have but little effect, he had a right reasonably to suppose that the man who at that moment was starboarding his helm, or was beginning to do so, seeing him there, and being told by him that he was porting, would have ample time and distance, if he did not choose to persist in starboarding, to have put his helm to port, or to have ceased starboarding, and then they would have gone clear. But he persisted in starboarding. Then comes the question, Ought the pilot or captain of the Horton to have stopped or reversed, or stopped even, at that moment when the other was beginning to starboard? The answer is that his beginning to starboard could hardly have been for the Horton, but must have been for some other reason, and that the master and pilot of the Horton might reasonably have supposed that when, if anybody had looked, they must have seen the Horton, and must have known that the Horton was porting—they had a right to suppose that the Stephanotis would stop starboarding immediately, and would have ported her helm. If so, it was not unreasonable and unseamanlike, I think, for the Horton to keep on as she did. By the time that two ship's lengths were passed over by the two vessels approaching each other—that is the time of the second blast—the collision was inevitable. It seems to me that the judgment of the president, and the advice of his trinity masters was too severe. It was requiring men *to do[429 what no man ought to be expected to do under such strange circumstances. Therefore, with great deference, I disagree with the severity of their sentence, and think the Stephanotis ought to be held solely to blame."

Similar views were expressed by Judge Brown of the southern district of New York in The Florence, 68 Fed. Rep. 940.

In respect of both these vessels, the captain was acting as lookout on the bridge, but there was no lookout stationed on the bows. Can it be said that the absence of such a lookout on the Plymothian contributed to the injury? Her captain, pilot, and third officer were all on the bridge and the view was clear and unobstructed. Would a lookout on the bows have heard or seen more than they did? The bearing of this inquiry is, of course, on the failure of the Plymothian to detect the first alleged two-blast signal blown by the Victory. We have already indicated that the evidence is to our minds satisfactory that that two-blast signal was blown when the Victory was below Craney Island lighthouse. If so, the vessels were 1⅛ miles apart and the Victory was on the Plymothian's port bow. The Plymothian blew three single blast signals after that time, and neither of them were dissented from by the Victory until the last one, and the proper manœuvers to avoid the risk then created were promptly taken. But, if it were assumed that the first two-blast signal was blown when the Victory was half way between Craney Island and buoy No. 7, the vessels were still ½ mile apart with room to correct the proposed erroneous course. And if the Victory blew her second two-blast signal inside of a half minute after the first, as her witnesses testified, and the Plymothian upon hearing one of the two immediately acted on it, the failure to hear the other cannot be considered a fault under the circumstances.

We are of opinion that the Plymothian was on her proper course; that she was not bound to anticipate the conduct of the Victory; and that she took all proper precautions as soon as chargeable with notice of risk of collision. The result is that we agree with the district [430]court in the conclusion that the *Victory was wholly to blame and that the Plymothian was free from fault.

Decree of the Circuit Court of Appeals reversed, the costs of that court to be equally divided between the owners of the Victory and the underwriters; decree of the District Court affirmed; costs in this court for preparing and printing the record to be paid by the owners of the Victory, all other costs in this court to be divided equally between the owners of the Victory and the underwriters.

Federal question, when does not arise.

A case does not involve the construction or application of the Constitution of the United States, or the validity or construction of a treaty, so that writ of error will lie directly from this court to the United States circuit court merely because the complaint in ejectment states a reliance on a certain article of a treaty and the 5th Amendment of the Constitution, without asserting that any right, title, privilege, or immunity is derived from either Constitution or treaty, or indicating in what way the cause of action is claimed to arise from either, when the court does not decide any question as to the application or construction of the Constitution or validity or construction of the treaty, but holds that plaintiffs' title failed because of noncompliance with the Spanish law.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Arkansas to review a judgment of that court, dismissing the complaint with costs in an action in ejectment brought by Margaret A. Muse et al, against the Arlington Hotel Company, for possession of land in the county of Garland, state of Arkansas, and for damages for the wrongful possession thereof. Dismissed.

See same case below, 68 Fed. Rep. 637.

Statement by Mr. Chief Justice Fuller:

Margaret A. Muse and others filed their original complaint in ejectment against the Arlington Hotel Company July 25, 1894, in the circuit court of the United States for the eastern district of Arkansas, to which defendant demurred. Pending the demurrer, plaintiffs filed an amended complaint, in which they averred that defendant was "a corporation organized *under the laws of the state of [431] Arkansas, and doing business at the city of Hot Springs in that state;" and that plaintiffs, except "Alice F. South, who is a citizen and resident of Coahuila, Mexico," were all citizens and residents of the United States, some of Louisiana, some of Texas, some of Mississippi, and one of Illinois.

That they are the only heirs at law of Don Juan Filhiol, who died intestate, a citizen of Louisiana, in 1821; and that they are the owners in fee simple of a league of land described in the complaint.

Plaintiffs alleged that Filhiol was born in France in 1740; that he left that country in 1763, going to San Domingo, and thence to Philadelphia in 1779, and finally arrived in New Orleans in May of that year, where he joined the volunteers in the war between Spain and England; that in 1783 he was appointed by the King of Spain captain of the army and commandant of the militia and assigned to duty at the post of Ouachita in Louisiana, under instructions from Don Estevan Miro, the governor general of that province.

That, on December 12, 1787, Filhiol memorialized the governor of Louisiana and West Florida for a grant of land, whereon the governor ordered a survey of the land applied for, and that before February 22, 1788, Don Carlos Trudeau, the then surveyor general of Louisiana, made a survey in accordance with the law as it then existed, and made a report thereof, with figurative plan, and procès verbal in due form, in and by which the land was described; that the survey, figurative plan, and procès verbal have been lost or destroyed, and plaintiffs could not produce them, but they alleged that on February 22, 1788, Miro, as governor, made and delivered to Filhiol a grant for a certain league of land, the description of which was set forth in the complaint; that the grant was made while Filhiol was acting as commandant of the post of Ouachita, as a reward for his civil and military services in his position as commandant; and that Miro, as governor, was by the Spanish colonial laws vested with power to make grants of land and to convey by such grants the absolute fee simple to the lands granted.

*Plaintiffs further averred that the land[432] granted by Miro to Filhiol consisted of a certain 1 square league with the hot springs at the city of Hot Springs as its center, the description, metes, and bounds of which league were more accurately described in the survey, figurative plan, and procès verbal; and, setting forth a translation of the grant, plaintiffs stated that after the delivery of the grant to Filhiol, December 6, 1788, Trudeau, who was then public and private surveyor of Louisiana, made and delivered to Filhiol a certificate of measurement of the land, a translation of which was also given; that the making and delivery of this certificate was a delivery of the judicial possession of the land, and had the force and effect of segregating it from the public domain, and that the grant vested full and complete title in the grantee.

It was further alleged that Filhiol sold and conveyed the land, November 25, 1803, to his son-in-law, Bourgeat, passing the deed before the military and civil commandant of Ouachita, the deed being witnessed by two witnesses, who signed the act in the presence of two others, and a copy of which was set out; that the deed was immediately reported to the proper office of Louisiana and was afterwards duly recorded; that Bourgeat retroceded the same lands to Filhiol by deed passed before the judge of the parish of Pointe Coupee, July 17, 1806; that this deed (a copy of which was given) was duly filed and recorded; and that Filhiol never thereafter parted with his title to the land. And plaintiffs allege that when these deeds were made the Spanish colonial law forbade any public officer having authority to receive acknowledgments and pass deeds for the conveyance of lands to pass such deeds or receive acknowledgments thereof, unless they knew that the vendor had title to the lands proposed to be sold.

Plaintiffs also averred that in 1819 Filhiol leased the hot springs to one Dr. Wilson for five years; that shortly thereafter, in 1821, Filhiol died; and that ever since his death plaintiffs had always urged their title to the property, and employed agents and attorneys to do so for them, and that during a large part of this time they had been embarrassed by the want of the original grant, which had been [433] mislaid; that often *and repeated searches were made by plaintiffs for it, but without success, but that lately, in 1883, the grant had been found.

The complaint continued: "Said plaintiffs state that they claim title to said league of land so granted by said Estevan Miro, as governor of said province, to the said Juan Filhiol, as the heirs at law of said Juan Filhiol, and they state that they will rely upon the following written evidences of their title for the maintenance of this action:

"First. On the grant made by Don Estevan Miro, as governor of the province of Louisiana, on February 22, 1788, to Don Juan Filhiol, a translation of which grant is filed herewith, marked 'Exhibit A,' and made part hereof.

"Second. On the certificate of measurement or survey made by Carlos Trudeau, surveyor of the province of Louisiana, on December 6, 1788, and delivered by him on that date to Don Juan Filhiol, a translation of which, marked 'Exhibit B,' is filed herewith and made part hereof.

"Third. On the deed of said land made by Don Juan Filhiol to Narcisso Bourgeat on November 25, 1803, a translation of which is herewith filed, marked 'Exhibit C,' and made part hereof.

"Fourth. On the deed or retrocession of said land made by Narcisso Bourgeat to Don Juan Filhiol on the 17th of July, 1806, a translation of which deed or retrocession is herewith filed, marked 'Exhibit D,' and made part hereof.

"Fifth. On the 3d article of the treaty between the United States of America and the French Republic of April 30, 1803, which was ratified on the 21st of October, 1803.

"Sixth. On the 5th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States."

And plaintiffs then alleged that defendant was in the unlawful possession of part of the land, "which portion is included in the Hot Springs Mountain Reservation, in the city of Hot Springs, county of Garland, state of Arkansas, the boundary lines of which reservation were established by the Hot Springs commission by public surveys in pursuance of the laws of the United States;" and this was followed by a *particular description of the [434] land so alleged to be unlawfully possessed.

Plaintiffs charged that defendant had been in such unlawful possession since the 3d day of March, 1892, during all of which time plaintiffs had title to and the right of possession of said land; and alleged that by reason of such wrongful possession they had been damaged in the sum of $20,000; and prayed judgment for possession and damages. To this amended complaint defendant demurred, and also filed an answer and exceptions.

The circuit court sustained the demurrer and exceptions, and entered judgment dismissing the complaint with costs, whereupon this writ of error was sued out directly to that court.

The circuit court, Williams, J., held, 68 Fed. Rep. 637, that the alleged granting papers were ineffectual to perfect title, because there was no showing that the acts required by law to be performed,—to wit, the making of an actual survey on the ground; the certification and approval of the same; and the delivery of possession,—had ever been performed; that the claim was barred under the act of Congress of May 26, 1824, entitled An Act Enabling the Claimants to Lands within the Limits of the State of Missouri and Territory of Arkansas to Institute Proceedings to Try the Validity of their Claims (4 Stat. at L. 52, chap. 173); and by the act of Congress known as the Hot Springs act of June 11, 1870 (16 Stat. at L. 149, chap. 126); that the claim, if originally valid, must be considered as having been abandoned; and that plaintiffs were estopped from claiming title to the land under the facts disclosed.

Messrs. John G. Carlisle and Logan Carlisle for plaintiffs in error.

Messrs. G. B. Rose and U. M. Rose for defendant in error.

Mr. Chief Justice Fuller delivered the opinion of the court:

*Writs of error may be sued out direct- [435] ly from this court to the circuit courts in cases, among others, in which the construction or application of the Constitution of the United States is involved, or in which the validity or construction of any treaty made under the authority of the United States is drawn in question. Act of March 3, 1891 (26 Stat. at L. 826, chap. 517, § 5). If this case does not fall within one or both of these classes, this writ of error cannot be maintained.

As ruled in Ansbro v. United States, 159 U. S. 695, 697 [40: 310], "a case may be said to involve the construction or application of the Constitution of the United States when a title, right, privilege, or immunity is claimed under that instrument, but a definite issue in respect of the possession of the right must be distinctly deducible from the record before the judgment of the court below can be revised on the ground of error in the disposal of such a claim by its decision." Cornell v. Green, 163 U. S. 75, 78 [41: 76, 77].

The same rule is applicable in respect of the validity or construction of a treaty. Some right, title, privilege, or immunity dependent on the treaty must be so set up or claimed as to require the circuit court to pass on the question of validity or construction in disposing of the right asserted. Borgmeyer v. Idler, 159 U. S. 408 [40: 199].

The general doctrine has been frequently announced in cases involving the jurisdiction of this court under the 25th section of the judiciary act of September 24, 1789 (§ 709 of the Revised Statutes); and acts relating to the revision of judgments of the supreme court and court of appeals of the District of Columbia and the supreme courts of the territories, as well as in cases involving the jurisdiction of the circuit courts. Baltimore & Potomac R. R. Co. v. Hopkins, 130 U. S. 210 [32: 908], and cases cited: United States v. Lynch, 137 U. S. 280 [34: 700]; South Carolina v. Seymour [United States, South Carolina, v. Seymour], 153 U. S. 353 [38: 742]; New Orleans v. Benjamin, 153 U. S. 411 [38: 764]; Linford v. Ellison, 155 U. S. 503 [39: 239]; Durham v. Seymour, 161 U. S. 235 [40: 682]; Hanford v. Davies, 163 U. S. 273 [41: 157]; Oxley Stave Company v. Butler County, 166 U. S. 648 [41: 1149].

The amended complaint stated that plaintiffs 436] would "rely upon *the following written evidences of their title for the maintenance of this action," and enumerated, among them, "the 3d article of the treaty between the United States of America and the French Republic of April 30, 1803, which was ratified on the 21st of October, 1803;" and "the 5th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States;" but nowhere was any right, title, privilege, or immunity asserted to be derived from either Constitution or treaty. There was nothing to indicate in what way, if any, the cause of action was claimed to arise from either.

The 5th Amendment prohibits the deprivation of property without due process of law, and the taking of private property for public use without compensation. The treaty of cession (Public Treaties, p. 232) provided for the protection of the inhabitants of the territory ceded in the enjoyment of their property. But neither amendment nor treaty gave what was not already possessed.

The jurisdiction of the circuit court was invoked on the ground of diverse citizenship, and not on the ground that the case arose "under the Constitution or laws of the United States or treaties made, or which shall be made, under their authority." Act of August 13, 1888, chap. 866, § 1 (25 Stat. at L. 433). And it is settled that in order to give the circuit court jurisdiction of a case as so arising, that it does so arise must appear from the plaintiff's own statement of his claim. Colorado Cent. Consol. Min. Co. v. Turck, 150 U. S. 138 [37: 1030]; Press Publishing Co. v. Monroe, 164 U. S. 105 [41: 367].

If this case had been taken to the circuit court of appeals, the decision of that court would have been final under the 6th section of the statute, and it might well be concluded that therefore the writ of error would not lie under the 5th section.

In respect of plaintiffs' case as stated in their complaint, the circuit court decided no question as to the application or construction of the Constitution or the validity or construction of the treaty.

The ground, among other grounds, in defeat of plaintiffs' action, that the claim was barred by the act of June 11, 1870, *was indeed [437 sustained, but that was as matter of construction, and the constitutionality of the act, if held to apply to the claim rather than to the amenability of the United States to suit, was not considered; nor does it appear that the judgment of the circuit court was invoked upon it. In this court it was contended for plaintiffs in error that the act was an enabling act authorizing suits to be brought against the United States which otherwise could not have been maintained; that the limitation operated on the jurisdiction and not on the right; and that to bar title if suit were not brought within ninety days was so unreasonable that the intention to do so could not be imputed to Congress. These forcible suggestions would undoubtedly have been accorded due weight by the circuit court of appeals, but we are unable to deal with them on this writ.

The circuit court also held that plaintiffs' title failed because of noncompliance with the Spanish law. It was not pretended that the treaty, the validity of which was confessedly not in dispute, could be so construed as to compel judicial recognition of unconsummated claims, and it was for the circuit court to determine into what category the alleged grant fell. In doing so, the construction of the treaty was not drawn in question in any manner.

Writ of error dismissed.

Submitted November 12, 1897. Decided December 6, 1897.

NO. 135 is an appeal from a decree of the District Court for the District of Oregon awarding to the libellant, George Dowsett, the amount due to him individually, and as assignee of one Tellefson for wages as seamen upon the tug Resolute, the only question being whether or not the District Court had jurisdiction. There was also a motion to dismiss. Jurisdiction of the District Court affirmed.

No. 136 is also a libel for wages of Henry E. Wilson and others, and involves the same questions as No. 135 and is disposed of in the same way.

See same cases below, 69 Fed. Rep. 742.

Statement by Mr. Justice Brown:

This was an appeal from the district court for the district of Oregon, awarding to the libellant, George Dowsett, the sum of $825.50 due to him individually, and the further sum of $358.02 due to him as the assignee of one Tellefson, for wages as seamen upon the tug Resolute. The tug was engaged in the business of towing vessels and barges on and over the bar between Yaquina bay and the Pacific ocean, and the waters tributary thereto, within the district of Oregon.

The libel, which was filed on April 26, 1894, was in the ordinary form of a libel for seamen's wages, except that it alleged that the vessel was at that time in the hands of a receiver of a circuit court for the state of Oregon. Upon application being made for a warrant for arrest, it was refused upon the ground that the tug was within the custody of a receiver of a state court. Subsequently, and on February 25, 1895, upon affidavit that the receiver had been discharged and the property sold, the order denying the warrant of arrest and directing that the libel remain in abeyance until the tug should be discharged from the custody of the state court, was vacated, and a warrant of arrest ordered to issue. The tug having been released upon bond given, the libel was thereupon amended by alleging that while the said services were being rendered the steam tug was in charge of a receiver appointed by the circuit court of the state of Oregon, and that she had since been sold to parties having notice of libellant's claim, and had been discharged from such receivership. Exceptions were thereupon filed to the libel upon the ground that it showed that when the services were rendered the steam tug was in charge of, and operated by, a receiver of the Oregon & Pacific Railroad Company, a corporation, the owner of said steam tug; and that no maritime or other lien had arisen by reason of such employment, or by the rendition of such services; and also that the court had no jurisdiction *in the premises. Upon a hearing [439 before the court, these exceptions were overruled, and leave given to answer the amended libel.

Claimants having elected not to answer the libel, their default was entered, and a final decree awarded in favor of the libellant in the amount claimed by him; whereupon the claimants prayed an appeal to this court; and the district court certified that "the only question arising upon said appeal is the question as to whether or not, under the facts stated in the amended libel and the exceptions thereto, this court acquired or had jurisdiction to pronounce the said decree."

Mr. Justice Brown delivered the opinion of the court:

The sole question presented by the record in this case is whether the court was correct in assuming jurisdiction of a libel for seamen's wages which accrued while the vessel was in the custody of a receiver appointed by a state court, upon the foreclosure of a mortgage upon the property of the Oregon & Pacific Railroad Company, owner of the tug.

Jurisdiction is the power to adjudicate a case upon the merits, and dispose of it as justice may require. As applied to a suit in rem for the breach of a maritime contract, it presupposes, first, that the contract sued upon is a maritime contract; and second, that the property proceeded against is within the lawful custody of the court. These are the only requirements necessary to give jurisdiction. Proper cognizance of the parties and subject-matter being conceded, all other matters belong to the merits.

*The contention of libellant is that, as a [440 maritime lien is the sole foundation of a proceeding in rem, such facts must be averred as to show that a lien arose in the particular case; or, at least, that if the libel shows that a lien could not have existed, it should be dismissed for want of jurisdiction. The averment relied upon in this libel is that the vessel was at the time the services were rendered in the hands of a receiver appointed by a state court. This fact, however, is not absolutely inconsistent with a lien in rem for seamen's wages. Pawson v. Cunningham [21 U. S. App. 466], 63 Fed. Rep. 132. It may have been expressly bargained for by the receiver, it may be implied from the peculiar circumstances under which the services were rendered, or it might be held to have arisen from the peremptory language of the statute (Rev. Stat. § 4535), that "no seaman shall, by any agreement other than is provided by this title, forfeit his lien upon the ship, or be deprived of any remedy for the recovery of his wages to which he would otherwise have been entitled; and every stipulation in any agreement inconsistent with any provision of this title . . . shall be wholly inoperative." Prima facie, the rendition of mariner's services imports a lien, and the mere fact that the vessel is navigated by a receiver does not necessarily negative such lien, although there may be facts in the particular case to show that the above statute does not apply, or that credit was expressly given to the owner, to the charterer, or to some third person. In fact, the question of lien or no lien is not one of jurisdiction, but of merits.

It is true that there can be no decree in rem against the vessel except for the enforcement of a lien given by the maritime law, or by a state law; but if the existence of such a lien were a question of jurisdiction, then nearly every question arising upon the merits could be made one of jurisdiction. Thus supplies furnished to a vessel import a lien only when they are sold upon her credit; and the defense ordinarily made to such claims is that they were sold upon the personal credit of the owner or charterer; but certainly it could not be claimed that this was a question of jurisdiction. The existence of a lien for collision depends upon the question of fault or no fault, 441]but it never was heard of that it thereby became a question of jurisdiction. Salvage services, too, ordinarily import a lien of the very highest rank; but it has sometimes been held that, if such services are rendered by seamen in the employ of a wrecking tug, or by a municipal fire department, no lien arises, for the reason that the men are originally employed for the very purpose of rescuing property from perils of the sea or loss by fire. In the case under consideration a portion of the libellant's claim arises by assignment from Tellefson, and the authorities are almost equally divided upon the question whether such assignment carries the lien of the assignor to his assignee. Obviously these are not jurisdictional questions.

In determining the question of a lien in the case under consideration much may depend upon the manner in which the vessels were sold by the receiver. Were they sold in bulk, and merely as a part of the entire property of the insolvent corporation, upon the foreclosure of the mortgage, or was each vessel sold separately, and subject to the liens for mariner's wages which accrued before and while they were in the possession of the receiver? Did the order direct these vessels to be sold free of maritime liens, or subject to them, or was it silent in this particular? Were the lienholders upon these vessels paid from the purchase money, according to their relative rank, as they would have been had the sale been conducted by a court of admiralty? If they were, that would amount to very strong, if not conclusive, evidence against the subsequent endeavor to enforce the liens in a court of admiralty. We cannot assume that the court would authorize its receiver to run these vessels without making some provision for a preferential payment of their current expenses. Meyer v. Western Car Co. [Myer v. Car Co.], 102 U. S. 1 [26: 59]; Kneeland v. American Loan & T. Co. 136 U. S. 89 [34: 379]. None of these were questions which went to the jurisdiction of the court to entertain the libels, but were such as would properly arise, either upon the exception to the libels, or upon an answer putting the facts in issue.

Had the vessel, at the time the warrant of arrest was served, been in the actual custody of the receiver, a different question *would [442 have been presented; but the facts of this case show that she had been sold, and had passed into the hands of her purchaser, and that the receiver had been discharged.

The case of Ex parte Gordon, 104 U. S. 515 [26: 814], goes even farther than is necessary to support the action of the district court in assuming jurisdiction of this case. In that case a writ of prohibition was sought to restrain the district court for the district of Maryland from proceeding against a vessel to recover damages for loss of life in a collision. It was held that as the case was one of a maritime tort, of which the district court unquestionably had jurisdiction, it was for that court to decide whether the vessel was liable for pecuniary damages resulting from the loss of life. "Having jurisdiction," said the chief justice, "in respect to the collision, it would seem necessarily to follow that the court had jurisdiction to hear and decide what liability the vessel had incurred thereby." The question was held not to be jurisdictional, but one properly arising upon the merits. See also Re The Charkieh, L. R. 8 Q. B. 97; Schunk v. Moline, M. & S. Co. 147 U. S. 500 [37: 255]; Smith v. McKay, 161 U. S. 355 [40: 731].

So, too, in Re Fassett, 142 U. S. 479 [35: 1087], the owner of the yacht Conqueror filed a libel for possession, against her and the collector for the port of New York, claiming delivery of the vessel to him and damages against the collector, who had seized her as a dutiable import. The collector applied to this court for a writ of prohibition, alleging that the district court had no jurisdiction of the suit. We held that the subject-matter of the libel was a marine tort; that the question whether the vessel was liable to duty was properly justiciable in the district court, and that that court had jurisdiction. Said Mr. Justice Blatchford, in delivering the opinion of the court (p. 484) [35: 1088]: "The district court has jurisdiction to determine the question, because it has jurisdiction of the vessel by attachment, and of Fassett by monition; and for this court to decide in the first instance, and in this proceeding, the question whether the yacht is an article imported from a foreign country and subject to duty under the customs-revenue laws, would be to decide that question as a matter of original jurisdiction, *and not of appellate jurisdiction, while,[443 as a question of original jurisdiction, it is duly pending before the district court of the United States, on pleadings which put that very question in issue." See also Ex parte Cooper, 143 U. S. 472 [36: 232].

The case of Wilson et al. v. The Resolute (No. 136) is also a libel for wages, and involves precisely the same questions as are involved in the case of Dowsett, and will be disposed of in the same way. Claimants have mistaken their remedy in these cases, and should have appealed to the circuit court of appeals.

The decrees of the District Court, in so far as they assume jurisdiction of these cases, are therefore affirmed.

Lien on vessel—jurisdiction of admiralty court.

1. The question of lien or no lien in a libel to enforce a lien on a ship is one of the merits, and not of jurisdiction.
2. The question whether the master of a vessel has proceeded within the time allowed by law for the enforcement of his claim of a lien on the vessel for his wages goes to the merits only, and does not affect the jurisdiction of the admiralty court of a libel for such wages.

Submitted November 12, 1897. Decided December 6, 1897.

ON APPEAL from a decree of the District Court of the United States for the District of Oregon awarding R. J. Young et al. certain amounts for services as seamen, the only question here for consideration being the jurisdiction of the District Court. The jurisdiction of the District Court affirmed.

See same case below, 69 Fed. Rep. 742.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. John W. Whalley and William T. Muir for appellants.

Messrs. L. B. Cox, W. W. Cotton, Thomas O'Day, and C. F. Lord for appellees.

Mr. Justice Brown delivered the opinion of the court:

These cases differ from those already disposed of (ante, 533) only in the fact that the libels contain claims by the masters of those vessels, with an averment that during the time they were employed there was an officer known as the purser; that the agents of the receiver and 444]the purser collected and received all *the earnings of the vessel from both passengers and freight, and paid over such earnings in the ordinary course of business to the receiver; that none of the earnings of the vessel passed through the hands of the masters, and that their sole duties consisted in navigating the steamers upon routes selected by the receiver within the state of Oregon, and that all the supplies and materials were purchased by the said receiver through other agents and servants. This allegation is evidently designed to raise the question whether the ancient doctrine enforced upon the court of admiralty by prohibition from Westminster Hall, that the master has no lien for his wages, and which was declared to be the law by this court in the case of The Orleans v. Phoebus, 36 U. S. 11 Pet. 175 [9: 667], has any application to modern methods, where a purser or other agent is employed by the owner to collect the freights and pay the bills of the vessel, the practice formerly being for the master to receive all the freight, pay the crew and buy the supplies. The denial of the lien of the master was based upon the theory that he had a lien upon the freight for his wages, and having the freight in his own hands was presumed to pay himself. The argument is made that, the reason for the rule having ceased to exist, the rule itself, which denied the master a lien upon the vessel, has become obsolete.

A lien was also claimed and admitted on behalf of the masters under a local statute of Oregon; but it was also insisted in defense thereto that the masters had not proceeded within the time allowed by law for the enforcement of such claim.

The latter question, at least, if not the former, did not affect the jurisdiction of the court, but went to the merits alone.

The decrees of the court below in these cases are also, in respect to jurisdiction, affirmed.

IN ERROR to the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia to review a judgment of that court affirming the judgment of the Supreme Court of that District in favor of the defendant upon a demurrer to the declaration, in an action brought by Thomas W. Stewart, administrator, etc., against the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company for damages for killing the plaintiff's intestate through the negligence of said railroad company in the state of Maryland. Reversed, and case remanded for a trial upon the merits.

See same case below, 6 App. D. C. 56.

Statement by Mr. Justice Brewer:

On October 22, 1894, plaintiff in error as plaintiff filed in the supreme court of the District of Columbia an amended declaration containing two counts. The first alleged that John Andrew Casey, plaintiff's intestate, was killed through the negligence of the defendant company, in the state of Maryland; that said intestate left surviving no parent or child but only his wife, Alice Triplett Casey, for whose benefit this action was brought. The second count set forth, in addition to the matters disclosed in the first, a statute of the state of Maryland in respect to recovery in such cases. A 446] demurrer *to this declaration was sustained and judgment entered for defendant. This was affirmed by the court of appeals of the District of Columbia, and from such judgment of affirmance plaintiff has brought the case here on error.

The statute in force in the District of Columbia (23 Stat. at L. 307, chap. 126), provides for recovery in case the act causing death is done within the limits of the District of Columbia; that "the person who or the corporation which would have been liable if death had not ensued shall be liable to an action for damages for such death, notwithstanding the death of the person injured;" that the recovery shall not exceed $10,000; that the action shall be brought in the name of the personal representative of the deceased, and within one year after his death; and that the damages recovered shall not be appropriated to the payment of the debts of the deceased, but inure to the benefit of his or her family, and be distributed according to the provisions of the statute of distributions. The Maryland statute which is copied in the declaration (Rev. Code Maryland 1878, p. 724), provides in the 1st section that whenever the death of a person shall be caused by the wrongful act, negligence, etc., of another, "the person who would have been liable if death had not ensued shall be liable to an action for damages." Sections 2 and 3 are as follows:

"Sec. 2. Every such action shall be for the benefit of the wife, husband, parent, and child of the person whose death shall have been so caused, and shall be brought by and in the name of the state of Maryland, for the use of the person entitled to damages, and in every such action the jury may give such damages as they may think proportioned to the injury resulting from such death to the parties respectively for whom and for whose benefit such action shall be brought, and the amount so recovered, after deducting the costs not recovered from the defendant, shall be divided amongst the above-mentioned parties, in such shares as the jury by their verdict shall find and direct: Provided, That not more than one action shall lie for and in respect of the same subject-matter of complaint; and that every such action shall be commenced *within[447 twelve calendar months after the death of the deceased person.

"Sec. 3. In every such action, the equitable plaintiff on the record shall be required, together with the declaration, to deliver to the defendant, or his attorney, a full particular of the persons for whom and on whose behalf such action shall be brought, and of the nature of the claim in respect of which damages shall be sought to be recovered."

Mr. Justice Brewer delivered the opinion of the court:

The court of appeals was of opinion that the action could not be maintained under the statute of the District of Columbia because that authorizes recovery only in case the injury causing death is done within the limits of the District, nor under the Maryland statute because of the peculiar form of remedy prescribed therein, citing in support of the latter contention Pollard v. Bailey, 87 U. S. 20 Wall. 520 [22: 376]. A statute of Alabama made stockholders of a bank individually liable for its debts, and according to the construction given to it by the supreme court of the state the remedy provided was a suit in equity, whereas in that case a single creditor had sued one of the stockholders in an action at law; and in denying the right to maintain such action this court observed, page 526 [22: 378]:

"The individual liability of stockholders in a corporation for the payment of its debts is always a creature of statute. At common law it does not exist. The statute which creates it may also declare the purposes of its creation, and provide for the manner of its enforcement. . . . The liability and the remedy were created by the same statute. This being so, the remedy provided is exclusive of all others. A general liability created by statute without a remedy may be enforced *by [448 an appropriate common-law action. But where the provision for the liability is coupled with a provision for a special remedy, that remedy, and that alone, must be employed."

To like effect was cited Fourth National Bank v. Francklyn, 120 U. S. 747 [30: 825]. The court of appeals was of opinion that the statute in Maryland not only created a statutory liability but prescribed a particular remedy, and that no action could be maintained, either in Maryland or elsewhere, unless that special remedy was pursued.

Notwithstanding the ability with which the arguments in support of this conclusion are presented in the opinion of the court of appeals, we are unable to concur therein. A negligent act causing death is in itself a tort, and, were it not for the rule founded on the maxim actio personalis moritur cum persona, damages therefor could have been recovered in an action at common law. The case differs in this important feature from those in which a penalty is imposed for an act in itself not wrongful, in which a purely statutory delict is created. The purpose of the several statutes passed in the states, in more or less conformity to what is known as Lord Campbell's act, is to provide the means for recovering the damages caused by that which is essentially and in its nature a tort. Such statutes are not penal, but remedial for the benefit of the persons injured by the death. An action to recover damages for a tort is not local but transitory, and can as a general rule be maintained wherever the wrongdoer can be found. Dennick v. Central Railroad Company, 103 U. S. 11 [26: 439]. It may well be that where a purely statutory right is created the special remedy provided by the statute for the enforcement of that right must be pursued, but where the statute simply takes away a common-law obstacle to a recovery for an admitted tort it would seem not unreasonable to hold that an action for that tort can be maintained in any state in which that common-law obstacle has been removed. At least it has been held by this court in repeated cases that an action for such a tort can be maintained "where the statute of the state in which the cause of action arose is not in substance inconsistent with the statutes or public [449]policy of the state in which the *right of action is sought to be enforced." Texas & Pacific Ry. Co. v. Cox, 145 U. S. 593, 605 [36: 829, 833]. See also Dennick v. Central Railroad Company, 103 U. S. 11 [26: 439]; Huntington v. Attrill, 146 U. S. 657 [36: 1123]; Northern Pacific R. R. Co. v. Babcock, 154 U. S. 190 [38: 958].

What are the differences between the two statutes? As heretofore noticed, the substantial purpose of these various statutes is to do away with the obstacle to a recovery caused by the death of the party injured. Both statutes in the case at bar disclose that purpose. By each the death of the party injured ceases to relieve the wrongdoer from liability for damages caused by the death, and this is its main purpose and effect. The two statutes differ as to the party in whose name the suit is to be brought. In Maryland the plaintiff is the state; in this District the personal representative of the deceased. But neither the state in the one case nor the personal representative in the other has any pecuniary interest in the recovery. Each is simply a nominal plaintiff. While in the District the nominal plaintiff is the personal representative of the deceased, the damages recovered do not become part of the assets of the estate, or liable for the debts of the deceased, but are distributed among certain of his heirs. By neither statute is there any thought of increasing the volume of the deceased's estate, but in each it is the award to certain prescribed heirs of the damages resulting to them from the taking away of their relative.

For purposes of jurisdiction in the Federal courts regard is had to the real rather than to the nominal party. Browne v. Strode, 9 U. S. 5 Cranch, 303 [3: 108]; M'Nutt v. Bland, 43 U. S. 2 How. 9 [11: 159]; State of Maryland, for Use of Markley, v. Baldwin, 112 U. S. 490, [28: 822]. See also Gaither v. Farmers' & Mechanics' Bank of Georgetown, 26 U. S. 1 Pet. 37, 42 [7: 48, 45], in which the issue submitted to the jury was, as stated, one between the bank to the use of Thomas Corcorran, plaintiff, and Gaither, the defendant, upon which the court said: "This practice is familiar with the Maryland courts, and when the action originates in that form, the cestui que use is regarded as the real party to the suit." It is true those were actions on contract, and this is an action for a tort, *but still in such an [450 action it is evident that the real party in interest is not the nominal plaintiff but the party for whose benefit the recovery is sought; and the courts of either jurisdiction will see that the damages awarded pass to such party.

Another difference is that by the Maryland statute the jury trying the cause apportion the damages awarded between the parties for whose benefit the action is brought, while by the statute of the District the distribution is made according to the ordinary laws of distribution of a decedent's estate. But by each the important matter is the award of damages, and the manner of distribution is a minor consideration. Besides, in determining the amount of the recovery the jury must necessarily consider the damages which each beneficiary has sustained by reason of the death. By neither statute is a fixed sum to be given as a penalty for the wrong, but in each the question is the amount of damages. It is true that the beneficiaries of such an action may not in every case be exactly the same under each statute, but the principal beneficiaries under each are the near relatives, those most likely to be dependent on the party killed, and the remote relatives can seldom, if ever, be regarded as suffering loss from the death.

We cannot think that these differences are sufficient to render the statute of Maryland in substance inconsistent with the statute or public policy of the District of Columbia, and so, within the rule heretofore announced in this court, it must be held that the plaintiff was entitled to maintain this action in the courts of the District for the benefit of the persons designated in the statute of Maryland. The judgment will be reversed, and the case remanded for a trial upon the merits.

Argued November 2, 3, 1897. Decided December 6, 1897.

APPEAL from a decree of the Supreme Court of the Territory of New Mexico affirming the decree of the District Court of that State in favor of the plaintiffs, Maxwell Land Grant Railway Company et al., against Guadalupe Thompson, administratrix, etc., et al., adjudging that the defendants have no interest in or title to the premises, and that the plaintiff's title be quieted to a tract of land known as the Maxwell Land Grant. Affirmed.

Statement by Mr. Justice Brewer:

The facts in this case are as follows: In 1841 the Republic of Mexico made a grant to Charles Beaubien and Guadalupe Miranda of a large tract of land, generally known of late as the Maxwell Land Grant; so known because Lucien B. Maxwell, having acquired title from Beaubien and Miranda or their heirs, was, or at least claimed to be, for many years the sole owner. In September, 1859, the heirs of Charles Bent, namely, Alfred Bent and his two sisters, Tere-[452] sina Scheurick *and Estefana Hicklin, brought a suit in the district court for the county of Taos in the territory of New Mexico, against Beaubien, Miranda, and Maxwell, claiming that under a parol contract their father, Charles Bent, was interested with Beaubien and Miranda in the ownership of the grant, and praying that such interest be established and decreed, and that it be also set off to them by partition. In June, 1865, upon the pleadings and proofs the court decreed to them an undivided fourth part of the grant, and appointed commissioners to make partition, giving specific directions for their guidance. Nothing was done under this decree. Soon thereafter negotiations were entered into between plaintiffs and Maxwell for a compromise of the litigation on the basis of Maxwell paying them a money consideration to relinquish their claim. It was agreed by the three plaintiffs that Alfred Bent and Aloys Scheurick, the husband of one of the sisters, should act in the matter as their agents to sell to Maxwell for the best price they could obtain, but never less than $21,000, or what Beaubien's heirs received. This compromise was advised and approved by their counsel. A conference was had in September or October, 1865, at Maxwell's residence, at which Alfred Bent demanded $21,000 and Maxwell offered $18,000. Alfred Bent returned from that conference to Taos, where the family resided, without having effected a definite agreement as to the price. The plaintiffs, however, considered the sale as good as made, but Alfred Bent advised his coplaintiffs that they could get a few thousands more by being quiet a few days, insisting, however, on having as much as the Beaubien heirs should receive. The plaintiffs expected to close the bargain in a few days, were ready to make the deeds as soon as the matter was settled, and the deeds were in fact written out by Scheurick, the husband of one of the plaintiffs. Before the compromise was consummated and on December 15, 1865, Alfred Bent died, leaving surviving him his widow, Guadalupe Bent, and three infant children, Charles, Julian, and Alberto Silas, aged respectively six, four, and one years. On April 12th his widow was appointed administratrix of his estate and qualified. Just before his death Alfred Bent made a will, by which *he gave and bequeathed to his wife, "for [453] the maintenance of her and my three children, Charles, William, and Silas Bent, all of my real and personal property." But this will was not presented until March, 1867, when it was approved and admitted to probate. Beaubien, one of the original grantees, had left six children surviving. Maxwell married one of them, and between April 4, 1864, and January 1, 1870, purchased the interests of the other five for a consideration of not more than $3,500 each. On April 9, 1866, the death of Alfred Bent was suggested, and his minor children and heirs, Charles, Julian, and Alberto Silas, were by order of the court substituted as complainants in place of their father. On April 12th the mother of these minors, Guadalupe Bent, was by the court appointed guardian ad litem and commissioner in chancery for such minors, with full power to execute deeds or carry into execution all sales or transfers made of their interest in and to the real estate described in the suit to Lucien B. Maxwell. A settlement with Maxwell was concluded by Aloys Scheurick, acting for his wife, his wife's sister and her husband, and the widow as guardian ad litem for the minor children of Alfred, which was acceptable to all the parties, by which Maxwell was to pay the sum of $18,000 for the conveyance of the interest of the Bent heirs. This compromise was advised by their leading counsel. In May the two sisters, by separate deeds, conveyed their interests to Maxwell, and during the same month Guadalupe Bent, as guardian ad litem and reciting the order of April 12, also executed to Maxwell a conveyance of the interest of the minors. Each of these conveyances purported to be for the sum of $6,000. At the next term of the court, about four months after the execution and delivery of these deeds, and on September 10, 1866, a further order or decree was entered, which reads as follows:

"Whereas an interlocutory decree was rendered at a former term of this court in the above cause, decreeing one fourth of the land mentioned in the petition herein to the complainants in this cause, and appointing commissioners to divide and set apart the portion so decreed, and whereas said interlocutory decree was never carried into effect, and whereas 454] since the time *of the rendition of said decree a mutual agreement has been made between the parties to this cause, settling and determining all the equities to the same:

"It is therefore hereby ordered, adjudged, and decreed by the mutual consent and agreement of the said complainants as well as of the said defendants in this cause, that the interlocutory decree above mentioned, together with all orders made under and by virtue of the same, be set aside; and by the mutual consent and agreement of the said parties, it is hereby further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the said Lucien B. Maxwell, one of the defendants in this cause, pay to the said complainants the sum of $18,000, to be divided among them per stirpes, that is, to the said Aloys Scheurick and Teresina Bent, his wife, one third part, and to Alexander Hicklin and Estefana Bent, his wife, another third part, and to Charles Bent, Julian Bent, and Alberto Silas Bent, the children and heirs of Alfred Bent, deceased, the remaining third part, to be equally divided among the said last named and to be paid into the hands of Guadalupe Bent, widow of the—Alfred Bent, deceased, and guardian ad litem for said children for the purposes of the said division.

"And upon the further consent and agreement of the said parties, it is hereby further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the said Alexander Hicklin and Estefana Bent, his wife, the said Aloys Scheurick and Teresina Bent, his wife, and the said Guadalupe Bent, guardian ad litem for Charles Bent, Julian Bent, and Alberto Silas Bent, children and minor heirs of the said Alfred Bent, deceased, within ten days from the day of the date of this decree, make, execute, and deliver to the said Lucien B. Maxwell good and sufficient deeds of conveyance of all their right, title, interest, estate, claim, and demand of, in, and to the lands in controversy in this cause; the said Guadalupe Bent, guardian ad litem as aforesaid, in the name of Charles Bent, Julian Bent, and Alberto Silas Bent, minor heirs as aforesaid, and the said Alexander Hicklin and Estefana Bent, his wife, and the said Aloys Scheurick and Teresina Bent, his wife, in their own names. And by further consent and agreement between the said parties, it is hereby further ordered, 455] adjudged, *and decreed that the costs of this suit shall be paid, each of the said parties to pay the separate costs in the same made by themselves."

In April, 1870, Maxwell, claiming to have the full title to the entire grant, conveyed all except a few acres to the Maxwell Land Grant & Railway Company. In August of that year Maxwell and the Maxwell Company filed a bill in the district court against the appellants Guadalupe Thompson and her husband (the former being the widow of Alfred Bent, who had since intermarried with George W. Thompson), and the three minor children of Alfred Bent, which, after reciting in a general way the history of the grant and the proceedings in the former suit, alleged that it was doubtful whether the order and decree of September, 1866, fully expressed the agreements of the parties, or fully canceled and discharged all claims that the infant heirs of Alfred Bent had in the land, and prayed that the defendants be adjudged to have no interest in or title to the premises, equitably or otherwise, and that the plaintiffs' title be quieted. Subsequently the bill was amended, and thereafter, the defendants having answered and proofs having been taken, a decree was entered sustaining the prayer of the bill and quieting the title of the plaintiffs in the premises. This decree was affirmed on appeal by the supreme court of the territory, but on further appeal to this court was reversed (95 U. S. 391 [24: 481]), and the case remanded to the territorial courts for further proceedings. Subsequent proceedings having been had therein a new decree was entered by the district court in favor of the plaintiffs, which on appeal to the supreme court of the territory was affirmed and from such decree of affirmance this appeal has been taken.

It is the settled law of this court, as of others, that whatever has been decided on one appeal or writ of error cannot be re-examined on a second appeal or writ of error brought in the same suit. The first decision has become the settled law of the case. Wayne County Supervisors v. Kennicott, 94 U. S. 498 [24: 260], and cases cited in the opinion; Clark v. Keith, 106 U. S. 464 [27: 302]; Chaffin v. Taylor, 116 U. S. 567 [29: 727]; Northern P. Railroad Company v. Ellis, 144 U. S. 458 [36: 504]; Great Western Telegraph Company v. Burnham, 162 U. S. 339, 343 [40: 991, 993].

Whenever a case comes from the highest court of a state for review, and by statute or settled practice in that state the opinion of the court is a part of the record, we are authorized to examine such opinion for the purpose of ascertaining the grounds of the judgment. New Orleans Water Works Co. v. Louisiana Sugar Refining Co. 125 U. S. 18 [31: 607]; Kreiger v. Shelby R. R. Co. 125 U. S. 39 [31: 675]; Egan v. Hart, 165 U. S. 188 [41: 680]. We take judicial notice of our own opinions, and although the judgment and the mandate express the decision of the court, yet we may properly examine the opinion in order to determine what matters were considered, upon what grounds the judgment was entered, and what has become settled for future disposition of the case.

We therefore turn to the former opinion and the mandate to see what was presented and decided. The ground upon which the reversal was ordered was that the hill as presented, especially after the amendment, was technically a hill of review, and as such could not be maintained for three reasons: First, because the decree sought to be reviewed was a consent decree; secondly, because the hill was filed on behalf of an assignee of the original defendant; and, thirdly, because it sought a modification of the decree upon a matter of fact not appearing upon the record, without alleging any newly discovered evidence unknown to the parties before that decree. The opinion by Mr. Justice Bradley gives a full history of the litigation, the substance of the 457]allegations in the bill of complaint, *and points out why, especially after the amendment, it must be regarded as a bill of review. The amendment put into the prayer these words: "That for the aforesaid errors of law, apparent on the face of the said decree of 10th September, 1866, the same may be reviewed and reversed in the points herein complained of." But after demonstrating that the bill as it stood must be deemed a bill of review, and not sustainable, the opinion proceeds:

"Nevertheless, the general purpose which it evidently had in view—the quieting of the title to the land in question—is one towards which a court of equity is always liberally disposed, as tending to promote the peace of society and the security of property. And if, instead of seeking to reverse the decree of September, 1866 (which, for like reasons of public policy, as applicable to the security of judgments that have passed into rem adjudicatam, is not allowable), the bill had sought to carry that decree more effectually into execution, it would have been free from legal objections, and equally conducive to the object in view."

And then, after quoting from Lord Redesdale, it adds:

"The bill in this case, as originally filed, before it was converted by amendment into a bill of review, and abating the allegations of error in the original decree, approximated to the character of such a bill as might have been sustained. The proofs show a case which, in our judgment, supports the conclusions of the decree, to the effect that the terms of compromise made by the adult parties to the suit (including the mother and guardian of the infant heirs of Alfred Bent) were advantageous to the said infants, and were so considered and accepted by the court in their behalf. But, so far as the present decree undertook to reverse and modify the decree of September, 1866, we think it is clearly erroneous. Still, although we feel obliged to reverse the present decree, we do not think that the bill should be absolutely dismissed. And, as the whole question between the parties has been fully litigated on the proofs, it would be unreasonable to require that these should be taken over again.

"Our conclusion is, that the present decree 458]must be reversed *with costs, and that the cause be remanded to the court below, with directions to allow the complainants to amend their bill as they shall be advised, and with liberty to the defendants to answer any new matter introduced therein; and that all the proofs in the cause shall stand as proofs upon any future hearing thereof, with liberty to either party to take additional proofs upon any new matter that may be put in issue by the amended pleadings."

The mandate contained an order in the language of the last paragraph.

Although the former decree was reversed on the ground that the hill as it stood was technically a bill of review and could not, under the circumstances, be maintained, obviously the decision went beyond the determination of this matter. The case was not remanded with instructions to dismiss the bill as one not maintainable. It was decided that there were allegations in the bill which, if certain matters were stricken out, would make it properly one to more effectually carry into execution the consent decree of September, 1866, to establish beyond further controversy the settlement then made, and to quiet the title of the plaintiffs. It was also perceived and decided that the proofs already taken made out a case which justified such relief, and that while the proofs did not establish one of the principal facts set forth in the original bill, to wit, that the settlement was simply carrying into effect a compromise concluded with Alfred Bent, the father of the minors, during his lifetime, they did establish that such settlement made by the mother and guardian was advantageous to the infants, and was so considered and accepted by the court in their behalf. Not only was there no dismissal of the bill, but beyond that the case was not opened for new proofs in respect to matters distinctly put in issue by the pleadings as they stood and in respect to which it was determined that the proofs already in were sufficient. The plaintiffs were authorized to amend their bill, as they should be advised, but obviously this contemplated such amendments as would make the bill one of the character and scope indicated in the opinion. The defendants were given leave to answer any *new matter that should he introduced [459 into the hill, thus impliedly excluding the right to make new answer to those matters which should not be changed. And further, while it was ordered that the proofs already taken should stand as proofs upon any future hearing, no leave was given to take further testimony upon the matters already in issue, but simply to make additional proofs upon any new matter that might be put in issue by the amended pleadings. Language could not be clearer to show that this court decided that certain matters then in issue were sufficiently and effectually determined hy the proofs already in, and did not throw open the case for additional proofs upon such matters. To now consider the case as reopened in its entirety and to inquire whether each and all of the matters in issue are or are not established by the proofs, including those taken subsequently to the prior decision, would be to practically treat the case as entirely new and ignore that which was considered and determined on the former hearing.

In the light of that decision it is not difficult to reach a conclusion upon the record as it now stands. When the case went back to the trial court the plaintiffs added no new matter to their bill. They made ten amendments, nine of which consisted simply in striking out certain paragraphs and sentences, and the tenth in transposing the position in the bill of one paragraph. There was, therefore, nothing new to which the defendants were called upon, or permitted by the decision, to make answer. The parts of the bill stricken out were such as tended to make it, according to the opinion of this court, technically a bill of review, and left it strictly such a bill as was approved of in that opinion. The defendants filed answers to the amended bill. These answers contained new matter. This new matter was substantially that the consent decree of September, 1866, was not made at the request or with the consent of the solicitor of the defendants or any of them, nor did the minors or anyone having authority to represent them ever authorize any solicitor to consent to any decree for the transfer or surrender of their rights; that the pretended agreement and proceedings were fraudu-460] lent as to *the minors, and involved an unjust, erroneous, and illegal sacrifice of their just and valid rights; that their interest in the grant alleged to have been sold, released, or surrendered for the sum of $6,000 was at that time worth not less than $100,000, and is now worth a much greater sum, and that the alleged settlement and compromise was not in any way beneficial or advantageous to the minors, or necessary for their support or maintenance. The record now brought before us contains none of the proofs taken and offered on the hearing, but only the findings of fact made by the court. This is in accordance with the procedure prescribed by statute for the review in this court of cases heard and determined in the territorial courts. It does appear, however, that after the return to the trial court of the mandate in this case, and on April 7, 1882, the children of Alfred Bent commenced an independent suit against the Maxwell Land Grant Company and all other parties supposed to have any interest in the grant, to establish their title to a one-twelfth part of the estate; that issues were made up in that case and proofs taken, and that by consent of counsel the proofs taken in that case were used as proofs in this. The findings of fact in the two cases are substantially similar. In that a decree was entered dismissing the bill, and it is now pending in this court, the next case on its docket, and submitted and argued with this. It may well be considered within the scope of the prior decision that as no new matter was introduced into the plaintiffs' bill the defendants were not warranted in setting up any new defenses, and that upon the issues as they stood after the amendments to the bill, striking out portions thereof and the proofs then taken, the only thing which the trial court ought to have done was to have entered a decree thereon quieting the plaintiffs' title in accordance with the views expressed by this court.

But passing that, and considering the case in the light of the issues as they stand upon the amended pleadings and the findings of fact made by the lower court, we are clearly of opinion that its decree in favor of the plaintiffs must be sustained. These findings show that in 461] the lifetime of Alfred *Bent the counsel of himself and his two sisters advised them to settle with Maxwell rather than take the award of the commissioners; that on a conference between Alfred Bent, acting for himself and his sisters, he demanded $21,000 as the consideration of such settlement, and that Maxwell offered $18,000, a difference of $3,000 or only $1,000 for each of the three parties plaintiff; and, while no definite agreement was then completed, the Bents considered the sale as good as made, prepared deeds for carrying such settlement into effect, and only waited on the advice of Alfred Bent that by delaying a few days they might get more money, he insisting that they should receive as much as the Beaubien heirs obtained. The findings also show that the amount which was finally accepted was larger proportionately than that which the Beaubien heirs received for their interests; so that while it may be technically true that no settlement was accomplished during the lifetime of Alfred Bent, it does appear that negotiations had proceeded so far that the Bent heirs considered one accomplished and prepared to carry it into effect. Scheurick and Hicklin, the husbands of Alfred Bent's two sisters, as well as the four husbands of the Beaubien heirs, who during these years sold and conveyed their interest to Maxwell for less sums proportionally than the Bent heirs received, were intelligent men, ranked among the best citizens of the community, and were considered men of wealth and influence, so the case is not one of an advantage taken of ignorance and inexperience. It further appears that the compromise as finally made was advised by the leading counsel for the Bent heirs; that the sisters, who were adults, with their husbands, executed deeds for the same amount and have never since questioned the propriety and validity of the settlement. The findings also show that "at and about the year 1866, and for several years thereafter, there was no demand for or sales of undivided interests in lands of the quantity, character, and location of those in question, such as to create any ascertainable market value thereof;" that the opinions of the witnesses examined in the present suit varied from 2½ cents to $1.25 per acre, and that it *is impossible to satis- [462 factorily ascertain or fix what was the value per acre of the grant at that time, the "value being largely speculative for the future." The court further expressly finds that the mother and guardian ad litem knew the character and scope of the instrument she was signing; knew that it was a settlement of the claims in favor of her children; was satisfied with the sum paid, and "that no fraud, imposition, or error has been shown to have entered into said transaction, or to have brought about said compromise decree."

That infants are bound by a consent decree is affirmed by the authorities, and this notwithstanding that it does not appear that a prior inquiry was made by the court as to whether it was for their benefit. In 1 Dan. Ch. Pl. & Pr. 163, it is said:

"Although the court does not usually, where infants are concerned, make a decree by consent, without an inquiry whether it is for their benefit, yet when once a decree has been pronounced without that previous step, it is considered as of the same authority as if such an inquiry had been directed, and a certificate thereupon made that it would be for their benefit; and in the same manner an order for maintenance, though usually made after an inquiry, if made without, would be equally binding." (In support of these propositions many authorities are cited in a note.) "An infant defendant is as much bound by a decree in equity as a person of full age; therefore, if there be an absolute decree made against a defendant who is under age, he will not be permitted to dispute it, unless upon the same grounds as an adult might have disputed it; such as fraud, collusion, or error."

In Walsh v. Walsh, 116 Mass. 377 [17 Am. Rep. 162], a decree had been entered as follows: "And the plaintiff and the defendants, . . . Thomas Keyes, . . . and also in his capacity of guardian ad litem of Bridget Walsh and William Walsh, consenting to the following decree; and this court being satisfied upon the representations of counsel that the decree is fit and proper to be made as against the said Bridget and William; it is thereupon ordered and adjudged and decreed," 463] etc. On *a bill of review filed by the minors this decree was challenged, among other reasons, on the ground that it appeared to have been made by consent of their guardian ad litem and upon the representations of counsel without proof. The court decided against the contention, and speaking in reference thereto, through Mr. Chief Justice Gray, said:

"An infant is ordinarily bound by acts done in good faith by his solicitor or counsel in the course of the suit, to the same extent as a person of full age. Tillotson v. Hargrave, 3 Madd. 494; Levy v. Levy, Id. 245. And a compromise, appearing to the court to be for the benefit of an infant, will be confirmed without a reference to a master; and, if sanctioned by the court, cannot be afterwards set aside except for fraud. Lippiat v. Holley, 1 Beav. 423; Brooke v. Lord Mostyn, 33 Beav. 457, and 2 De G. J. & S. 373.

"If the court does pronounce a decree against an infant by consent, and without inquiry whether it will be for his benefit, he is as much bound by the decree as if there had been a reference to a master and a report by him that it was for the benefit of the infant. Wall v. Bushby, 1 Bro. Ch. 484; 1 Dan. Ch. Pl. & Pr. 164. The case falls within the general rule, that a decree made by consent of counsel, without fraud or collusion, cannot be set aside by rehearing, appeal, or review. Webb v. Webb, 3 Swanst. 658; Harrison v. Rumsey, 2 Ves. Sr. 488; Bradish v. Gee, 1 Ambl. 229; S. C. 1 Kenyon, K. B. 73; Downing v. Cage, 1 Eq. Cas. Abr. 165; Toder v. Sansam, 1 Bro. P. C. 468; French v. Shotwell, 5 Johns. Ch. 555."

Ordinarily, indeed, a court before entering a consent decree will inquire whether the terms of it are for the interest of the infants. It ought in all such cases to make the inquiry, and because it is its duty so to do it will be presumed, in the absence of any showing to the contrary, that it has performed its duty. In this case, while the decree fails to recite the making of such an inquiry, there is nothing to indicate that it was not made; the circumstances tend strongly to show that it was in fact made, and the finding is that the conclusion reached by the chancellor as to the advisability of the settlement was a sound exercise of his discretion. It is true the *findings show that[464 this decree of September, 1866, was not made by the personal procurement, knowledge, or consent of said Scheurick or Guadalupe Bent, and the fact of the entry thereof was unknown to them for several years thereafter. They also show that there is no pleading, order, or proceeding of record disclosing whether or not any inquiry was made by the court; but it does appear that the parties plaintiff, including the infants, were represented by counsel; that the guardian ad litem as well as the other adult plaintiffs fully understood the settlement and assented to it; and it is not strange that, having executed conveyances, they left to counsel such further action as should be deemed necessary to perfect the transfer of title. Further, in April prior to this decree, not only was the suit revived in the name of the infant heirs of Charles Bent, but on motion of the solicitors for plaintiffs their mother was appointed guardian ad litem and commissioner in chancery, with full power to execute deeds and carry into execution all sales or transfers of their interest in the real estate described to the defendant Maxwell. The court was therefore early advised of the fact of a proposed settlement. The consent decree shows fully the terms of the settlement, and it certainly is not straining the presumption in favor of judicial action to assume that the court would not have permitted the entry of this decree, providing for a settlement whose terms were thus disclosed, without being satisfied that such settlement was for the interest of the minors who were under its charge.

Again, the copy of the order directing the appointment of the mother as guardian ad litem and giving her authority to make the conveyance was incorporated into the deed which she knowingly executed, so that any inspection of the deed would have disclosed the fact that proceedings were being taken in court looking to the accomplishment of this compromise and settlement. There was no concealment or secrecy in the matter. In this connection we are referred to this paragraph in the opinion of the supreme court of the territory, filed in the companion case to which we have heretofore referred:

"We do not enter into a discussion at large of the testimony *by which it is claimed [465 that the decree of September, 1866, is successfully impeached upon the ground of fraud, and while we are not prepared, in view of the testimony submitted since the decision in Thompson v. Maxwell [Thompson v. Maxwell Land-Grant Co.], 95 U. S. 400 [24: 485], to say that 'the proofs show a case which, in our judgment, supports the conclusions of the decree, to the effect that the terms of compromise made by the adult parties to the suit (including the mother and guardian of the infant heirs of Alfred Bent) were advantageous to the said infants and were so considered and accepted by the court in their behalf,' we do hold that the judgment of the court at that time in so considering and accepting said terms was shown to be a fair and reasonable exercise of the chancellor's discretion, and that no fraud, imposition, or error has been shown to have entered into said transaction or to have brought about said compromise decree."

It will be seen from this that while the supreme court of the territory, under the new proofs presented, was unable to express itself as strongly as this court had done, it did consider that the judgment of the chancellor in considering and accepting the terms of settlement was a fair and reasonable exercise of his discretion. In other words, that court seems to have been of the opinion that under the later testimony it could not be said that the settlement was in fact advantageous to the infants, but at the same time found that the chancellor not only made inquiry and considered it, but also exercised discretion in approving it; and that, certainly, is all that is necessary to uphold a decree of a court. It would be strange, indeed, if, when those authorized to represent minors, acting in good faith, make a settlement of claims in their behalf, and such settlement is submitted to the proper tribunal, and after examination by that tribunal is found to be advantageous to the minors and approved by a decree entered of record, such settlement and decree can thereafter be set aside and held for naught on the ground that subsequent disclosures and changed conditions make it obvious that the settlement was not in fact for the interests of the minors, and that it would have been better for them to have retained rather than compro-
466]mised their *claims. If such a rule ever comes to be recognized it will work injury rather than benefit to the interests of minors, for no one will make any settlement of such claims for fear that it may thereafter be repudiated. The best interests of minors require that things that are done in their behalf, honestly, fairly, upon proper investigation, and with the approval of the appropriate tribunal, shall be held as binding upon them as similar actions taken by adults.

Again, it is said that it appears from the findings that the guardian ad litem was a Mexican woman, and, at the time of the execution of the deed, ignorant of the English language, unfamiliar with business or with her duties as guardian, without knowledge of the boundaries or extent of the grant or of the character and value thereof; that Maxwell represented to Scheurick that the grant was not as large as it was supposed to be; that it did not extend into Colorado or beyond the Red river, whereas it did so extend over 200,000 acres; that Scheurick and the guardian ad litem believed and were influenced by said representations; that Maxwell, while generous and magnanimous in many respects, was unscrupulous and tyrannical as well, a resolute and determined man, of large wealth and great influence throughout the county of Taos and territory of New Mexico; that he made threats that unless the Bent heirs accepted $18,000 for their claims they would never get anything, and that such threats were communicated to the guardian ad litem, and that these matters influenced her in making the settlement and conveyance. But it also appears that it was not definitely known at the time where was the boundary line between Colorado and New Mexico; that the guardian ad litem acted in concert with the adult plaintiffs who were dealing with their own interests on the same terms, and that she was willing to make the same settlement they did. And when we take into consideration the character, the ability, and standing of the husbands of the other adult plaintiffs, the fact that their interests were alike, that they all acted together, that the settlement which was finally made was so nearly that which the father of these minors had proposed in his lifetime, the fact that no fraud, imposition, or error *entered into[467 the transaction or brought about the settlement, it is going too far to hold that the mere weakness and ignorance of the guardian ad litem, whose interests were looked after by her brother-in-law and counsel, or the strength and vigor of the opposing party, are sufficient to invalidate a decree otherwise not open to objection.

Again, it is urged that the whole of the consideration had not been paid by Maxwell at the time of the commencement of this suit. The findings are that, as to the payment, the testimony is conflicting. It seems that Maxwell gave notes for the amount to each of the three plaintiffs. The guardian ad litem testified that the note she received had been paid—so testifying because her second husband, Thompson, to whom she was married about thirteen months after the death of Alfred Bent, and to whom, at the time of the marriage, she delivered the note with everything else she had, told her it had been paid. Other witnesses testified that only a portion of it had been paid, and the court found that the weight of the evidence was that at the beginning of the suit a considerable sum was still unpaid, but how much could not be ascertained. Maxwell was at all times a man of ample financial responsibility. No part of the proceeds of the note was paid directly to the minors or their mother, but Thompson, her second husband, supported, maintained and educated the minors during their minority with the funds of his wife and himself the same as his own children, keeping no separate account. The sum and substance of all this is, that each of the three separate plaintiffs took notes for the money Maxwell was to pay in settlement. Whether these notes drew interest or not is not disclosed, but Maxwell was a man of large financial ability, from whom the notes could have been collected at any time if the parties desired, and if either of them permitted the note to remain uncollected it must be assumed that it was for some good reason, possibly for the sake of the interest which the note drew. There is no finding that the note to the guardian ad litem had not long since been paid, but simply that it had not been fully paid at the time this suit was commenced, to wit, in 1870. If what was paid was not paid to *the guardian ad litem it was because[468 she had turned the note, as well as all other papers she had, over to her second husband. Whatever may be said as to the carelessness or the irregularity of these proceedings it cannot be doubted that substantially the proceeds of the note went to the benefit of the children, for they were supported and educated by the second husband the same as his own children. In this connection also it is well to notice the fact that, according to the inventory filed by the widow of Alfred Bent as administratrix, outside of the real estate and the note received from Maxwell, the total assets of the estate were $1,408. The claims admitted and allowed in the probate court amounted to $2,423; and while certain witnesses familiar with his affairs testified that he had both real and personal property other than that in the inventory, both in New Mexico and Colorado, it does not appear what amount, if any, there was of such property. It would seem from this that the interests of the minors required the settlement of this claim against Maxwell, in order to secure funds for their maintenance and education, for the whole personal estate of their father, as shown by the inventory, was not sufficient to pay the claims allowed.

These are all the matters which are called to our attention as tending to impugn the validity of this consent decree, and even if we were at liberty under the terms of the prior decision to consider all these new matters we are of opinion that there is not enough in them, singly or together, to justify us in disturbing the settlement which was made and the decree which was entered.

In determining the validity of this transaction it must be remembered that the petition filed in the original case brought by Alfred Bent and his sisters disclosed that the interest which their father claimed in the grant arose out of a parol agreement, and so it is not strange that after a decree had been rendered in their favor their counsel advised a settlement and the receipt of money rather than take the chances of further review in an appellate court; that Alfred Bent, the father of these minors, with his sisters, entered upon negotiations looking to a settlement of their claims and that although there was a difference 469]*of $3,000 between what was demanded and what Maxwell offered, they considered the question as settled, and prepared deeds for the purpose of making conveyances of their interests, and that the delay in fully consummating this settlement was owing to the hope of getting a little more money; that only the accidental death of Alfred Bent prevented the consummation of that settlement, a settlement by adults, and one which would never have afforded any excuse for further litigation, as is shown by the acceptance on the part of the two sisters of the settlement in their favor; that while the guardian ad litem was an ignorant and inexperienced woman, her interests were looked after by her brother-in-law, who was a capable business man, and by counsel learned in the law; and, while there may have been some irregularities in the proceedings, yet it is affirmatively found that there was no fraud, imposition, or error in the transaction or the decree. Surely under those circumstances the decree ought not to be disturbed.

But there is another aspect in which the equities of this case may fairly be considered. The will of Alfred Bent gave the entire estate to his widow—gave it, it is true, for the maintenance of herself and her children, but nevertheless passed the title to her; and though the will had not been probated at the time of this settlement, it was soon thereafter, and, of course, became operative as and from the date of his death, so that at the time of the settlement the title to this property was in her. The owner by his will gave this property to his widow, and by such will trusted to her to make such disposition of it as she should deem best, relying upon her to use the proceeds for her own maintenance and that of her children. He had a right to make such a disposition of the property and intrust it absolutely to her, and that in respect to this property it was not an unwise disposition is evident, for although he must have known of her inexperience in matters of business, he also knew that her interests were identical with those of his sisters, and that their common interests would be cared for by those competent to look after such affairs. If the settlement made by the sisters, as adults, *is beyond challenge, should not[470 that made by the widow, also an adult, be upheld, and for the same reasons? The question, under those circumstances, would be not whether she was guilty of any wrongful use of the funds which she received, but whether she, as the holder of the title, was fraudulently led into the settlement. It is, of course, not necessary to rest this case upon such suggestions, but they are certainly worthy of consideration in determining its equities.

In conclusion, it may not be inappropriate to call attention to some things which are matters of public history, and which are referred to at some length in the Maxwell Land-Grant Case, 121 U. S. 325 [30: 949]. The Mexican colonization law limited the amount of a grant to a single individual to 11 square leagues, and it was claimed that all grants like these in which outboundaries were named were to be taken as simply grants of 11 square leagues per individual, to be laid off within such outboundaries. As there were in this case two grantees, Beaubien and Miranda, it was according to the claim a grant by the Mexican authorities of only 22 square leagues or 97,424$\frac{8}{10}$ acres; that while this, with other grants, was, on June 21, 1860, confirmed by act of Congress (12 Stat. at L. 71, chap. 167), the claim was still made that the confirmation was operative only for the 22 square leagues; that some of the Secretaries of the Interior of the United States refused to issue patents in such cases for any more than 11 square leagues per individual grantee, and not until the case of Tameling v. United States Freehold & E. Company, 93 U. S. 644 [23:998], decided in 1876, was it settled that such an act of confirmation was equivalent to a grant de novo, and included all the lands within the outboundaries. Indeed, in the opinion in the Maxwell Land-Grant Case, supra, decided in 1887, it is intimated that the Tameling Case was not conclusive upon the question, because that was an action in ejectment in which the legal title shown by the patent prevailed, and not until the case then being considered, in which was a direct attack by the United States upon a patent, could it be held that there was a final adjudication of the question. So that while the owners of the land grant were claiming as against the government the whole area*within the outboundaries[471 it was still an unsettled question whether they would finally succeed in obtaining more than the 22 square leagues. Was it not a wise settlement for parties, whose claim to an interest in what might be found to be less than 100,000 acres rested simply on a parol agreement therefor, to obtain for that interest a sum which was more than half what the best government land could be purchased for? We think it can be well said, in the language of the supreme court of New Mexico, "that the judgment of the court at that time in so considering and accepting said terms was shown to be a fair and reasonable exercise of the chancellor's discretion."

Specific performance of contract, when refused.

A contract between two persons for mutual cooperation in securing a franchise for a street railway, and the equal division of what may be realized from the enterprise, will not be enforced in equity by decreeing that one of the persons who has been excluded by the other from the benefit of the franchise, which was granted to the latter by the city with knowledge of all the facts, shall have a one-half interest in the franchise, property, and stock of the corporation to which the franchise was granted, but he will be left to his remedy at law.

Submitted October 18, 1897. Decided December 6, 1897.

ON WRIT OF CERTIORARI to the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit to review a decree of that court affirming the decree of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Virginia, dismissing a suit in equity brought by L. H. Hyer, plaintiff, against the Richmond Traction Company et al., defendants, to procure a decree that the plaintiff is the owner of one-half interest in the Traction Company's franchise, property, and stock, and to secure to him the possession and enjoyment of the same. Case remanded to the Circuit Court with directions to modify the decree so as to make it one dismissing the suit without prejudice to an action at law.

Statement by Mr. Justice Brewer:

On October 30, 1895, appellant, as plaintiff, filed his bill against the defendants in the circuit court of the United States for the eastern district of Virginia. After some changes, he, on April 18, 1896, filed an amended and supplemental bill. The sufficiency of this was challenged by demurrer. The demurrer was sustained, and on August 22 a decree was entered dismissing the bill. From that decree the plaintiff appealed to the court of appeals, which court, on May 14, 1897, ordered that the decree of the circuit court be affirmed, without prejudice. Whereupon the case was removed to this court by certiorari.

It appears from the allegations in the amended and supplemental bill that the plaintiff, whose attention had been for some time devoted to the matter of street railways in the city of Richmond, Virginia, succeeded in obtaining from the city council a franchise for the construction and operation of a street railway *on Broad street, in that city. An[473 ordinance, passed on June 17, granted the franchise to the plaintiff and his associates under the name and style of the Richmond Conduit Company. The terms of this ordinance differed in some respects from those of the one prepared by the plaintiff who declined to accept it or to proceed under it in the form in which it had passed the council. But upon an open conference with the committee on streets of the city council plaintiff was assured that changes would be made rendering the franchise acceptable to him, provided he would deposit in one of the banks of the city of Richmond the sum of $10,000, upon certain conditions embodied in a paper prepared by the city attorney. On July 17 he caused the deposit to be made, and gave satisfactory guaranties of the good faith of himself and associates, and of their purpose to construct the railway, which guaranties, as he was assured, would secure the modification of the grant in accordance with his suggestions. While in Richmond, and conferring with the various committees of the city council with regard to this franchise, he became aware that certain other parties were seeking to secure a grant of a like franchise to them, under the name and style of the Richmond Traction Company, and that the defendant, P. B. Shield, was apparently the head of this movement, but he had not been successful in obtaining the passage of any ordinance by the city council. In the early part of August, 1895, the plaintiff went to the city of New York, to make arrangements for constructing the railway as soon as the amendments had been made to the ordinance. While there he was in the banking house of Stewart & Co., who had been advising with him with a view of aiding him financially in the prosecution of his enterprise, and there ascertained that the defendant Shield was also in conference with the said firm of Stewart & Co., seeking aid in the prosecution of his Richmond Traction Company scheme. Stewart & Co. advised the consolidation of the two interests, to wit, the interest of plaintiff and his associates in the conduit company with that of Shield and his associates in the traction company. After some conferences a contract was entered into between plaintiff and Shield, 474] which took the *form of a joint letter to the banker, of which the following is a copy:

New York, August 9, 1895.

S. H. G. Stewart, Esq., 40 Wall street, City.

Dear Sir: We, the undersigned, L. H. Hyer, of Washington, District of Columbia, and Phil. B. Shield, of Richmond, Virginia, have this day entered into the following agreement: That both of us being interested in the procuring of a franchise for and the construction of a street railway on Broad street, in the city of Richmond, Virginia, with collateral lines, have made the following agreement: That we hereby bind ourselves, in our own behalf and for our associates, mutually to co-operate one with the other in securing a franchise for said railway and to divide equally between us and our associates whatever may be realized from the enterprise, first deducting from said amount whatever actual expenses may have been incurred by either side, such expenses to be paid out of the first money realized from said enterprise.

It is further agreed between us that the deposit already made with the State Bank of Richmond, at Richmond, Virginia, by Mr. L. H. Hyer or his associates, is to stand and remain intact as it now is for the purpose of securing the franchise aforesaid, subject to any conditions for the withdrawal thereof made by Mr. Hyer with the depositor after the 17th day of August, 1895; and further, it is agreed that the application and franchise to be presented to the common council of the city of Richmond shall be that of the Richmond Traction Company, for the building of an overhead trolley railway or cable system.

Among ourselves we will decide what names are proper to be used in the franchise and the policy we will use in procuring the same.

Yours very respectfully,

(Signed) L. H. Hyer.
(Signed) Phil. B. Shield.

Plaintiff was authorized to act for himself and associates, and the defendant Shield repre- 475]sented that he had a power of *attorney from all parties interested in the traction company scheme, and he did actually represent them.

It was agreed between the parties to this contract that a full statement and explanation of the action of the two companies should be made to the city authorities of Richmond, and in fact it was so made. Plaintiff fully performed all the promises and covenants entered into in said contract in behalf of himself and his associates, but being detained by a serious illness was unable to proceed immediately to Richmond, and trusted to the defendant Shield and his associates to carry out other terms of the contract and secure the franchise for the mutual benefit of both interests. Disregarding this contract, Shield and his associates secured the passage of an ordinance granting the franchise to them, and wholly ignoring plaintiff and his associates. The first section of this ordinance provides: "That the Richmond Traction Company, composed of John W. Middendorf, John L. Williams, Everett Waddey, Reuben Sherreffs, Philip B. Shield, Charles T. Child and W. F. Jenkins, be, and the same is hereby, permitted to construct and operate a street railway within the limits of the city, along the following routes, under and subject to the conditions and provisions hereinafter set forth: A double track in Broad street," etc. Subsequent sections cast various obligations upon the company in respect to the construction and operation of the railway, the use by other companies of the tracks, and the payment of a certain per cent of the gross receipts into the treasury of the city. The last section is as follows:

"Fourteenth. Said Richmond Traction Company, and all such persons as now compose said company, or who may hereafter unite with them, are, in virtue of the authority vested in the common council of Richmond pursuant to the act of the general assembly of Virginia, passed March 20, 1860, entitled 'An Act to Authorize the Common Council of Richmond to Authorize Persons to Construct Railroads in the Streets of Said *City,' declar- [476 ed to be a corporation, and are vested with all the rights and privileges conferred, or intended to be conferred, by said acts on persons or companies authorized by said council of the city of Richmond to construct railroads in the streets of said city, and are likewise bound by all the restrictions of said act."

All the parties named in the first section of this ordinance were duly notified of the claims of plaintiff and his associates under the contract of August 9, notwithstanding which they ignored plaintiff and his associates and proceeded to organize a corporation, taking all the stock to themselves, paying nothing therefor, but receiving certificates purporting to be of fully paid stock. Plaintiff, after alleging that he is the holder of all the interests represented by himself and his associates, prayed that he be decreed the owner of one-half interest in the traction company's franchise, property, and stock, and specifically for certain orders to secure to him the possession and enjoyment of such interest.

Mr. Justice Brewer delivered the opinion of the court:

Two questions arise in this case: First, whether the contract sued on is, under the facts and circumstances disclosed in the bill, void as against public policy; and, if not, whether the case presented is one which calls for the interposition of a court of equity, or should be determined in a court of law.

In respect to the first question, it will be borne in mind that upon a demurrer, whatever the facts in the case may really be, we must take them to be as stated in the bill. So, in determining the question of the validity of this contract it must be assumed that there was no concealment; that everything was open and public, and nothing withheld from the knowledge of the city council, or any parties interested in the matter. The case thus presented is: Two parties apply separately to a city council for a franchise to construct a street railway. The banker from whom each of the parties is [477] seeking *financial assistance advises them to unite and make a single application. They do so, and thereafter the city council, aware of both interests, of the two applications, of the advice to consolidate and the party by whom it is given, and of all the terms of the consolidation, grants the franchise to only one of the parties. Was the agreement to unite in one application against public policy and void?

In the view we have taken of the second of these questions it is unnecessary to definitely determine the answer which should be given to the first, though it may not be inappropriate to observe that the vice which is so frequently detected in contracts and agreements of a similar nature lies in the fact of secrecy, concealment, and deception; the one applicant, though apparently antagonizing the other, is really supporting the latter's application, and the public authorities are misled by statements and representations coming from a supposed adverse but in fact friendly source. It would scarcely be doubted that two or more parties may properly unite in a partnership or corporation and thus unitedly make, in the name of the partnership or corporation, a single application for a grant or franchise; and, if they may so unite before any application, it is not easy to see why they may not so unite after having once made separate applications, providing all the facts and circumstances are fully disclosed and the public and the public authorities act upon full knowledge; and if they may sometimes so unite, an agreement for uniting is not necessarily void. As said by the New York court of appeals in Atcheson v. Mallon, 43 N. Y. 147, 151 [3 Am. Rep. 678]: "A joint proposal, the result of honest co-operation, though it might prevent the rivalry of the parties and thus lessen competition, is not an act forbidden by public policy. Joint adventures are allowed. They are public and avowed, and not secret. The risk, as well as the profit, is joint and openly assumed. The public may obtain at least the benefit of the joint responsibility, and of the joint ability to do the service. The public agents know, then, all that there is in the transaction, and can more justly estimate the motives of the bidders [478] and weigh the merits of the bid." *See also Smith v. Greenlee, 2 Dev. L. 126 [38 Am. Dec. 639]; Phippen v. Stickney, 3 Met. 384; Greenhood, Public Policy, p. 190, rule 177.

It may be noticed that there is nothing in the agreement reduced to writing, or as interpreted by the facts stated, which tends to show any thought or purpose of using corrupt or improper influences to secure the action of the city council. So that, upon the record as it stands, the question is, narrowly, whether any agreement to unite between parties who have applied, or contemplate application, for a franchise is, under all circumstances, necessarily void as against public policy.

The case is also easily distinguishable from those of contracts merely to abstain from bidding. An agreement not to bid tends to diminish the number of bidders and thus prima facie to lessen the probable profitableness of the sale or contract. Yet, even in cases of public sales, the rule laid down by this court is that agreements to unite in a bidding are not per se void. Some other element than the mere fact of union must exist before the agreement is to be condemned. Kearney v. Taylor, 56 U. S. 15 How. 494 [14: 787]. In that case, at a public sale a portion of a farm was purchased by a company, organized pending the sale and making the purchase with the view of laying out and establishing a town thereon. After discussing the question of competition, and the reasons which had led courts to frequently denounce such combinations for the purpose of bidding, the opinion adds (p. 520 [14: 797]):

"These observations are sufficient to show that the doctrine which would prohibit associations of individuals to bid at the legal public sales of property, as preventing competition, however specious in theory, is too narrow and limited for the practical business of life, and would oftentimes lead inevitably to the evil consequences it was intended to avoid. Instead of encouraging competition, it would destroy it. And sales, in many instances, could be effected only after a sacrifice of the value, until reduced within the reach of the means of the individual bidders. We must therefore look beyond the mere fact of an association *of persons formed for the pur- [479] pose of bidding at this sale, as it may be not only unobjectionable, but oftentimes meritorious, if not necessary, and examine into the object and purposes of it; and if, upon such examination, it is found that the object and purpose are, not to prevent competition, but to enable, or as an inducement to the persons composing it to participate in, the biddings, the sale should be upheld; otherwise if for the purpose of shutting out competition and depressing the sale so as to obtain the property at a sacrifice. Each case must depend upon its own circumstances; the courts are quite competent to inquire into them, and to ascertain and determine the true character of each."

The observations thus made show that every case must be determined upon its peculiar facts and circumstances, and the courts, before condemning an agreement to unite in a bid, must see that the agreement is such as really destroys the value of competitive bidding; and these observations, it must be noticed, were made in respect to a case in which a public sale had been ordered. The sale was therefore something which must take place, and the question of making a sale was not discretionary with the sheriff or other officer charged with the duty of making the sale. But here the city of Richmond was not bound to grant any franchise. It was free to determine whether it would grant or not, and, if it did, what form of street transportation should be adopted, and might also well consider the character, the financial ability, and the situation of the various applicants in determining to whom it would be best for the public interests to grant such a franchise.

Where the grantor or vendor has not determined the question of grant or sale, and it is still a matter of discretion whether a grant or sale shall be made, it would seem that there were less cogent reasons for denouncing a combination or agreement of parties with a view of making a proposal. Morrison v. Darling, 47 Vt. 67, 72. In that case it appeared that two parties each contemplated purchasing property belonging to a third. One of the two promised the other a certain sum if he would not 480]interfere with him*in obtaining the property and would assist him in making the purchase. It was held that the agreement was valid. The court, after referring to the rule pertaining to the cases of public sales, said: "But in this case, the owner of the share of the estate was under no obligation to sell to anyone, and there was no stipulation to resort to any illegal or improper means to mislead the owner, or to induce a sale by any fraud or artifice. We do not think such contract can be held void as against public policy."

But, as observed, every case must depend upon its own circumstances, and it may be that when the facts in this case are disclosed by the testimony they will be found to differ materially from those stated in the bill. Inasmuch as we are of the opinion that, even if the contract be valid, the plaintiff's remedy is in a court of law rather than in a court of equity, it is not wise to attempt to definitely determine whether, under the circumstances stated, this contract was or was not void as against public policy, for such determination might prove to be, in the final result, the mere answer to a moot question. It will be more satisfactory to pass upon the question when the surrounding facts are fully developed by testimony

We pass, therefore, to the second question, which is: Assuming this contract to be valid, was the plaintiff's remedy in equity or at law? According to the allegations, the city council was aware of the two parties, of their agreement to unite in one application, of all the facts surrounding the agreement and proposed union, and with such knowledge it granted this public franchise to one party alone. In the exercise of its judgment in respect to the public interests, the city council determined that it was better that the defendants should have this franchise than that the united parties should have it. In the face of this determination by the authorities having special charge of the public interests, and ignorant as we must be of the reasons which controlled the city council in making this award to the one singly rather than to the two jointly, it would be improper for a court of equity to compel a consolidation of those interests. For reasons which must be held to be sufficient 481]*and controlling, the city council deemed it not wise to grant this franchise to the two, but gave it to the one. Shall the courts overrule this determination, and intrust the franchise to the two rather than to the one? They have no general supervision over the judgment and action of public authorities. The city holds its grantee responsible for the proper discharge of the duties imposed by its grant of the franchise. It may well have determined that it did not desire the plaintiff to have any interest in it, or anything to do with the management of the street railway, and that the best interests of the city would be subserved by committing it, primarily at least, to the defendants alone. Shall the courts say that such determination was erroneous, or may be overruled simply because of a private contract between two parties? It must be remembered that according to the allegations the city council knew of the union of interests, and yet declined to recognize such union. It may be said that by authorizing these defendants to incorporate, it put it in their power to let the plaintiff and his associates or anyone else into the enterprise. Of course, the city council knew that the franchise when granted could be alienated by the grantees, and yet notwithstanding this possible alienation the fact remains that the city council determined that the primary parties to receive the franchise—the ones upon whom the burden of the contract should be laid—were the defendants alone, and not in conjunction with the plaintiff or his associates.

It is obvious that if two interests, which it may be believed are now not in harmony, if not decidedly antagonistic, are let into equal control of a franchise such as this, the public interests may suffer. Harmony in management is no inconsiderable factor in securing the best possible results, and if the parties in interest are of two minds as to how the railway shall be managed, what improvements shall be made, and, in general, what shall be done in connection therewith, it is not difficult to perceive that their antagonism may prevent that efficiency which will tend to make the street railway of the greatest advantage to the public.

This conclusion, while not interfering with the right of the *plaintiff to maintain his[482 action at law for the damages resulting from the defendants' breach of contract, at the same time preserves the city's control over the franchise, and upholds its determination as to the party or parties to whom it is willing to intrust such franchise.

But beyond these relations of the public to the enterprise, courts are not often wont to compel parties to unite interests and work together. And here it may be well to notice that the contract was not one in terms for a partnership in the management of the railway but only one for a division of the profits. The parties stipulated to co-operate in securing the franchise and to divide equally the profits, but left the question of control and management unsettled. The application, it is true, was to be in the name of the Richmond Traction Company, but who should compose that company was, according to the last clause of the contract, to be subsequently determined. It may, however, be conceded that there is an implication of joint ownership as well as of joint interest in the management, and in the profits arising therefrom, and thus it may be said that the contract was really one for a partnership. It is seldom that a court of equity will decree that a partnership which has been agreed upon shall be carried into effect. More frequently is it called upon to release parties from partnership agreements on the ground that their antagonism prevents the fulfilment of the purposes of the partnership, and it would seem like a contradiction to force antagonistic parties to form a partnership when it is one of the recognized rules of equity that such antagonism is ground for dissolving a partnership already existing. It is true that the ordinance contemplates the formation of a corporation, and courts will sometimes decree the specific performance of a contract for the transfer of stock. But the ordinance was passed after the contract, and, as we have seen, the most that can be said of the contract is that it contemplated the creation of a partnership. The fact that thereafter the city council deemed it best to provide by ordinance that the grantees of the franchise should incorporate does not change the scope of the contract It is precisely the same that it 483] would have been if the *council had granted the franchise to Shield personally, and authorized him as an individual to construct and operate the railway. How, then, can it be said that this contract is to be deemed one for the transfer of shares of stock in a corporation? No corporation then existed. The Richmond Traction Company, in whose name the application was to be made, was not then a corporation and became one only on the passage of the ordinance. There was no certainty that one would ever be formed; there was no agreement that one should be formed, and the rights of the parties must be determined by the facts as they were at the time of the contract and the terms which entered into it. But even if it be considered as a contract specifically for the transfer of stock, what is the rule in respect to actions in case of a breach thereof? If stock has a recognized market value, courts will ordinarily leave the parties to their action at law for damages for breach of the agreement to sell, but in cases where the stock has no recognized market value, is not purchasable in the market, or has a value which is not settled but contingent upon the future workings of the corporation, equity will sometimes decree specific performance of a contract of purchase. It is in reliance upon this that plaintiff claims the right to a decree for specific performance. The enterprise, he says, is a new one; it is difficult to put a fair pecuniary value on the stock or on the franchise. It is one of those things contingent largely on the successful working of the railway. It must be conceded that there is force in the contention that only by letting the plaintiff into the possession of the interest he claims can adequate compensation be secured. At the same time the present value of the franchise and therefore of the stock of the corporation owning the franchise is not wholly beyond estimate. That which it may have three or four years hence may depend largely upon the matter of management. But it is a franchise which has definite possibilities. The miles of track covered by it, the population adjacent to the line, and, therefore the number of people likely to avail themselves of its advantages, the cost of construction and of operation, are all well-known facts, and upon such known facts it is not impossible for 484] *a jury to form a fair estimate of the value of the franchise, and, therefore, of the damage which the plaintiff has sustained by the repudiation of the contract to give him a half interest in it.

The authorities generally support these views. In Pomeroy's Specific Performance of Contracts, § 290, the author, citing several cases, says: "It is well settled as a general rule, that an agreement to enter into a partnership which would be literally performed by executing the partnership articles, or to carry on a partnership already established, will not be specifically enforced."

In Hill v. Palmer, 56 Wis. 123, 129 [43 Am. Rep. 703], the court observes:

"It is also well settled that the wrongful refusal by a party to a contract of copartnership to permit the firm to commence business, or, as it is sometimes termed, to launch the partnership business, is ground for an action at law by the injured partner to recover damages of the partner whose wrongful act has defeated the purposes for which the copartnership was formed. The cases which so hold, both in England and in this country, are very numerous. Indeed, the authorities seem to be quite uniform in so holding. The following are a few of the cases referred to: Venning v. Leckie, 13 East, 7; Gale v. Leckie, 2 Stark. 107; Wadsworth v. Manning, 4 Md. 59; Glover v. Tuck, 24 Wend. 153; Bagley v. Smith, 10 N. Y. 489 [61 Am. Dec. 756]; Terrill v. Richards, 1 Nott & M'C. 20; Ellison v. Chapman, 7 Blackf. 224; Williams v. Henshaw, 11 Pick. 79 [22 Am. Dec. 366]; Addams v. Tutton, 39 Pa. 447; Vance v. Blair, 18 Ohio, 532 [51 Am. Dec. 467]; 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 665; Collyer, Partn. § 245; 2 Lindley, Partn. 4th ed. 1025, and cases cited in notes."

Powell v. Maguire, 43 Cal. 11, disclosed, like the case at bar, an agreement in respect to a franchise to be obtained from the legislature for the mutual benefit of plaintiff and defendant. The franchise in that case was for maintaining a steam ferry, and it appeared that the defendant, after obtaining the franchise in his own name, constructed a ferryboat at his own expense, and operated it between the points named in the charter. The suit was one to obtain *specific performance of the agree- [485 ment, and it was held that it could not be maintained, the court saying, on page 19:

"Upon these facts, it is obvious that if the plaintiff's rights rested solely on a verbal agreement to the effect that he and defendant would establish and maintain the ferry at their joint expense and for their joint benefit, without reference to the franchise, the plaintiff's only remedy would be an action at law for a breach of contract. He would have no right to participate in the profits of an enterprise to which he had contributed nothing, and could claim no interest in a boat constructed by the defendant at his own expense and for his own use, nor in the earnings thereof. In such cases it is well settled that, when the partnership was never launched, and when one of the copartners has proceeded to conduct the enterprise in his own name, at his own cost, and for his own exclusive benefit, excluding the other party therefrom, and repudiating the partnership agreement, the only remedy of the injured party is an action at law for a breach of contract. There would be, in such a case, no existing partnership, but only an agreement to form one, which was never consummated by launching the enterprise."

In that case, also, it was held that the contract was against public policy, the facts in respect to the contract not having been disclosed to the legislature at the time the franchise was granted. In respect to this it was said (p. 21):

"When the legislature grants a franchise to a particular person, his associates and assigns, it delegates to him the right to select the person thereafter to be associated with him in the enterprise. . . . But if several persons desiring to obtain a franchise from the legislature, in which they are all to be mutually interested, see fit to ask it in the name of one only, public policy requires that they should be made to rely solely on his good faith in carrying out the agreement; and if he repudiates the contract on obtaining the franchise a court of equity will grant no relief. It may be that, if the legislature had known beforehand who the real parties in interest were, they would not have made the grant; and if the courts could be appealed to, to enforce such secret an-486] tecedent *agreements, unsupported by any subsequent acts of the ostensible beneficiary, it is evident that powerful secret combinations would be formed to procure vicious legislation under false pretenses."

These authorities might be multiplied, but they are sufficient to show the general rule controlling actions of this kind. For these reasons and upon these authorities we are of the opinion that the suit for specific performance cannot be maintained. The decree of the circuit court was one dismissing the bill absolutely. In view of the doubt which rests as to the validity of the contract we think it should have been a dismissal without prejudice and the order will be, therefore, that the case be remanded to the Circuit Court with directions to modify the decree so as to make it one dismissing the bill without prejudice to an action at law.

Mr. Justice Harlan concurring:

I am of opinion that the object as well as the effect of the contract set out in the bill was to diminish competition in reference to the obtaining of a public franchise. For that reason it was detrimental to the public interests, and one in respect of which a court of equity ought not to give any aid to either party. In addition to this view, it appears upon the face of the ordinance in question that the city council of Richmond named the persons by whom that franchise was to be exercised; and a court of equity ought not to force another party into connection with those whom the city council thus designated. Aside from these considerations, I am of opinion that if the plaintiff has any remedy at all, he has an adequate one at law. Upon this last ground I acquiesce in the judgment of the majority of the court in this case.

Mr. Justice Brown dissenting:

Mr. Justice Peckham and myself are unable to concur in that part of the opinion of the 487]court which holds that the *complainant is not entitled to relief in equity. Neither the agreement between Hyer and Shield of August 9, 1895, nor the negotiations of these parties with the common council of the city of Richmond, contemplated or implied a partnership between them. Not only is it a fact of which we may take notice that street railways are universally constructed and operated by corporations, but it was one of the stipulations of the agreement of August 9, 1895, that "the application and franchise to be presented to the common council of the city of Richmond" should "be that of the Richmond Traction Company for the building of an overhead trolley or cable railway system." The franchise of June 17, 1895, was granted by an ordinance of this council to Hyer and his associates under the corporate name of the "Richmond Conduit Railway Company," while the rival competing scheme of Shield was applied for under the name and style of the "Richmond Traction Company." Not only must the common council have understood that it was contracting with a corporation, but there is nothing to show that it placed any special reliance upon the personal qualities of Shield or his associates. Indeed, the facts set forth in the bill in this connection show conclusively there could have been no such reliance.

While the entire stock of the Richmond Traction Company may have been taken in their names, there was nothing to prevent that stock from being transferred at any time to other parties; nor could the city have had any personal claim against Shield or his associates. The transaction was with the corporation, and with the corporation alone, and in a legal point of view it was a matter of entire indifference to the city who became the owners of the stock. The entire stock of the company might have been transferred to other parties the day after the charter was granted without any violation of its provisions. In fact, the common council is alleged to have understood that the interests of the two companies had been consolidated, and granted the charter to the traction company, with knowledge that Hyer and his associates were to participate equally in the enterprise.

Under such circumstances, we think it clear that the court *should have entertained a[488 bill for the specific performance of this contract, and not have relegated the parties to the doubtful and unsatisfactory remedy of an action at law. We understand the rule to be, as stated by Cook on Stock & Stockholders, § 338, that "if the stock contracted to be sold is easily obtained in the market, and there are no particular reasons why the vendee should have the particular stock contracted for, he is left to his action for damages. But where the value of the stock is not easily ascertainable, or the stock is not to be obtained readily elsewhere, or there is some particular and reasonable cause for the vendee's requiring the stock contract to be delivered, a court of equity will decree a specific performance, and compel the vendor to deliver the stock."

This principle is particularly applicable to a case of this kind, where the corporation was but recently formed, the railroad yet unconstructed, and its shares of uncertain value —if indeed they had any market value at all. To require the complainant, under these circumstances, to bring a personal action for a breach of contract against Shield, who is alleged to be hopelessly insolvent and wholly unable to respond in damages, is to offer him the shadow and deny him the substance of relief.

J. J DOUGLAS, Plff. in Err.,
v.
COMMONWEALTH OF KENTUCKY.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 488-505.)

Legislative power—state decision—power of this court—lottery grant, not a contract—revocation of grant—res judicata.

1. The legislature of a state cannot contract away its power to establish such regulations as are reasonably necessary from time to time to protect the public morals against the evils of lotteries.
2. This court is not required to accept the principles announced by a state court as to the extent to which the contract clause of the Federal Constitution restricts the powers of the state legislature.
3. This court possesses paramount authority, when reviewing the final judgment of a state court upholding a state enactment alleged to be in violation of the contract clause of the Constitution, to determine for itself the existence or nonexistence of the contract set up, and whether its obligation has been impaired by the state enactment.
4. A lottery grant is not in any sense a contract within the meaning of the Constitution of the United States, but is simply a gratuity and a license which the state, under its police power and for the protection of public morals, may at any time revoke and forbid the further conduct of the lottery.
5. No right of the lottery grant acquired during the life of the grant, on the faith of or by any agreement with the grantee, can be exercised after the revocation of such grant and the forbidding of the lottery, if its exercise involves a continuance of the lottery as originally authorized.
6. A state decision that a contract with a city respecting a lottery was valid when made is not res judicata as to the validity of a subsequent provision of the state Constitution or statutes prohibiting all lotteries.

Argued October 12, 13, 1897. Decided November 29, 1897.

IN ERROR to the Court of Appeals of the State of Kentucky to review a judgment of that court reversing the judgment of the Louisville law and equity court overruling a demurrer to the answer and dismissing an action brought by the Commonwealth of Kentucky against J. J. Douglas et al. The judgment of the court of appeals of Kentucky adjudged that the constitutional provision of that state forbidding lotteries and gift enterprises was valid and, as applied to the defendant's claim of a lottery privilege, was not repugnant to the Constitution of the United States. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. John G. Carlisle, D. W. Sanders, and Aaron Kohn for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. W. S. Taylor, Attorney General of Kentucky, and William Goebel for defendant in error.

Mr. Justice Harlan delivered the opinion of the court:

By § 226 of the Constitution of Kentucky of 1891 it is provided that "lotteries and gift enterprises are forbidden, and no privileges shall be granted for such purposes, and none shall be exercised, and no schemes for similar purposes shall be allowed. The general assembly shall enforce this section by proper penalties. All lottery privileges or charters heretofore granted are revoked."

By joint resolution of the general assembly passed January 30, 1892, the attorney general of that commonwealth was directed, in [490 execution of this constitutional provision, to immediately institute and prosecute such legal proceedings as might be necessary to suppress or revoke all lotteries or lottery franchises, privileges, or charters operated in Kentucky.

In conformity with that resolution the present action was instituted in the Louisville law and equity court. The petition charged that the defendants were exercising in the city of Louisville, Kentucky, and elsewhere, without lawful warrant, the right, privilege, and franchise to operate a lottery. The relief asked was a judgment preventing the exercise by the defendants of such lottery franchise.

The defendant Douglas in his answer set out numerous acts of legislation under the authority of which he claimed the right to conduct the lottery in question. He insisted that the statutory and constitutional provisions invoked in support of the action were repugnant to the clause of the Constitution of the United States prohibiting any state from passing a law impairing the obligation of contracts.

The defense was sustained by the court of original jurisdiction, which overruled a demurrer to the answer; and the commonwealth having declined to plead further, its petition was dismissed. That judgment was reversed by the court of appeals of Kentucky, and the validity of the above constitutional provision relating to lotteries, and as applied to the defendant's claim of a lottery privilege, was adjudged not to be repugnant to the Constitution of the United States.

The case is here upon writ of error sued out by Douglas, who claims that by the final judgment of the highest court of Kentucky he has been denied a right and immunity secured to him by the Constitution of the United States.

It appears that under authority conferred by various legislative enactments which need not be specially set forth, the mayor and board of councilmen of the city of Frankfort, a municipal corporation of Kentucky, made, Decem ber 31, 1875, a written agreement with one E. S. Stewart, whereby that city sold, conveyed, and assigned to him a scheme of lottery composed of 30,900 classes which it had devised, not more than two of which were to be drawn [491] on each day, Sundays excepted, *until the whole number should have been fully drawn; Stewart to have the right to control and operate such scheme in accordance with the provisions of the acts under which the city proceeded. The agreement provided that, in consideration of the above sale, assignment, and transfer, Stewart should pay to the city of Frankfort various sums of money at stated times. As required by the agreement, and in conformity with the acts of assembly, he executed to the commonwealth a bond in the penal sum of $100,000, conditioned for a faithful compliance with the provisions of those acts, and for the payment of all sums stipulated to be paid to the city of Frankfort, as well as all prizes drawn in any class under said lottery scheme.

By an act approved March 22, 1890, the general assembly of Kentucky repealed the charter of the Frankfort lottery. Ky. Acts 1889–90, vol. 1, pp. 42, 43. But Stewart had died before the passage of that act, and by contract with his wife, as sole legatee and devisee of his estate, Douglas acquired the right to operate the lottery scheme that had been acquired by Stewart.

It is stated in the answer—and, as this case was determined upon demurrer to the answer, it must be assumed in the present action to be true—that Stewart and Douglas fully complied with all the provisions of the above contract, paid all instalments due the city of Frankfort as the same became payable, fully performed every condition of his contract and bond, and was ready and willing to carry out the same according to the terms, stipulations, and covenants thereof.

The answer further averred that on the 11th day of September, 1878, the court of appeals of Kentucky, in the case of Webb v. Commonwealth of Kentucky—brought to enjoin the exercise of the privilcges of a lottery grant—adjudged that the sale of a lottery franchise, under the authority of the state, vested in the vendee a property right to conduct such lottery in accordance with the terms of his contract, which could not be repealed by the legislature of the state, and held § 6 of article 21, chapter 28, of the Revised Statutes, attempting such repeal, to be void so far as it affected the [492] *rights of the purchaser under a contract made before the passage of the act.

The answer also contained the following averments: "Defendant says that he has a vested right to conduct the lottery business by drawing the classes contained in the scheme which the city of Frankfort sold and conveyed to E. S. Stewart under the terms, conditions, and covenants of the contract of December 31, 1875, executed and delivered as aforesaid, and that there has never been at any time more than two classes in said scheme drawn in one day, and there are a large number of classes in said scheme yet to be drawn; that his said right under his said contract was authorized and approved by the commonwealth of Kentucky, repeatedly adjudged valid by the judicial tribunals of this state, and such right has always been held by the courts of this state inviolable and not subject to repeal, alteration, or modification by subsequent legislatures. Defendant says that he has paid large sums of money for said scheme devised as aforesaid and said contract, and has made contracts and incurred liabilities involving large sums of money upon the faith of said contract, and relying upon the terms thereof and upon the decisions of the courts of the state adjudging said contract to be valid, obligatory, and inviolable."

In support of the contention that the contracts for the purchase of the lottery scheme in question were valid and irrepealable, the defendant in his answer referred to an act of the general assembly approved May 17, 1886, declaring that "every corporation or person to whom a lottery franchise has been granted by the general assembly of this commonwealth, and which franchise has been declared by a judgment of the court of appeals to be a lawful and existing one, or the lawful grantee, alienee, legatee, or assignee of such franchise, shall be authorized to operate and conduct a lottery in this commonwealth when he, she, or it shall have filed with the auditor of public accounts a certified copy of the judgment rendered, and the opinion delivered by the court of appeals in a case heard and determined before it, in which it has determined that a lottery could be lawfully operated under said *grant from the general assembly of this [493] commonwealth, and obtain from the said auditor a license (which is hereby authorized and directed to issue on the filing of said copies hereinbefore required), reciting the filing of said copies, and authorizing the operation of said lottery for one year from the date thereof, on the condition that said licensee shall, within five days thereafter, pay to the said auditor of the state the sum of $2,000; and said license issued by said auditor, as hereinbefore directed, and any and all renewals thereof, as hereinafter provided for, shall be conclusive evidence in all the courts of this commonwealth of the rights of the licensee to operate a lottery for the period therein named, etc."

Under that statute the defendant obtained a license from the auditor of public accounts, from year to year, and paid to the state $2,000 annually every year since the passage of that act.

The answer also stated: "And the general assembly of Kentucky, further recognizing the property rights of this defendant under his said contract, by an act of the general assembly of the state approved May 12, 1884, enacted that the general council of the city of Louisville should by ordinance provide for the payment of $200 per annum for every lottery office or agency therefor in the city of Louisville, which ordinance was accordingly passed by the general council of the city of Louisville, and is now a valid and existing law, and this defendant has paid the city of Louisville $200 for each office operated by him, and at the time of the institution of this suit had paid the city of Louisville the sum of $200 for each office he then operated in advance for one year from the time of the issue of the license, and that the said licenses thus obtained have not yet expired."

The defendant, in addition, pleaded res judicata in respect of the matters involved in this action. This defense is thus set forth: "The defendant further states that after the making of the contract between the city of Frankfort and said E. S. Stewart, as set forth in the second paragraph hereof, the commonwealth of Ken-494] tucky, by her attorney general, *filed a petion in the Franklin circuit court against the city of Frankfort, the said E. S. Stewart and others, in the nature of a writ of quo warranto, alleging in said petition that the said E. S. Stewart and others claiming under him were selling lottery tickets under the said grant, claiming under the contract referred to in the second paragraph herein; and further alleged that the said board of councilmen of the city of Frankfort had no title to said lottery franchise and had no authority to sell and convey the scheme as set forth in said contract, and that the defendants in said action were engaged in selling tickets under said contract in violation of law, and that the exercise of the privileges by them was injurious to public morals by tempting the people into the immoral habit of gaming, and that the said defendants were usurping the franchise, all of which matters and things are now relied upon in this action and are the identical matters for which relief is sought in this case; and that by the said petition the plaintiffs herein sought in said action to enjoin and oust the defendants therein from proceeding further to sell tickets and operate the lottery privileges claimed by them, which are the identical rights claimed herein, and the court was asked to hold the said franchise void and to annul and adjudge as canceled all rights of the defendants therein; that said defendants filed their answer in said case and joined issue upon the allegations of the said petition; that thereafter, upon motion of the commonwealth of Kentucky, the said action was transferred from the Franklin circuit court to the Oldham circuit court; that in the said case such proceedings were had that the court finally entered a judgment declaring that under the act of March 16, 1869, referred to in paragraph 2 hereof, the city of Frankfort and the board of councilmen of said city did obtain the legal title to said lottery franchise and the classes thereof; and further, that the said city of Frankfort, under the act of March 28, 1872, referred to in paragraph 2, were authorized to sell and dispose of said scheme upon such terms as they deemed proper, and that said act was constitutionally valid and binding and authorized such sale and transfer, and that the contract made between the city of Frankfort and the said E. S. Stew-
495] *art, which is the same contract relied upon herein, was a valid and subsisting obligation and enforceable as a legal obligation. From said judgment of the Oldham circuit court, the commonwealth of Kentucky prayed an appeal to the court of appeals of Kentucky, and the said court of appeals of Kentucky, on the 27th day of February, 1878, entered a judgment affirming the judgment of the Oldham circuit court, and adjudged in said action that the general assembly of the commonwealth of Kentucky by the act of March 16, 1869, did confer upon the board of councilmen of the city of Frankfort the said lottery franchise, and that the said act was valid, and that the city of Frankfort, by reason thereof, was the owner of the scheme named in the contract referred to, and that under the act of March 28, 1872, the city of Frankfort had the legal right to sell and dispose of the same upon such terms and conditions as it deemed proper, and that the said sale to the said E. S. Stewart and the contract in relation thereto was binding and valid, and had been entered into in strict conformity with the said acts of the general assembly. A copy of the pleadings in said case and the opinions and judgments of said courts will be filed herewith as a part hereof. The defendant says that by reason of the proceedings in said action and the judgments of the courts thereupon the plaintiff is barred from bringing or maintaining this action; that the legality of the act of March 28, 1872, and the validity of the contract of E. S. Stewart with the city of Frankfort are matters res judicata by reason of said judgment, and he pleads and relies upon the same herein."

The Federal question presented for our determination arises upon the claim of the plaintiff in error—which was denied by the final judgment of the highest court of Kentucky—that the agreement between the city of Frankfort and E. S. Stewart, by which the latter became the owner of the lottery scheme devised by that city, under the authority of law, was a contract the obligation of which the state was forbidden by the Constitution of the United States to impair either by legislative enactment or by constitutional provision.

If this interpretation of the Federal Constitution be correct, *it will follow that any [496 provision in the Constitution or in the statutes of Kentucky forbidding lotteries and gift enterprises in that commonwealth, and revoking the lottery privileges or charters theretofore granted, is null and void as to the defendant Douglas, who succeeded to the rights acquired by Stewart under the agreement of 1875 with the city of Frankfort. This necessarily results from the declaration that the Constitution of the United States is the supreme law of the land, anything in the Constitution or laws of any state to the contrary notwithstanding.

This court had occasion many years ago to say that the common forms of gambling were comparatively innocuous when placed in contrast with the widespread pestilence of lotteries; that the former were confined to a few persons and places, while the latter infested the whole community, entered every dwelling, reached every class, preyed upon the hard earnings of the poor, and plundered the ignorant and simple. Phalen v. Virginia, 49 U. S. 8 How. 163 [12: 1030].

Is a state forbidden by the supreme law of the land from protecting its people at all times from practices which it conceives to be attended by such ruinous results? Can the legislature of a state contract away its power to establish such regulations as are reasonably necessary from time to time to protect the public morals against the evils of lotteries?

These questions arose and were determined, upon much consideration, in Stone v. Mississippi, 101 U. S. 814, 819, 821 [25: 1079, 1080, 1081].

It will be seen from the report of that case that the legislature of Mississippi chartered the Mississippi Agricultural, Educational,& Manufacturing Aid Society, with authority to raise money by way of lottery; and in consideration thereof the society paid $5,000 into the treasury of the state, and agreed to pay, and did pay, an annual tax of $1,000, together with ½ of 1 per cent on the amount of receipts derived from the sale of certificates. While the society's charter was in force, the state adopted a new Constitution declaring that the legislature should never authorize a lottery, nor should the sale of lottery tickets be allowed nor any lottery theretofore authorized be permitted to be drawn or tickets therein be 497]*sold. This was followed by the passage of an act prohibiting lotteries,and making it unlawful to conduct one in the state. The question was then raised by an information in the nature of quo warranto, whether the lottery privilege given by the society's charter could be withdrawn or impaired by the state legislation—that society having, as was conceded, complied with all the conditions upon which its charter was granted. The supreme court of Mississippi held that the state could withdraw the lottery privilege which it had granted. And that conclusion was questioned upon writ of error sued out from this court.

Chief Justice Waite, who delivered the unanimous judgment of the court in that case, said: "The question is therefore directly presented, whether, in view of these facts, the legislature of a state can, by the charter of a lottery company, defeat the will of the people, authoritatively expressed, in relation to the further continuance of such business in their midst. We think it cannot. No legislature can bargain away the public health or the public morals. The people themselves cannot do it, much less their servants. The supervision of both these subjects of governmental power is continuing in its nature, and they are to be dealt with as the special exigencies of the moment may require. Government is organized with a view to their preservation, and cannot devest itself of the power to provide for them. For this purpose the largest legislative discretion is allowed, and the discretion cannot be parted with any more than the power itself." Again, referring to lotteries: "They disturb the checks and balances of a well ordered community. Society built on such a foundation would almost of necessity bring forth a population of speculators and gamblers, living on the expectation of what, 'by the casting of lots, or by lot, chance, or otherwise,' might be 'awarded' to them from the accumulations of others. Certainly the right to suppress them is governmental, to be exercised at all times by those in power, at their discretion. Anyone, therefore, who accepts a lottery charter does so with the implied understanding that the people, in their sovereign capacity and through their properly constituted 498]agencies,may*resume it at any time when the public good shall require, whether it be paid for or not. All that one can get by such a charter is a suspension of certain governmental rights in his favor, subject to withdrawal at will. He has in legal effect nothing more than a license to enjoy the privilege on the terms named for the specified time, unless it be sooner abrogated by the sovereign power of the state. It is a permit, good as against existing laws, but subject to future legislative and constitutional control or withdrawal."

It is suggested that, in important particulars, the opinion and judgment in Stone v. Mississippi was modified by the decision in New Orleans v. Houston, 119 U. S. 265, 275 [30: 411, 414]. So far from this being true the principles announced in the former case were recognized and held to have no application in the latter case. In New Orleans v. Houston the question was whether the legislature of Louisiana could destroy or impair a lottery charter granted and authorized by the Constitution of that state. This court, speaking by Mr. Justice Matthews, said: "It is undoubtedly true that no rights of contract are or can be vested under this constitutional provision which a subsequent Constitution might not destroy without impairing the obligation of a contract, within the sense of the Constitution of the United States, for the reason assigned in the case of Stone v. Mississippi. But an ordinary act of legislation cannot have that effect, because the constitutional provision has withdrawn from the scope of the police power of the state, to be exercised by the general assembly, the subject-matter of the granting of lottery charters, so far as the Louisiana State Lottery Company is concerned, and any act of the legislature contrary to this prohibition is upon familiar principles null and void. The subject is not within the jurisdiction of the police power of the state, as it is permitted to be exercised by the legislature under the Constitution of the state." So that in New Orleans v. Houston it was decided that while a lottery grant was not a contract within the meaning of the Federal Constitution, the obligation of which was protected against impairment by the state making the grant, the legislature could not strike *down a lottery which the funda-[499 mental law of the state had authorized.

In the argument on behalf of the plaintiff in error much stress was laid upon former decisions of the court of appeals of Kentucky relating to rights acquired under lottery grants. Our attention has been particularly called to Gregory's Exrx. v. Trustees of Shelby College Lottery, 2 Met. (Ky.) 589, 598. From the report of that case it appears that the legislature of Kentucky in 1838 granted to Shelby College the privilege of raising the sum of $100,000 by lottery, with authority to sell or dispose of the scheme or any classes of the lottery. In 1855 the provision of the Revised Statutes, declaring that all lottery privileges should cease, took effect. And the question arose as to the effect of that enactment upon the rights of one who had loaned money to the college upon the faith of the lottery grant, and to secure the loan had taken from the trustees of the institution a mortgage upon their rights under the lottery franchise. The court of appeals of Kentucky, conceding that the grant of a privilege to raise money by a lottery was a mere gratuity, was not an act of incorporation, conferred no charter rights, and did not amount to a contract, proceeded: "Although, therefore, the legislature has the power to repeal the grant of a lottery privilege where no rights have accrued under it, and though lotteries have a demoralizing tendency and exercise a very pernicious influence over the ignorant and credulous part of the community, and for this reason have been almost universally denounced by the law-making power in the different states of the Union, yet if rights have been acquired or liabilities incurred upon the faith of the privilege conferred by the grant, it would be obviously unjust to permit such rights to be devested by a legislative revocation of the privilege. If, therefore, any vested rights have been acquired under the present grant, before the passage of the repealing law, then, to the extent of such rights at least, that law must be regarded as unconstitutional and inoperative. This conclusion is, we think, fully sanctioned by the following ad-500 judged cases: Dartmouth College* v. Woodward, 17 U. S. 4 Wheat. 518 to 643 [4: 629 to 660]; Fletcher v. Peck, 10 U. S. 6 Cranch, 88 [3: 163]; University of Maryland v. Williams, 9 Gill & J. 365 [31 Am. Dec. 72]; Terrett v. Taylor, 13 U. S. 9 Cranch, 43, 52 [3: 650, 655]; City of Louisville v. University of Louisville, 15 B. Mon. 642, 692. The plaintiff, Waller, before the repealing act was passed, had, on the faith of the lottery grant, advanced large sums of money, which were appropriated by him for the benefit of Shelby College, and the trustees of the college had mortgaged to him their rights under the lottery franchise for his indemnity. As the lottery privilege was granted for the benefit of Shelby College, and the money was advanced by Waller with the assent of the trustees of the college, under the belief that it would be realized eventually from the lottery, he became thereby invested with the right to the use of the grant until from such use the sum was produced which he had advanced for the benefit of the college. This was a vested right of which he could not be devested by an act of the legislature. So far, therefore, as the repealing statute interferes with or affects this right, it is unconstitutional and inoperative." These principles were recognized in cases subsequently decided by the same court.

The defendant insists that his rights, having been acquired when these decisions of the highest courts of Kentucky were in full force, should be protected according to the law of the state as it was adjudged to be when those rights attached. But is this court required to accept the principles announced by the state court as to the extent to which the contract clause of the Federal Constitution restricts the powers of the state legislatures? Clearly not. The defendant invokes the jurisdiction of this court upon the ground that the rights denied to him by the final judgment of the highest court of Kentucky, and which the state seeks to prevent him from exercising, were acquired under an agreement that constituted a contract within the meaning of the Federal Constitution. This contention is disputed by the state. So that the issue presented makes it necessary to inquire whether that which the defendant asserts to be a contract was a contract of the class to which the Constitution of the United States refers. This court must determine—indeed, it cannot, consistently with its duty, refuse to 501]determine—upon its own responsibility, in each case as it arises, whether that which a party seeks to have protected under the contract clause of the Constitution of the United States is a contract the obligation of which is protected by that instrument against hostile state legislation.

In Jefferson Branch Bank v. Skelly, 66 U. S. 1 Black, 436, 443 [17: 173, 177], which involved the contract clause of the Constitution, it was contended that this court should accept as conclusive the interpretation placed by the supreme court of Ohio upon the Constitution and laws of that state as affecting certain state legislation which, it was alleged, constituted a contract, the obligation of which could not be impaired by legislation. Mr. Justice Wayne, delivering the unanimous judgment of the court, said: "The constructions given by the courts of the states to state legislation and to state Constitutions have been conclusive upon this court, with a single exception, and that is when it has been called upon to interpret the contracts of states, 'though they have been made in the forms of law,' or by the instrumentality of a state's authorized functionaries in conformity with state legislation. It has never been denied, nor is it now, that the Supreme Court of the United States has an appellate power to revise the judgment of the supreme court of a state, whenever such a court shall adjudge that not to be a contract which has been alleged, in the forms of legal proceedings, by a litigant, to be one, within the meaning of that clause of the Constitution of the United States which inhibits the states from passing any law impairing the obligation of contracts. Of what use would the appellate power be to the litigant who feels himself aggrieved by some particular state legislation if this court could not decide, independently of all adjudication by the supreme court of a state, whether or not the phraseology of the instrument in controversy was expressive of a contract and within the protection of the Constitution of the United States, and that its obligation should be enforced, notwithstanding a contrary conclusion by the supreme court of a state? It never was intended, and cannot be sustained by any course of reasoning, that this court should or could with fidelity to the Constitution of the *United States follow the [502 construction of the supreme court of a state in such a matter, when it entertained a different opinion; and in forming its judgment in such a case, it makes no difference in the obligation of this court in reversing the judgment of the supreme court of a state upon such a contract, whether it be one claimed to be such under the form of state legislation, or has been made by a covenant or agreement by the agents of a state, by its authority."

The doctrine that this court possesses paramount authority, when reviewing the final judgment of a state court upholding a state enactment alleged to be in violation of the contract clause of the Constitution, to determine for itself the existence or nonexistence of the contract set up, and whether its obligation has been impaired by the state enactment, has been affirmed in numerous other cases. Ohio Life Ins. Co. v. Debolt, 57 U. S. 16 How. 416, 451 [14: 997, 1011]; Wright v. Nagle, 101 U. S. 791, 794 [25: 921, 922]; Louisville Gas Co. v. Citizens' Gaslight Co. 115 U. S. 683, 697 [29:

510, 515]; Vicksburg, S. & P. Railroad Co. v. Dennis, 116 U. S. 665, 667 [29: 770, 771]; New Orleans Waterworks Co. v. Louisiana Sugar Ref. Co. 125 U. S. 18, 36 [31: 607, 614]; Bryan v. Board of Education, 151 U. S. 639, 650 [38: 297, 302]; Mobile & Ohio Railroad v. Tennessee, 153 U. S. 486, 493 [38: 793, 796]; Bacon v. Texas, 163 U. S. 207, 219 [41: 132, 137].

In view of these adjudications it is clear that we are not required to accept as authoritative in this case the decision of the court of appeals of Kentucky in Gregory's Exrx. v. Trustees of Shelby College Lottery, above cited, to the effect that a legislative revocation of a lottery grant is a violation of the Constitution of the United States so far as such revocation affects rights acquired on the faith of the privilege conferred by the grant, and the exercise of which involves the continuance of that privilege for such time as may be necessary for the full enjoyment of those rights. On the contrary, we hold that a lottery grant is not, in any sense, a contract within the meaning of the Constitution of the United States, but is simply a gratuity and license which the state, under its police powers, and for the protection of the public morals, may at any time revoke, and forbid the further conduct of the lottery; and that no right acquired during the life of the 503] grant, on the faith of or by *agreement with the grantee, can be exercised after the revocation of such grant and the forbidding of the lottery, if its exercise involves a continuance of the lottery as originally authorized. All rights acquired on the faith of a lottery grant must be deemed to have been acquired subject to the power of the state to the extent just indicated; nevertheless, rights acquired under such a grant consistently with the law as it was when they were so acquired, and which rights may be exercised and enjoyed without conducting a lottery forbidden by the state, are, of course, not affected, and could not be affected, by the revocation of such grant. Here the defendant insists that as the agreement under which Stewart became the owner of the Frankfort lottery scheme was lawful when made, he, as assignee of Stewart, is protected by the Constitution of the United States in carrying on that lottery, despite the prohibition of all lotteries and the revocation of all lottery grants by the present Constitution of Kentucky adopted after the transfer to Stewart of the benefit of that scheme. For the reasons stated, this contention must be overruled. It could not be sustained without overruling Stone v. Mississippi, which we have no inclination to do.

Some stress has been laid by counsel upon the fact that, in an action brought by the state in the nature of quo warranto against the city of Frankfort, and which was determined upon appeal by the court of appeals of Kentucky on the 27th day of February, 1878, it was adjudged that the contract between that city and Stewart was a valid and binding contract; and, consequently, the state is barred, upon the principle of res judicata, from maintaining the present action. The opinion in that case has not been published in the regular reports, but a copy of it appears in the record. It is sufficient, in answer to the contention of the defendant, to say that the case referred to, as appears from the opinion of the state court, involved nothing more than the validity of the agreement of 1875 between the city of Frankfort and Stewart, under the law as it was when such agreement was made, and did not necessarily involve any inquiry as to the power of the state, by legislative or constitutional provision, and without violating *the clause of the [504 Constitution of the United States prohibiting the passage of state laws impairing the obligation of contracts, to revoke an existing lottery grant and prohibit all lotteries within its limits. The thing adjudged in the case referred to fully appears from the statement made by the court of appeals of Kentucky of the conclusion which it reached, namely: "We therefore conclude that the legislature of 1869 conferred on the board of councilmen of the city of Frankfort franchises, powers, and authority equal or exactly similar to those that had by the act of 1838 been conferred on the managers, which include the privilege of raising $100,000 by operating a lottery." A decision that the agreement between the city of Frankfort and Stewart was, when made, valid under the laws of Kentucky, did not determine, as between the state and those asserting rights under that agreement, that the state could not, by subsequent legislative enactment or by constitutional provision, and so far as the Constitution of the United States was concerned, prohibit all lotteries, and thereby prevent the exercise by those asserting the right under or by virtue of that agreement, to carry on a lottery against the expressed will of the state.

We have felt some embarrassment arising from the conflict between the present decision and the former decisions of the highest court of Kentucky upon the general subject of lotteries, and as to the power of the state, by contract, to so tie its hands that it may not revoke, in its discretion, grants of lottery privileges, and prohibit the carrying on of all lotteries. But that embarrassment has been greatly lessened by the fact that that court, in its opinion in the present case, after referring to Stone v. Mississippi, said: "It seems to us that this decision defining the provision of the Federal Constitution as to what subjects are contracts and protected by it, and that lottery grants, though paid for, are not protected by said provision, is binding upon this court, and has the effect to overrule its decisions holding the contrary view. But apart from the binding force of the decision, it seems that its logic is conclusive and convincing in drawing the distinction between the contractual *and gov- [505 ernmental power of the states, to wit, that the provisions of the Federal Constitution in reference to contracts only inhibits the states from passing laws impairing the obligations of such contracts as relate to property rights, but not to subjects that are purely governmental." In the same opinion it was well observed that, under any other doctrine than that announced in Stone v. Mississippi, the legislature, by giving or bartering away the power to guard and protect the public morals, could "convert the state into dens of bawdy houses, gambling shops, and other places of vice and demoralization, provided the grantees paid for the privileges, and thus deprive the state of its power to repeal the grants and all control of the subjects as far as the grantees are concerned, and the trust duty of protecting and fostering the honesty, health, morals, and good order of the state would be cast to the winds, and vice and crime would triumph in their stead. Now, it seems to us that the essential principles of self-preservation forbid that the commonwealth should possess a power so revolting, because destructive of the main pillars of government."

We perceive no error in the judgment of the Court of Appeals of Kentucky, and it is affirmed.

Mr. Justice Shiras agrees that the judgment should be affirmed, but does not concur in all the reasoning of this court.

UNITED STATES, Plff. in Err., v. UNION PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY et al.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 505-513.)

Certificate for instruction.

A certificate of questions whether or not the United States can recover from a railroad company or its receivers the whole or any part of moneys paid by the United States to Indians for improvements upon lands sold to a railroad company, or for moneys paid to individual Indians on account of a right of way through lands of their tribe, is insufficient, as it does not present distinct points or propositions of law which can be distinctly answered without regard to the other issues of law involved, but brings up the whole case for consideration and disposition; and as the answers to the questions will require the construction of various Indian treaties, of the Pacific Railroad acts, and the consolidation of railroad companies.

Argued December 2, 1897. Decided December 13, 1897.

ON A CERTIFICATE from the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit certifying to this court certain questions and propositions of law for its decision in an action brought by the United States in the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Kansas against the Union Pacific Railway Company et al. to recover certain amounts due from said railroad company, its successors or assigns, under a treaty with the Delaware tribe of Indians, and for damage done the said Indians in the destruction and taking of property by said company to reimburse the United States for moneys appropriated. Certificate dismissed.

Statement by Mr. Chief Justice Fuller:

This was a suit brought by the United States in the circuit court of the United States for the district of Kansas against the Union Pacific Railway Company and its receivers, as directed by the act of July 13, 1892 (27 Stat. at L. 126, chap. 164), to recover certain amounts "found by the Department of the Interior to be due from said railroad company, its successors or assigns, under the last paragraph of the 2d article of the treaty with the Delaware Tribe of Indians of May 30, 1860, and under the concluding clause of the 3d article of said treaty, and for damage done the said Indians in the taking and destruction of the property by said railroad company, which sums when recovered shall be used to reimburse the United States for the sum appropriated in the foregoing paragraph."

That sum was $39,675.16, of which $10,715.75 was to be paid to individual members of the Delaware tribe for improvements on lands sold to the Leavenworth Company, and $28,959.41 was to be paid to individual members of the tribe for right of way through their allotted lands.

The first count of the petition alleged that in the year 1831, and for a long time prior thereto, the United States were the owners in fee simple of all the lands lying north of the Kansas and west of the Missouri rivers, in the then territory of Kansas, and that by the terms of the treaty made between the United States and the Delaware Indians, proclaimed March 24, 1831, the United States conveyed and secured to that nation, as a permanent home, a certain tract, describing it, with an outlet; that afterwards, in the year 1854, by the terms of another treaty, the nation ceded to the United States all their right, title, and interest in and to their country lying west of the state of Missouri, and situate in the fork of the Missouri and Kansas rivers, and also their right and interest in the outlet, with certain designated exceptions.

*It was further averred that articles 11 [507] and 12 of the latter treaty provided that the country reserved for the permanent home of the Delawares might on request be surveyed and allotted; and that roads and highways laid out by authority of law should have a right of way through the reservation; "and railroad companies, when the lines of their roads necessarily pass through the said reservation, shall have the right of way, on payment of a just compensation therefor in money;" that afterwards the Delawares signified their wish that a portion of the lands reserved for their home might be divided and allotted; and thereupon, by the terms of a treaty entered into May 30, 1860, it was provided, among other things, that a portion of the reservation should be surveyed and allotted as stated, and by the last clause of article 2 thereof that "the improvements of the Indians residing on the lands to be sold shall be valued by the United States, and the individual owners thereof shall receive the amount realized from the sale of the same, to be expended in building other improvements for them on the lands retained." By article 8 it was provided that as to the remaining lands, after the tracts in severalty and those for special objects named in the treaty had been selected and set apart, the Leavenworth, Pawnee, & Western Railroad Company, a Kansas corporation, should have the prior right of purchase upon the payment into the United States Treasury, which payment should be made within six months after the quantity of said land was ascertained, in gold or silver coin, of such a sum as three commissioners, to be appointed by the Secretary of the Interior, should appraise to be the value, and providing that such value should not be placed below the value of $1.25 per acre, exclusive of the cost of survey.

That, upon payment, a patent should be issued directly to the company; that the United States would accept the trust imposed on them and apply the money resulting from such disposition of the lands in the manner prescribed by the treaty of 1854; and it was "also agreed that said railroad company shall have the per-508] petual right of way over any portion *of the lands allotted to the Delawares in severalty, on the payment of a just compensation therefor, in money, to the respective parties whose lands are crossed by the line of railroad."

It was then alleged that by the terms of the treaty the United States became and were the trustees of the Delawares for the purposes provided for therein; that the Leavenworth Company, prior to 1867, accepted the terms of the treaty and agreed to purchase the unallotted lands of the Delawares and to pay for them and the improvements thereon in accordance therewith; and that all the rights of the company in and to the lands and its liability for the lands and improvements, and all the rights and liabilities of its grantee, successor, and assignee, the Union Pacific Railway Company, were fixed by the terms of said treaties, and that the Leavenworth Company, and its grantee, successor, and assignee, the Union Pacific Railway Company, took the lands "subject to the conditions set forth in said treaties as to the payment therefor and as to the payment for said improvements thereon;" that the United States on October 20, 1860, appointed three commissioners to inspect and appraise the value of the land and improvements which the Leavenworth Company had become entitled to purchase, and they appraised the improvements at the value of $9,534.25, and returned the appraisement, a schedule of which was made part of the petition. But at the time of that appraisement and of the purchase of the lands by the Leavenworth Company there were other improvements not included, which were afterwards appraised at the sum of $1,181.50, and an itemized statement of these improvements was attached.

The United States further averred that the Leavenworth Company was unable to carry out the terms of the purchase of the lands and improvements and pay for the same as provided for in the treaty, and that afterwards a further treaty was made and entered into on or about July 2, 1861, ratified August 6, 1861, which in terms referred to the provisions for the sale of the lands and improvements in the prior treaties, by which last-mentioned treaty it was provided that the *Leavenworth [509 Company might execute its bonds with interest coupons attached, the principal sum to be $286,742.15, and execute a mortgage on 100,000 acres of land, as set forth in a letter of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to the Secretary of the Interior, dated May 29, 1861, said mortgage to be conditioned for the payment of the bonds, both principal and interest, the bonds and mortgage being executed by the company in lieu of the payment previously provided for; but no provision was made in the last-mentioned treaty for any change in the time or manner of paying for said improvements, and the bonds and mortgage were executed to secure the payment of the purchase price of the lands only, exclusive of the value of the improvements, the amount whereof was not included in the mortgage.

It was also averred that through changes in the name of the Leavenworth Company, and through a consolidation by and with other railroad companies, the Union Pacific Railway Company succeeded to all the franchises, property rights, and interests of the said Leavenworth Company, and became and was subject to all the liabilities of that company under and by virtue of the said several treaties, and under and by virtue of the purchase of said Delaware Indian lands and the improvements thereon; that thereafter, by the terms of the treaty entered into on the 4th day of July, 1866, which treaty was ratified on or about the 26th day of July, 1866, in article 1st thereof it was provided "that the United States shall secure and cause to be paid to said Indians the full value of all that part of their reservation, with the improvements then existing on the same, heretofore sold to the Leavenworth, Pawnee, & Western Railroad Company, according to the terms of a treaty ratified August 22, 1860, and supplemental treaties, and in accordance with the conditions, restrictions, and limitations thereof."

That thereby plaintiffs became and were sureties for the payment of the value of said improvements, and trustees for the Delaware Indians to collect and dispose of the money as provided therein; and that neither the Leavenworth Company nor any of its assignees or successors, nor the Union Pacific *Railway [510
Company, nor its receivers, defendants herein, have paid for said improvements, and that they remain due and wholly unpaid by defendants.

That by an act of Congress, approved July 13, 1892, there was appropriated and paid to the Delaware Indians the sum of $10,715.75, which sum the United States paid to those Indians as sureties under the treaties and in discharge of the trust created thereby.

And plaintiffs said that by the terms of the treaties and by the acceptance thereof by the Leavenworth Company and its grantee, successor, and assignee, the Union Pacific Railway Company, the latter became and was liable to plaintiffs, as sureties and trustees, for money paid out and expended on behalf of defendants for said improvements in the sum of $10,715.75, which sum, together with interest thereon from May 30, 1860, was now due and wholly unpaid.

The second count averred that by virtue of the treaties mentioned in the first count, the Leavenworth Company became entitled to a right of way across the Delaware Reservation, and across the lands subsequently allotted in severalty to Delawares on payment of a just compensation therefor; that the United States under the treaties became trustees for the Delawares to collect and account for the amount due them for such right of way and the sureties of the railroad companies for the payment of the same: That the Leavenworth Company under these treaties laid out a right of way and constructed a railroad over and across the reservation and over and across certain parcels of land allotted in severalty to Delaware Indians, and thereby became liable to the United States as trustees for the Delawares for the damages thereby sustained by the latter; that a reasonable compensation for the right of way across the allotted lands amounted to $28,959.41, which amount was ascertained by an appraisement by a commission appointed under the treaty; that the Union Pacific Railway Company was the successor of the Leavenworth Company, and liable for the amount due the Indians for the right of way; that the amount specified was [511] appropriated and paid the *Delaware Indians by the United States under the act of July 13, 1892, as sureties, and was due from the railway company.

To these counts demurrers were sustained by the circuit court and judgment entered in favor of defendants. The case was then carried to the circuit court of appeals for the eighth circuit and that court certified to this court the two counts, the demurrers, and the judgment thereon, and its desire for instruction "upon the following questions and propositions of law arising upon the record in such cause, to the end that it may properly decide said cause:

"First. Upon the facts stated in the first and second counts of said petition, is the United States entitled to recover from the Union Pacific Railway Company, or the receivers thereof, the whole or any part of the sum of $10,715.75, heretofore paid by the United States to the Delaware Indians, pursuant to the act of Congress of July 13, 1892 (27 Stat. at L. 126, chap. 164), for improvements upon lands sold to the Leavenworth, Pawnee, & Western Railroad Company?

"Second. Upon the facts stated in the first and second counts of said petition, is the United States entitled to recover from the Union Pacific Railway Company, or the receivers thereof, the whole or any part of the sum of $28,954.41, heretofore paid by the United States to individual members of the tribe of Delaware Indians, pursuant to the provisions of the act of Congress of July 13, 1892, for and on account of right of way though allotted lands belong to members of said tribe, which right of way was secured by the Leavenworth, Pawnee, & Western Railroad Company, in accordance with the concluding clause of article 3 of a treaty concluded with the tribe of Delaware Indians on May 30, 1860?

"Third. Upon the facts stated in the first and second counts of said petition, were the demurrers thereto properly sustained?"

It is settled that the certification provided for in §§ 5 and 6 of the judiciary act of March 3, 1891 (26 Stat. at L. 826, chap. 517), is governed by the rules laid down in respect of certificates of division under the Revised Statutes. Columbus Watch Company v. Robbins, 148 U. S. 266 [37: 445]; Maynard v. Hecht, 151 U. S. 324 [38: 179]; Graver v. Faurot, 162 U. S. 435 [40: 1030]; Cross v. Evans, 167 U. S. 60 [42: 77].

By those rules as repeated in these cases from prior decisions, each question had to be a distinct point or proposition of law, clearly stated, so that it could be distinctly answered without regard to the other issues of law in the case; to be a question of law only, and not a question of fact, or of mixed law and fact, and hence could not involve or imply a conclusion or judgment upon the weight or effect of testimony or facts adduced in the case; and could not embrace the whole case, even where its decision turned upon matter of law only, and even though it was split up in the form of questions. Fire Insurance Asso. v. Wickham, 128 U. S. 426 [32: 503]; Dublin Township v. Milford Savings Institution, 128 U. S. 510 [32: 533].

The questions propounded in this certificate do not present distinct points or propositions of law, clearly stated, so that each could be distinctly answered without regard to the other issues of law involved, and they obviously bring the whole case up for consideration and disposition.

Elaborate argument on behalf of the government was made at the bar, dealing with the Delaware treaties of 1831, 1854, 1860, 1861, and 1866, and the construction of various provisions thereof; with the construction of the Pacific Railroad act of July 1, 1862 (12 Stat. at L. 489, chap. 120); and also with the legislation in relation to the incorporation of the Leavenworth, Pawnee, & Western Railroad Company; its change of name; and consolidation with other railroad companies, under the name of the Union Pacific Railway Company. Laws Kan. 1855, p. 914; Act of July 2, 1864 (13 Stat. at L. 356, chap. 216); Resolution of March 3, 1869 (15 Stat. at L. 348); Act of March 3, 1869 (15 Stat. at L. 324, chap. 127).

*Defendants in error contended that [513 the petition was fatally defective in respect of any ground of liability for the improvements; that there was no sale of the improvements separate from the lands; that the stipulated patent carried title to the improvements with the lands; that by § 2 of the Pacific Railroad act of July 1, 1862, the United States granted the right of way through the reservation and undertook to extinguish the Indian title; that the grant was of a free right of way, and the United States were estopped by it from maintaining the second cause of action; that this question was res judicata by the judgment of the supreme court of Kansas in Grinter v. Kansas Pacific Ry. Co. 23 Kan. 642; that the line of the Kansas Pacific Company upon the right of way in question was not the line of the Leavenworth, Pawnee, & Western Railroad Company or its successor, but of an independent corporation created by an act of Congress; and that even on the theory of the government the defense of laches and limitations was available and formed a complete bar.

To answer the questions certified would require us to consider the several matters thus pressed on our attention; to pass upon questions of law not specifically propounded; and to dispose of the whole case. It follows that the certificate is insufficient under the statute.

Certificate dismissed.

Lien claimant's statement—sufficiency of claim—more claimed than due—lands subject to lien—lien for irrigation ditch.

1. A lien claimant's "statement of his demands after deducting all just credit and offset," as required by N. M. Comp. Laws, § 1524, is sufficiently made by stating the amount of balance due after deducting just credits and offsets, for excavating and embankments made under a specific contract, of which a copy is attached to the claim, although it does not state the details of the transaction, or the payments that have been made, or that there had been an estimate and acceptance by the engineer who was to give certificates of performance.
2. A claim of lien naming the person by whom the claimant was employed, and stating the names of the owners or reputed owners of the lands, is not insufficient under N. M. Comp. Laws, § 1524, because it does not state the authority of the person who employed him.
3. The fact that a lien is claimed for a greater sum than is actually owing or is actually covered by the lien does not vitiate the claim when honestly made.
4. The area of land subject to a lien depends on the character of the improvement for which the lien is claimed.
5. A lien for an irrigation ditch extends to the tract of land necessary to a convenient use of the improvement for the purposes contemplated in its construction and benefited thereby.

Argued November 5, 8, 1897. Decided December 13, 1897.

APPEAL from a decree of the Supreme Court of the Territory of New Mexico affirming the decree of the District Court of New Mexico for the County of Colfax in an action to foreclose a mechanic's lien upon an irrigating ditch and reservoir system, the land covered thereby, and the lands intended to be irrigated, the decree being in favor of Patrick P. Ford, plaintiff, against the Springer Land Association et al., for the amount of the lien. Affirmed.

See same case below, 41 Pac. 541.

Statement by Mr. Chief Justice Fuller:

*This was a bill filed by Patrick P. Ford [515 against the Springer Land Association and others in the district court of New Mexico for the county of Colfax, to foreclose a mechanic's lien upon an irrigating ditch and reservoir system; the land covered thereby, the right of way therefor, and the particular lands intended to be irrigated. A cross bill was filed by the Springer Land Association and other defendants. The cause was heard on pleadings and proofs, and on findings of fact and conclusions of law duly made and filed, the district court entered a decree in favor of Ford adjudging a lien for the sum of $22,097.75, with interest and costs, on the ditch and reservoirs in question, together with the right of way, specifically describing them, and also on 22,000 acres of land appurtenant to the ditch and to be irrigated thereby, specifying forty-six sections in four designated townships.

It was further decreed that the Springer Land Association and other defendants pay or cause to be paid the sum found due, with interest and costs ($3,000 thereof to be paid to the clerk of the court), within ninety days, and in case of default that the property be sold by a special master and the proceeds distributed as prescribed, $3,000 to be retained by the clerk of the court to await the determination of a suit by Dargle, a subcontractor, to recover the amount of $2,279.30, with interest and costs, or its payment and discharge by Ford. If a surplus was realized at the sale it was to be held subject to the further order of the court; if a deficiency resulted, the amount was to be reported by the master to the court.

The case was carried to the supreme court of the territory, which found the facts, in substance, to be these:

On October 26, 1888, the Springer Land Association entered into a contract with Patrick P. Ford for the grading work in the construction of a certain ditch line and reservoir system for irrigation in Colfax county, New Mexico, which contract and the specifications forming part of it were set forth at length.

The contract provided: "The party of the first part agrees to furnish all necessary tools 516]and labor and perform all the *work of grading required in the construction of the Cimarron ditch and its accessories. Said work to be done in a thorough and workmanlike manner, and in full accordance with the specifications hereto attached and made a part of this contract. Said first party agrees to begin work within ten days after signing this contract, and to complete the same on or before July 1, 1889. The party of the second part agrees to pay said first party for work so done at the rate of 11 cents per cubic yard, without classification. And the amounts due for said work shall be paid at the time and in the manner described in the specifications hereto attached."

Specification 11 related to allowance for extra work when done under the orders of the engineer.

Specifications 13 and 15 were:

"13. Subcontracts.— Subcontracts must be submitted to the engineer, and receive his approval, before work is begun under them. No second subcontractor will be allowed. Subcontractors will be bound by the same specifications as the contractor, and will be equally under the authority of the engineer."

"15. Estimates.—On or about the 1st day of each current month, the engineer will measure and compute the quantity of material moved by the contractor during the preceding month; he will certify the amount to the company, together with an account of the same at the price stipulated, which amount will be audited by the company without unnecessary delay, and the amount thereof, less ten (10) per cent retained, will be paid to the contractor in cash within ten days thereafter. This retained percentage will be held by the company as a guarantee for the faithful completion of the work, and will be paid in full with the final estimate upon the certificate of the engineer accepting and approving the work, it being expressly understood that the failure of the contractor to fulfil his obligations will work a forfeiture of this retained percentage to the company. The amount due to the contractor under the final estimate will only be paid upon satisfactory showing that the work is free from all danger, from liens or claims of any kind, through failure on his part to liquidate his just indebtedness as connected with this work."

517] *"Previous to the making of the last-mentioned contract and on May 1, 1888, the Maxwell Land Grant Company made a contract with C. C. Strawn and associates, who afterwards organized the Springer Land Association, which succeeded to their rights and obligations, by which the Maxwell Company gave to them a right of way for the proposed irrigation system of ditches and reservoirs, and by which said agreement it was, among other things, provided that with the view of selling certain of its lands at an enhanced value, and in consideration of certain perpetual water rights and franchises, to be granted to it by the other party, it agreed to set apart and reserve from sale 22,000 acres of its lands, to be selected by the other party, and give to the other party a certain portion of the proceeds which might be derived from the sale of said lands when sold. These lands were under the proposed ditch system and to be irrigated by it, and by this agreement Strawn and his associates were to expend about $60,000, or a sufficient sum, to complete the enterprise on the proposed plan." This contract was set forth in extenso.

"The title of the lands at that time and at all times afterwards was and remained in the Maxwell Land Grant Company, except as to the rights acquired by Strawn and associates and their successors in interest under said contract. The same contract constituted Strawn and his associates and successors in interest the agents of the Maxwell Company to the extent of and for the purpose of carrying into effect the spirit and intent of the contract as to the sale of the said lands, but that party, the Springer Land Association, had no other title in the lands than as given by said contract.

"Five days subsequent to the making of his grading contract complainant Ford entered into another contract with the Springer Land Association by which he agreed to select and accept one section of land under the proposed ditch system at the stipulated price of $8,000, to be taken as part payment on the contract price for Ford's grading work, by way of deduction of that sum from the final estimates on the contract for the construction of said ditch.

"The contract of May 1, 1888, designated one E. H. Kellogg *as the engineer to [518 have charge of the construction of said system of ditches and reservoirs. No engineer was named in the contract between Ford and the Springer Land Association of October 26, 1888, but said Kellogg, with the assent of all parties, acted throughout as the supervising engineer.

"Ford let subcontracts for portions of the work to McGarvey, Dargle, and Haynes."

That with Dargle was given in full, and the three were of like form and tenor and approved by the engineer. Each contained this clause: "It is mutually agreed that the amounts of these subestimates will in no case be demanded or paid in advance of the payment of the regular estimate."

Estimates, as provided by the contract of October 26, 1888, were made by the supervising engineer from time to time, which were audited and paid by the Springer Land Association up to about May, 1889.

Estimate No. 6 was dated April 30, 1889, and showed the amount then due and payable, after reserving 10 per cent, to be $5,010.92. The amount of this estimate has never been paid.

June 13, 1889, the engineer gave Ford a written acceptance of the work and a final estimate, set forth at large in the findings. The total amount payable under the contract was $48,553.56. The six prior estimates aggregated $35,928.03, and the last and final estimate was for $12,625.53, but as the sixth estimate of $5,010.92 had not been paid the total amount due was $17,636.45.

"This amount the Springer Land Association refused to audit and pay on the ground that the sum so stated was in excess of the amount due; that the work had not been completed according to contract; that the engineer's final estimate was erroneous either through fraud, inadvertence, or mistake, because the subcontractors had not been paid the several sums due them on the work by Ford, and that the property was not free from danger from liens, and also that Ford should accept the section of land which he had agreed to accept and which he had previously selected in payment of $8,000 of the amount of such final estimate.

"The Springer Land Association procured to 519] be made and *properly executed a deed of conveyance by the Maxwell Land Grant Company, which held the title, to Patrick P. Ford, conveying to him the section of land which had been selected by said Ford, and had the said deed present in the hands of an agent of said Maxwell Company on June 19, 1889, when the representative of the Springer Land Association, said Ford, and his subcontractors met for final settlement; said deed to be delivered to said Ford upon payment to the agent of said Maxwell Company by the Springer Land Association of $4,000. The representative of the Springer Land Association had with him at that time, for the purpose of making settlement with Ford, currency and valid checks on a responsible Chicago bank for $17,000. He notified said agent and Ford that he was ready to pay the $4,000 to the agent of the Maxwell Company for the deed if Ford would settle with his subcontractors. Ford examined the deed and made no objection to it. McGarvey, one of the subcontractors then present, claimed that Ford owed him about $4,000, which Ford disputed as to $300 of it. Ford would not settle unless McGarvey would accept the amount he admitted and give him a receipt in full, which McGarvey refused to do, and claimed that he had a lien on the ditch and reservoir for the amount of his claim. The agent of the Springer Land Association offered to pay the subcontractors directly if Ford would agree with them as to the amounts due them. No settlement was made between Ford and McGarvey. McGarvey then informed the agent of the Springer Land Association that the work was not done according to contract, upon which the latter disputed the correctness of the final estimate and ultimately refused to audit the same. The said disagreement between Ford and subcontractor McGarvey was one of the reasons why the deed was not delivered to Ford. The representative of the Springer Land Association did not tender to the agent of the Maxwell Company the amount due it upon said deed, and that no sufficient tender of the deed was made to Ford to require him in law to accept it."

The sums claimed by the several subcontractors at that time amounted to $7,537.72.

520] *Thereupon, on July 3, 1889, complainant Ford filed his notice of claim of lien for $17,634.27 alleged to be due on the contract, including all moneys due subcontractors at that time; and $390 for extra work.

This claim asserted a lien on the ditch and right of way and the 22,000 acres of land to secure the payment of said two sums according to the contract, a copy of which and the specifications was attached to and made part of the claim; stated when the work was commenced, completed, and accepted; made the Springer Land Association and others, and the Maxwell Land Grant Company and others, parties to the notice; gave the Maxwell Land Grant Company and others as the reputed owners; stated that claimant was employed to do the work "by the Springer Land Association, C. N. Barnes, general manager, approved by C. C. Strawn as president;" and that "the terms, time given, and conditions of said contract are those that fully appear in the copy of the said contract which is attached hereto and made a part hereof." It was properly verified, duly filed and recorded, and action commenced within the statutory time.

McGarvey and Dargle, subcontractors, filed notices of liens and commenced suits, and Dargle's suit was pending at the date of the decree.

"It appears by the admissions in the pleadings and from the testimony that the 22,000 acres of land outside of the ditches and reservoirs and the right of way for the same were appurtenant to said ditch and reservoirs—were under said ditch and to be irrigated thereby; that the same were included within the sections described in the notice of lien and bill of complaint. It does not appear that the particular sections described were selected or segregated by the Springer Land Association under its contract of May 1, 1888, as capable of irrigation, and it does appear that in a number of the said sections only portions of the section were selected, because a number of them were not flooded or situated so as to be overflowed with water or irrigated from the ditch. All of said *sections were situated[521 between the line of said ditch and the river, and were enhanced in value by reason of its construction.

"It appears that complainant Ford paid to his several subcontractors all amounts due them under the first five monthly estimates, but at the time of the commencement of this suit had not paid what was due them under the sixth estimate (May, 1889) nor under the final estimate of June 13, 1889."

It was also found that there was no collusion between Ford and the engineer as charged in the cross bill; that the acceptance by the engineer was conclusive, and the amount shown by his estimates correct.

The decree was affirmed (41 Pac. Rep. 541) and an appeal was then taken to this court.

Errors were assigned as follows:

"1. That the claim or notice of lien to foreclose which this suit was brought was insufficient in law to create a lien.

"2. That the amount claimed and adjudged as a lien was excessive, and included claims not due or payable.

"3. That the final estimate was not payable by reason of the existence of liens of subcontractors.

"4. That defendant should be entitled to be credited with the sum of $8,000 on the final estimate, on account of land which was to have been taken in payment thereon.

"5. That no lien attached to the land outside of the ditches, reservoirs, and the right of way for the same."

The Compiled Laws of New Mexico of 1884, tit. 24, chap 1, contain these sections:

"Sec. 1519. A lien is a charge imposed upon specific property, by which it is made security for the performance of an act.

"Sec. 1520. Every person performing labor upon, or furnishing materials to be used in the construction, alteration, or repair of, any mining claim, building, wharf, bridge, ditch, flume, tunnel, fence, machinery, railroad, wagon road, or aqueduct to create hydraulic power, or any other structure, or who performs labor in any mining claim, has a lien upon the same for the work or labor done or materials furnished by each, respectively, whether done or 522]furnished at the instance of the *owner of the building or other improvement or his agent; and every contractor, subcontractor, architect, builder, or other person having charge of any mining, or of the construction, alteration, or repair, either in whole or in part, of any building or other improvement, as aforesaid, shall be held to be the agent of the owner, for the purposes of this act."

"Sec. 1522. The land upon which any building, improvement, or structure is constructed, together with a convenient space about the same, or so much as may be required for the convenient use and occupation thereof, to be determined by the court on rendering judgment, is also subject to the lien, if at the commencement of the work, or of the furnishing the materials for the same, the land belonged to the person who caused said building, improvement, or structure to be constructed, altered, or repaired, but if such person owned less than a fee-simple estate in such land, then only his interest therein is subject to such lien."

"Sec. 1524. Every original contractor, within ninety days after the completion of his contract, and every person, save the original contractor, claiming the benefit of this act, must, within sixty days after the completion of any building, improvement, or structure, or after the completion of the alteration or repair thereof, or the performance of any labor in a mining claim, file for record with the county recorder of the county in which such property or some part thereof is situated, a claim containing a statement of his demands, after deducting all just credit and offset, with the name of the owner or reputed owner, if known, and also the name of the person by whom he was employed, or to whom he furnished the materials, with a statement of the terms, time given, and conditions of his contract, and also a description of the property to be charged with the lien, sufficient for identification, which claim must be verified by the oath of himself or some other person."

"Sec. 1526. The recorder must record the claim in a book kept by him for that purpose, which record must be indexed as deeds and other conveyances are required by law to be indexed; and for which he may receive the same 523]fees as are *allowed by law for recording deeds and other instruments."

"Sec. 1529. Every building or other improvement mentioned in § 1520, constructed upon any lands with the knowledge of the owner or the person having or claiming any interest therein, shall be held to have been constructed at the instance of such owner or person having or claiming any interest therein, and the interest owned or claimed shall be subject to any lien filed in accordance with the provisions of this act; unless such owner or person having or claiming an interest therein shall, within three days after he shall have obtained knowledge of the construction, alteration, or repair, or the intended construction, alteration, or repair, give notice that he will not be responsible for the same, by posting a notice in writing to the effect, in some conspicuous place upon said land, or upon the building or other improvement situated thereon.

"Sec. 1530. The contractor shall be entitled to recover upon a lien filed by him only such amount as may be due to him according to the terms of his contract, after deducting all claims of subcontractors under him who have filed liens for work done and materials furnished, as aforesaid, and in all cases where a lien shall be filed under this act for work done or materials furnished to any contractor, he shall defend any action brought thereupon at his own expense; and during the pendency of such action the owner may withhold from the contractor the amount of money for which lien is filed, and in case of judgment against the owner, or his property, upon the lien, the said owner shall be entitled to deduct from any amount due, or to become due, by him to the contractor the amount of such judgment and costs; and if the amount of such judgment and costs shall exceed the amount due by him to the contractor, or if the owner shall have settled with the contractor in full, he shall be entitled to recover back from the contractor any amount so paid by him, the said owner, in excess of the contract price, and for which the contractor was originally the party liable."

Although mechanics' liens are the creation of statute, the legislation being remedial should be so construed as to effectuate its object. Davis v. Alford, 94 U. S. 545 [24: 283]; Flagstaff Silver Mining Co. v. Cullins, 104 U. S. 176 [26: 704].

Substantial compliance, in good faith, with the requirements of the particular law is sufficient, and the test of such compliance is to be found in the statute itself.

These enactments vary in the different states and territories, and to the variance in their terms judicial decisions necessarily conform.

Section 1524 of the Compiled Laws of New Mexico required the contractor, in order to obtain the benefit of the act, to file for record "a claim containing a statement of his demands, after deducting all just credit and offset, with the name of the owner, or reputed owner, if known, and also the name of the person by whom he was employed, or to whom he furnished the materials."

The claim duly filed by Ford was preceded by a title describing the Springer Land Association and others and the Maxwell Land Grant Company and others, as "owners or reputed owners;" and stated a demand for the sum of $17,634.27, as "the balance due and owing to the said Patrick P. Ford, by the aforesaid owners, or reputed owners, after deducting all just credits and offsets for excavating and embankments done and performed by him under a certain contract entered into by the said the Springer Land Association, a copy of which contract is hereto annexed and made a part of this claim of lien. As also for the further sum of three hundred and ninety dollars ($390) for excavating and hauling, ordered by the engineer in charge of said ditch, and allowed by him in pursuance of the provisions 525] of said contract;" and it *stated when the work was commenced and when it was finished, and that on the last date it was "completed and accepted." It gave the names of the reputed owners of the land as the Maxwell Land Grant Company and others, enumerating them, trustees of that company; and alleged that claimant "was employed to do the said work by the Springer Land Association, C. N. Barnes, general manager, approved by C. C. Strawn as president." And it added that "the terms, time given, and conditions of said contract are those that fully appear in the copy of said contract which is attached hereto and made a part hereof."

We entirely agree with the supreme court of the territory that this claim of lien was sufficient under the statute in respect of all these particulars. It is attacked by counsel for appellants because containing "no statement of the amount of work done; nor of the payments made; nor the estimate or acceptance by the engineer;" and also because "erroneous as to the party from whom due." But this statute did not require, as many such statutes do, "a just and true account," or a "full and true account" of the details of the transaction, and this work was done under a special contract, at so much per cubic yard, to be paid for on engineer's certificates. In our judgment Ford's statement of his demands, with the copy of the contract and specifications annexed, was in reasonable and adequate compliance with the statute.

As to the name of the person by whom Ford was employed, the claim was specific; and the names of the owners or reputed owners of the lands, and their connection with the transaction, were also given with sufficient clearness. With reference to similar statutory provisions, the supreme court of California in Hender Lumber Company v. Gottschalk, 81 Cal. 641, 646, said: "There is nothing in the section, or any other, that requires the materialman to state in his claim of lien what relation the person to whom he furnished the material bore to the owner, whether contractor or agent; nor does the burden of determining whether any contract made, or attempted to be made, between the owner and contractor, was valid or not, rest on him when he comes to file his lien.
526] *He must state the facts required by the statute. Whether the person to whom he furnished the material had authority to bind the owner, and entitle the materialman to a lien, is a matter of pleading and proof at the trial." And in Jewell v. McKay, 82 Cal. 144, it was held that it was not even necessary that the notice of lien should state that the owner of the land had knowledge of the work.

By § 1520 of this statute a lien is given for work or labor done at the instance of the owner of the improvement "or his agent;" by § 1529 it is provided that every improvement "constructed upon any lands with the knowledge of the owner or the person having or claiming any interest therein, shall be held to have been constructed at the instance of such owner or person having or claiming any interest therein," unless he shall give notice that he will not be responsible for the same; and by § 1522, the land upon which any improvement is constructed, "together with a convenient space about the same," is also subject to the lien if at the commencement of the work it belonged to the person who caused the improvement to be constructed.

The contract of May, 1888, between the Maxwell Land Grant Company and those who afterwards constituted the Springer Land Association was entered into for the construction of this irrigating system, and it expressly made the Springer Land Association "the agent of the Maxwell Land Grant Company," with power to do all acts necessary to carry out the proposed improvement, and to sell and dispose of the lands designed to be benefited thereby; and the findings of the supreme court were to the effect that the Maxwell Land Grant Company was the person at whose instance the improvement was made, and knew at the time that the work was being carried on.

The courts below concurred in their findings that the amounts demanded were the amounts due, and the decree provided for the payment of the only outstanding claim of a subcontractor. But it is urged that the aggregate claimed in the notice of lien was so excessive as to invalidate the lien in whole or in part.

*We do not understand that as between 527] the parties the fact that a lien is claimed for a greater sum than is actually owing, or is actually covered by the lien, vitiates the claim when honestly made; and under the findings it is impossible to impute bad faith in this instance.

The contract contained this provision: "The amount due to the contractor under the final estimate will only be paid upon satisfactory showing that the work is free from all danger of liens or claims of all kinds, through failure on his part to liquidate his just indebtedness as connected with this work."

And it is said that "the final estimate of $12,625.53 was not yet due," in that the subcontractors had not been paid in full, and the work, therefore, was not free from all danger of liens. The findings show, however, that by the contracts between Ford and his subcontractors, approved by the supervising engineer, the amounts due the subcontractors, on monthly subestimates, were in no case to "be demanded or paid in advance of the payment of the regular estimate;" that Ford on payment of the regular estimates had paid his subcontractors in full; and that the subestimates for May and the final subestimates had not been paid because appellants had not paid Ford his May and final estimates under their contract with him. The May estimate due him was for $5,010.43, and the balance of $12,625.53 contained nearly $4,000 of retained percentage, being 10 per cent of the amount due for work done up to the time the May estimate was issued; while the amounts claimed by the subcontractors on the completion of the work aggregated $7,537.72. It is quite clear that if there were any danger from liens or claims of any kind, this was not "through failure on his part to liquidate his just indebtedness as connected with this work," but solely by reason of the failure to pay him according to the terms of the contract. And it should be noted that the correctness of Ford's claim does not appear to have been questioned until the 19th of June, 1889, when one of the subcontractors having become involved in a dispute with Ford over the sum of $300, suggested to the Springer Land Association that the work had not been done according to the 528] contract, *a suggestion which the findings show was without foundation.

Appellants' counsel further contended that the lien was excessive because appellants were entitled to a credit of $8,000 for land which Ford had agreed to accept in part payment of the final estimate.

At the conference, on the 19th of June, 1889, between the agents of the Maxwell Land Grant Company and of the Springer Land Association, Ford, and the subcontractors, the Maxwell agent had in his possession a deed conveying a section of land to Ford, which he notified the Springer agent he was ready to deliver upon the payment of $4,000 by the Springer Land Association. The Springer agent responded that he was willing to pay the $4,000 if Ford would settle with the subcontractors, but he did not perform the condition and accept the deed. Nor was any tender of the deed made to Ford, who was simply informed that if he would, compulsorily, do that which the default of the Springer Company had theretofore rendered impracticable, then the Springer agent would obtain the deed for delivery to Ford. Nor did it appear that since that day there had been any offer to deliver, or a declaration of a willingness to deliver, the deed. The findings show that Ford carried out the conditions of the contract by him to be kept and performed; that he made no objection to the deed, and would have been willing to receive it, but for appellants' failure on their part; and they cannot now be allowed to insist that Ford should be required to accept what they have not indicated a willingness or readiness to deliver; still less that the lien should be held invalidated because Ford did not credit $8,000 for land never conveyed to him.

Finally it is objected that the demand of $390 for extra work rendered the entire claim of lien inefficacious, but it is obvious that this was not an overstatement which could have that effect. Though there is no specific finding by the supreme court in reference to this item, the findings of the district court show that the extra work was performed under the direction of the engineer, and that the bills therefor were approved by him to an amount 529] exceeding this minor demand, *which under the specifications appellants were bound to pay. It was properly included in the notice of lien, and, being manifestly due, the decree ought not to be reversed or even modified, because it formed part of the amount decreed.

The last error assigned is that no lien attached to the land outside of the ditches, reservoirs, and the right of way to the same.

The statute gave a lien for labor performed or materials furnished in the construction of ditches, not only on the ditch and the land through which it was constructed, but on so much of the land about the same as might be required for its use, "to be determined by the court on rendering judgment."

This tract of 22,000 acres was the tract for whose irrigation the ditch was constructed and by which it was to be benefited. The ditch and the land were inseparably connected as parts of the common enterprise, and to sever the ditch from the land would render the ditch practically valueless. The claim of lien stated, the bill in this case averred, and the answer admitted, that Ford contracted to perform the work of grading required in the construction of the Cimarron ditch and its accessories, the ditch being situated as described; and "that the said ditch has and appurtenant thereto along its entire length, land as passageway about 60 feet in width; as also lateral ditches and reservoirs, and the land covered thereby, and also appurtenant to said ditch, 22,000 acres of land in said county, and under said ditch, and to be irrigated thereby, and described as follows," namely, certain sections enumerated.

The contract with the Maxwell Land Grant Company showed that it caused the improvement to be made for the purpose of supplying water to the entire acreage under the ditch, and, in consideration of the construction of the improvement, gave to the Springer Land Association an interest in the 22,000 acre tract. The improvement was projected and constructed upon the property as an entirety, though the contract contemplated that after its completion the tract should be cut up and sold in small holdings, the Maxwell Company manifestly causing the improvement to be made for the express purpose of rendering the land salable.

*To limit the land upon which the lien[530 was given to the strip of land 60 feet in width and 26 miles long, which was actually occupied by the ditch, and exclude the tract which the ditch was constructed to benefit by its continuous operation, would, it seems to us, be to unreasonably circumscribe the meaning of the statute. And appellants' pleading not only admitted that all of the 22,000 acre tract was appurtenant to the improvement and benefited by it, but the courts of New Mexico distinctly found this to be so, and that the tract was necessary to the convenient use of the improvement for the purposes contemplated in its construction.

The truth is that what area of land is subject to lien in a given case largely depends on the character of the improvement. The extent of ground proper and necessary to the enjoyment of a building, a wall, or a fence, would not be the same as that required for or appertaining to an irrigation system, but the principle of determination is the same.

This ditch was to expend its waters on this tract and could not be used or operated without it. Each was dependent on the other, and both were bound together in the accomplishment of a common purpose. The lien must apply to the entire tract or be confined to the right of way through which it took its course, and to narrow it down to the latter would be to disregard the very terms of the statute.

Appellants admitted the tract to appertain to the ditch and the supreme court so found, and that it was required for the use and operation thereof. We perceive no adequate ground for declining to accept that conclusion.

The description of the land was by sections and townships, and forty-six sections were enumerated. As the sections, if full, would contain 29,440 acres, and as the enterprise embraced 22,000 acres—though it was estimated by the Maxwell contract that the ultimate capacity of the ditch might be adequate to the irrigation of 30,000 acres—it is insisted that the description was void for uncertainty or that the decree was erroneous as including more land than could on any theory be held to appertain to the ditch. But a Con-
531] gressional *township of thirty-six sections does not necessarily contain thirty-six times 640 acres; and subdivision 5th of § 2395 of the Revised Statutes provides: "Where the exterior lines of the townships which may be subdivided into sections or half sections exceed, or do not extend 6 miles, the excess or deficiency shall be specially noted, and added to or deducted from the western and northern ranges of sections or half sections in such township, according as the error may be in running the lines from east to west, or from north to south."

The supreme court pointed out that sixteen of these sections were bounded by the northern and western lines, and held that the court might as well presume that the alleged discrepancy was accounted for by a deficiency in the government surveys, as that the forty-six sections contained the full quantity. And it should be remembered that the acreage occupied by the ditch, the lateral ditches, and reservoirs must have been considerable.

Again, as the supreme court said, quantity in description must yield to definite description by metes and bounds, or by name and number. Quantity may aid but cannot control such description.

The claim of lien, after describing the ditch, its accessories, and right of way, and the 22,000 acres, added, "all of which ditch, laterals, and reservoirs and lands as aforesaid are plotted and laid out on the plan hereto attached and made a part of this claim of lien." This was so stated in the bill and admitted in the answer.

While one of the findings is somewhat obscure, and, standing alone, might create a doubt as to the identification of the particular tract, yet the findings taken together and in connection with the plat evidently made this certain; and as the correctness of the description and acreage was admitted, any contention in this regard comes too late.

The supreme court expressly found that it appeared "by the admissions in the pleadings and from the testimony that the 22,000 acres of land outside the ditches and reservoirs and the right of way for the same were appurtenant 532] to said ditch and *reservoirs and were under said ditch and to be irrigated thereby."

We think it cannot now be urged that the description was void for uncertainty, or that the decree included more land than was connected with the ditch.

Decree affirmed.

UNITED STATES.

Confession of accused—used to his prejudice—estoppel—violation of Constitution—voluntary character of confession—circumstances of its being made—when inadmissible—sufficiency of indictment—grand juror allowed to affirm—admissibility of evidence.

1. Where a conversation with the accused is offered in evidence as a confession, and is admissible only as a confession, the measure of proof resulting from it is not to be considered in determining its admissibility.
2. The use which was made of the prisoner's statement precludes the state from saying that it was not used to his prejudice.
3. The prosecution cannot offer illegal evidence to prove guilt, and then, for the purpose of avoiding the consequence of its wrongful admission, be heard to assert that the evidence was Confessions of accused, when admissible in evidence against him; when not admissible.

The hope of immunity where no promise has been made is not such inducement as to make inadmissible a confession by defendant charged with murder. State v. Griffin, 48 La. Ann. 1409.

A confession made by one of two persons jointly indicted for murder, implicating the other, which is brought out in impeachment of his denial of the confession on cross-examination as a witness for the defense, should not be allowed to go to the jury as substantive evidence of the guilt of the one implicated thereby, but should be limited to the purposes of impeachment. State v. Reed, 49 La. Ann. 704.

A written statement in the nature of a confession, voluntarily made and sworn to at an inquest by defendant charged with burning a building, after he has been warned that he is not obliged to incriminate himself, is admissible against him. Com. v. Wesley, 166 Mass. 248.

That statements by accused to an officer while under arrest have a tendency when considered with other facts to prove guilt does not constitute them confessions within the rule requiring preliminary proof of the voluntary character of confessions before their admission. People v. Hickman, 113 Cal. 80.

A confession by one charged with murder after his arrest and while confined in jail, made to the county attorney for whom the accused sent of his own accord, is not involuntary so as to be inadmissible in evidence because the accused was in terror of a mob or because confessions had previously been obtained from him by other persons by improper means. Laughlin v. Com. 18 Ky. L. Rep. 640.

A confession by a boy fifteen years old in jail on not prejudicial because it did not tend to prove guilt.

4. A confession which is not voluntary is not admissible in evidence under the Fifth Amendment to the Federal Constitution, declaring that no person shall be compelled in a criminal case to be a witness against himself.

5. The voluntary character of an alleged confession depends on the question whether the making of the statement was voluntary and without inducement or compulsion, and not whether the particular communications contained in it were voluntary or not.

6. The mere fact that a confession is made to a police officer while the accused is under arrest, in or out of prison, or is drawn out by his questions, does not necessarily render the confession involuntary; but, as one of the circumstances, such imprisonment or interrogation may be taken into account in determining whether or not the statements made by the prisoner are voluntary.

7. The statement of an accused person while under arrest in a foreign country and in the office of a detective, where he has been or is being stripped of his clothing, and is charged with having committed a murder on the high seas, and told that his cosuspect had charged him with the crime, and that if he had an accomplice he should say so and not have the blame of the horrible crime on his own shoulders, cannot be admitted as a voluntary confession because of any implication of guilt from his reply.

8. The recital in an indictment, that it was presented "upon the oath" of the jurors, when in fact one of them affirmed, instead of taking the oath, does not render the indictment invalid, as the defect, if any, is harmless under U. S. Rev. Stat. § 1025.

9. Failure to show, either in the indictment or in the proof, that a grand juror who was allowed to affirm had conscientious scruples against taking an oath, does not render the indictment void.

10. The indirect effect of evidence to fortify the credit of a witness cannot affect its admissibility if it is relevant to the issue.

11. The opinion of a medical witness whether or not a man standing at the hip of a recumbent person, and striking blows on that person's head and forehead with an axe, would necessarily be spattered with or covered with some of the blood,—is admissible.

a charge of murder in the first degree is not incompetent merely because made to a detective assuming to be in jail on a similar charge and to be planning an escape, in the absence of any persuasion, promise, or threats by the latter. Burton v. State, 107 Ala. 109.

A statement by defendant in a prosecution for murder to the officer who arrested him, with reference to the motive actuating him in striking the deceased, is admissible, where the officers have testified that neither they, nor anyone to their knowledge, made any threat against the defendant, or told him it would be better to make a statement, or offered any inducement whatever to him to make a statement. Simon v. State, 108 Ala. 27.

A confession by the accused of a crime other than that charged, while not admissible as a substantive fact, may, when not separable from a competent confession, go to the jury under cautionary directions from the court. Gore v. People, 162 Ill. 259.

Confessions offered under conflicting proof as to whether they were or were not voluntary may be considered under instruction to disregard them if the jury are satisfied that they were involuntary. Burdge v. State, 53 Ohio St. 512.

That a confession was made under excitement, and while in a state of great nervousness, does not deprive it of its character as a voluntary statement. State v. Jones, 47 La. Ann. 1524.

No preliminary inquiry to determine whether a confession was voluntary is necessary before admitting it in evidence, where the circumstances already proved show that it must have been voluntary. People v. Kamaunu, 110 Cal. 609.

The substance of a confession may be given in evidence without giving the exact words. State v. Desroches, 48 La. Ann. 428.

The actual commission of a robbery by an alleged accomplice of defendant cannot be proved by the extrajudicial confessions of such accomplice,—especially where they are not made within the presence or hearing of defendant. People v. Oldham, 111 Cal. 648.

The mere presence of officers when a confession of crime is made is not an influence which renders the confession inadmissible. Pierce v. United States, 160 U. S. 355 (40: 454.)

That a confession was made to a jailer while defendant was in close confinement does not deprive it of its character as a voluntary statement. State v. Jones, 47 La. Ann. 1524.

Any degree of influence exerted in obtaining a confession, by any person having authority over the charge against a prisoner or over his person, will prevent its use as evidence against him. Robinson v. People, 159 Ill. 115.

On the trial of an indictment for murder it appeared that the prisoner, who was an ignorant Italian laborer, unfamiliar with the English language, was arrested, without warrant, as the suspected murderer, and while under arrest was taken by the officer having him in charge before a coroner's inquest, and, after proof had been given of the homicide, was examined on oath by the district attorney and the coroner as to circumstances tending to connect him with the crime. It did not appear that he was informed that he was not bound to answer questions tending to criminate himself. It was error to permit the prosecution to prove, under objections and exceptions, the statements so made by the prisoner. People v. Mondon, 103 N. Y. 211, 57 Am. Rep. 709.

In People v. McMahon, 15 N. Y. 384, the defendant was arrested by a constable, without warrant, on a charge of having murdered his wife. The constable took him before the coroner, who was holding an inquest on the body, by whom he was sworn and examined as a witness. It was held that the evidence thus given was not admissible on the prisoner's trial for the murder, and his conviction was reversed upon that ground. In the judgment, all the judges who heard the case concurred. People v. Mondon, 103 N. Y. 217, 57 Am. Rep. 709.

Where a prisoner, in speaking of the testimony of a witness against him, said "that what C said was true as far as he went, but that he did not say all, or enough," it was held that this remark was not admissible as a confession. The court in this case said: "The objection to the evidence is, that in reality the prisoner made no confession of guilt at all; the conversation was rather a declaration of innocence than a confession of guilt." Finn v. Com. 5 Rand. (Va.) 701.

The real question is whether there has been any threat or promise of such a nature that the prisoner would be likely to tell an untruth from fear of the threat or hope of profit from the promise.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Massachusetts to review a judgment of that court adjudging Thomas Bram to be guilty of murder and condemning him to suffer death; the homicide being committed on the high seas. Reversed, with directions for a new trial.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. James E. Cotter and Asa P. French for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. James E. Boyd, Assistant Attorney General, and John K. Richards, Solicitor General, for defendant in error.

Mr. Justice White delivered the opinion of the court:

This writ of error is prosecuted to a verdict and sentence thereon, by which the plaintiff was found guilty of murder, and condemned to suffer death. The homicide was committed on board the American ship Herbert Fuller while on the high seas bound from Boston to a port in South America. The accused was the first officer of the ship, and the deceased, of whose murder he was convicted, was the master of the vessel. The bill of exceptions, after stating the sailing of the vessel from Boston on the 2d of July, 1896, with a cargo of lumber, gives a general summary of the facts leading up to and surrounding the homicide as follows:

She had on board a captain, Charles I. Nash; Bram, the defendant; a second mate, August W. Blomberg; a steward, and six seamen; also the captain's wife, Laura A. Nash, and one passenger, Lester H. Monks.

The vessel proceeded on her course toward her port of destination until the night between July 13 and July 14. On that night at 12 o'clock the second mate's watch was relieved by the mate's watch, of which Bram, the defendant, was *the officer in charge. The cap-[535 tain, his wife, the passenger Monks, and the

Where the confession is induced by the actual infliction of pain it will, of course, be inadmissible in evidence. Hector v. State, 2 Mo. 166, 22 Am. Dec. 454.

The rule has long been settled in our law that while free and voluntary confession of guilt is of the highest order of evidence, one extorted is never received. Miller v. People, 39 Ill. 457.

Confessions of a defendant indicted for larceny, made to the prosecutor and owner of the property stolen, upon inducements held out by him that if the defendant would disclose his evidence he would use his influence to get him acquitted, are not admissible in evidence against him. People v. Smith, 15 Cal. 409.

Confessions of a prisoner charged with murder, that he committed the crime, are incompetent, if fairly traceable, as the inciting cause, to a promise made by the chief prosecuting attorney, that if the prisoner would confess he would do all he could to save him. Simmons v. State, 61 Miss. 243.

Where a person assumes the guilt of the prisoner, as where he states to him, "You have got your foot in it, and somebody else was with you; now, if you did break open the door, the best thing you can do is to tell all about it, and to tell who was with you, and to tell the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth,"—it was held that a confession in response to this statement had the effect to impress upon the prisoner's mind that he would fare better by confessing his guilt of the crime, and this inducement vitiates any confession evoked under its influence. Kelly v. State, 72 Ala. 244.

The remark made to the prisoner, Now kneel you down: I am going to ask you a very serious question, and I hope you will tell me the truth in the presence of the Almighty,—has been held not to render a confession inadmissible. Rex v. Wild, 1 Moody, C. C. 452.

Also the remark, "Don't run your soul into more sin, but tell the truth," has been held not to make a confession inadmissible. Reg. v. Sleeman, 6 Cox, C. C. 245.

Also, the remark to a prisoner, "An honest confession is good for the soul," has been held not to render a confession inadmissible in evidence. Matthews v. State, 9 Lea, 124, 42 Am. Rep. 667.

In People v. Barker, 60 Mich. 277, it was held that where confessions were made by the accused to a detective, falsely pretending to be the counsel of the accused, they were not to be admitted in evidence. State v. Russell, 83 Wis. 337.

A confession made by a prisoner is not involuntary merely because it was made while in custody, to the sheriff who had arrested him. Murphy v. People, 63 N. Y. 590.

Confessions made without inducement to the chief of police, by a prisoner immediately after his arrest, are admissible against him. Com. v. Sheehan, 163 Mass. 170; People v. Wentz, 37 N. Y. 303.

Where the prosecutor asked the defendant for the money which he had taken, and, before it was produced, said: "I only want my money, and if you give me that, you may go to the devil if you please," upon which the defendant took part of the money from his pocket, and said that was all he had left, a majority of the judges held that the evidence was inadmissible. Rex v. Jones, Russ. & R. C. C. 152; Rex v. Parratt, 4 Car. & P. 570.

A voluntary statement by defendant charged with murder, after a warning that any statement he may make will be used against him, and he need say nothing about it unless he desires to do so, is admissible in evidence. Com. v. Bezek, 168 Pa. 603.

A confession voluntarily made to one not an officer or having control over the accused, without any inducement held out, is admissible against the accused. State v. Hedgepath, 125 Mo. 14.

A witness is competent to testify to a confession which he swears was made by the accused to a third person in the dark, although he did not see the accused, but only knew him by his voice, as the sufficiency of the identification is for the jury. Fussell v. State, 93 Ga. 450.

Any sufficient testimony to rebut the presumption that a confession which was prompted by any degree of influence which has been exerted upon the person making it will justify the court in admitting such confession. Bartley v. People, 156 Ill. 234.

A confession is admissible against a codefendant who was present and remained silent when it was made. Sparf v. United States, 156 U. S. 51, 115 (39: 343, 366).

A confession is competent evidence, although threats and promises have been made, where it satisfactorily appears that it was not induced thereby. Bartley v. People, 156 Ill. 234.

A confession of murder by defendant to a detective not known to be such, upon his promise that if she would tell him "all about it," he would give her something so that she could not be "caught" is admissible in evidence. State v. Harrison, 115 N. C. 706.

first mate, and the second mate, all lived in the aftercabin, occupying separate rooms. . . . The crew and the steward slept forward in the forward house.

When the watch was changed at midnight, Bram, the defendant, took the deck; the seamen Loheac and Perdok went forward on the lookout, and Charles Brown, otherwise called Justus Leopold Westerberg, his true name, took the wheel, where it was his duty to remain till 2 o'clock, at about which time he was relieved by Loheac. The second mate went to his room and the seamen of his watch to their quarters at 12 midnight, and there was no evidence that any of them or the steward appeared again till daylight.

The passenger Monks, who occupied a room on the starboard side of the cabin, between the chart room where the captain slept and the room on the forward starboard side where Mrs. Nash slept, with doors opening from the passenger's room into both the chart room used by the captain as his room and that of Mrs. Nash, was aroused not far from 2 o'clock—the exact time is not known, as he says—by a scream, and by another sound characterized by him as a gurgling sound. He arose, went to the captain's room, and found the captain's cot overturned and the captain lying on the floor by it. He spoke, but got no answer; put his hand on the captain's body and found it damp or wet. He then went to Mrs. Nash's room, did not see her, but saw dark spots on her bedding, and suspected something wrong. He went on deck and called the mate, the defendant, telling him the captain was killed. Both went below, took down the lantern hanging in the main cabin, burning dimly, turned it up and went through the captain's room to the passenger's room, and the passenger there put on a shirt and pantaloons. They then both returned to the deck, the mate on the way stopping a brief time in his own room. Bram and Monks remained talking on deck till about daybreak, when the steward was called and told what had happened. Up to this time no call had been made for the second mate nor had anyone visited his room. Later it was found that Captain 536] Nash, his wife, and *Blomberg, the second mate, were all dead, each with several wounds upon the head, apparently given with a sharp instrument like an axe, penetrating the skull and into the substance of the brain, and the second mate lying on his back with his feet crossed, in his berth; Mrs. Nash, in her bed, in her room, and at the back side of the bed, and Captain Nash in his room as already stated.

The whole crew was called at or about daylight and informed of the deaths.

The bodies were removed from the cabin and placed in the jolly boat, and the boat was towed astern to Halifax. The cabin was then locked, Bram taking the keys, and it remained locked till the vessel reached Halifax.

At first, after the discovery of the murders, there was some hesitancy as to where the vessel should go. At the defendant's suggestion she was headed to go to Cayenne, in French Guiana, but the plan was changed and she steered for Halifax, Nova Scotia, where she arrived July 21, and was taken possession of by the local authorities at the instance of the consul-general of the United States.

At first, after the discovery of the murders, Bram, on whom had devolved the command of the ship, made Brown chief mate and Loheac second mate.

No blood or spots of blood were ever discovered on the person or the clothing of any person on board, nor did anything direct suspicion to anyone.

In a day or two, suspicion having been excited in respect to the seaman Brown, the crew, under the supervision of Bram, seized him, he not resisting, and put him in irons. All the while the officers and seamen remained on deck. Bram navigated the ship until Sunday before they reached Halifax on Tuesday, and after the land of Nova Scotia was in sight, when, Brown having stated to his shipmates, or some of them, that he saw into the cabin through a window in the afterpart and on the starboard side of the house, and saw Bram, the mate, kill the captain. In consequence of this statement of Brown, the crew, led by the steward, suddenly overpowered the mate and put him in irons, he making no resistance, but *declaring his innocence. Bram and [537
Brown were both carried into Halifax in irons.

The bill of exceptions further states that when the ship arrived at Halifax the accused and Brown were held in custody by the chief of police at that place, and that whilst in such custody the accused was taken from prison to the office of a detective and there questioned under circumstances to be hereafter stated. Subsequently to this occurrence at Halifax, all the officers, the crew, and the passenger, were examined before the American consul and gave their statements, which were reduced to writing and sworn to. They were thereafter, at the request of the American consul, sent to Boston, where the accused was indicted for the murder of Nash, the captain, of Mrs. Nash, and the second mate Blomberg. The trial and the conviction, now under review, related to the first of these charges. The errors which are here assigned as grounds for reversal are more than sixty in number, and are classified by the counsel for the accused as follows: (a) Questions raised preliminary to the trial. (b) Questions raised during the trial. (c) Questions raised in connection with two motions for a new trial.

We first examine the error relied on which seems to us deserving of the most serious consideration. During the trial a detective by whom the accused was questioned whilst at Halifax was placed upon the stand as a witness for the prosecution, for the purpose of testifying to the conversation had between himself and the accused at Halifax, at the time and place already stated. What took place between the accused and the detective at the time of the conversation, and what occurred when the witness was tendered in order to prove the confession, is thus stated in the bill of exceptions:

Nicholas Power, of Halifax, called by the government, testified that he was connected with the police department of Halifax, and had been for thirty-two years, and for the last fifteen years of that time as a detective officer; that after the arrival of the Herbert Fuller at Halifax, in consequence of a conversation with

Charles Brown, he made an examination of Bram, the defendant, in the witness's office, 538] in the city hall at *Halifax, when no one was present besides Bram and the witness. The witness testified that no threats were made in any way to Bram, nor any inducements held out to him.

The witness was then asked: "What did you say to him and he to you?"

To this the defendant's counsel objected. The defendant's counsel was permitted to cross-examine the witness before the court ruled upon the objection, and the witness stated that the conversation took place in his office, where he had caused the defendant Bram to be brought by a police officer; that up to that time the defendant had been in the custody of the police authorities of Halifax, in the custody of the superintendent of police, John O'Sullivan; that the witness asked that the defendant should be brought to his office for the purpose of interviewing him; that at his office he stripped the defendant and examined his clothing, but not his pockets; that he told the defendant to submit to an examination, and that he searched him; that the defendant was then in custody and did everything the witness directed him to do; that the witness was then a police officer acting in his official capacity; that all this took place before the defendant had been examined before the United States consul, and that the witness did not know that the local authorities had at that time taken any action, but that the defendant was held for the United States—for the consul general of the United States.

The witness answered questions by the court as follows:

Q. You say there was no inducement to him in the way of promise or expectation of advantage?

A. Not any, your honor.

Q. Held out?

A. Not any, your honor.

Q. Nor anything said, in the way of suggestion to him that he might suffer if he did not —that it might be worse for him?

A. No, sir; not any.

Q. So far as you were concerned, it was entirely voluntary?

A. Voluntary, indeed.

539] *Q. No influence on your part exerted to persuade him one way or the other?

A. None whatever, sir; none whatever.

The defendant then renewed his objection to the question what conversation had taken place between Bram and the witness for the following reasons: That at the time the defendant was in the custody of the chief of police at Halifax; that the witness in an official capacity directed the police authorities to bring the defendant as a prisoner to his private office and there proceed to take extraordinary liberties with him; he stripped him; the defendant understood that he was a prisoner, and he obeyed every order and direction that the witness gave. Under these circumstances the counsel submitted that no statement made by the defendant while so held in custody and his rights interfered with to the extent described was a free and voluntary statement, and no statement as made by him bearing upon this issue was competent.

The objection was overruled, and the defendant excepted on all the grounds above stated, and the exceptions were allowed.

The witness answered as follows:

When Mr. Bram came into my office, I said to him: "Bram, we are trying to unravel this horrible mystery." I said: "Your position is rather an awkward one. I have had Brown in this office and he made a statement that he saw you do the murder." He said: "He could not have seen me; where was he?" I said: "He states he was at the wheel." "Well," he said, "he could not see me from there." I said: "Now, look here, Bram, I am satisfied that you killed the captain from all I have heard from Mr. Brown. "But," I said "some of us here think you could not have done all that crime alone. If you had an accomplice, you should say so, and not have the blame of this horrible crime on your own shoulders." He said: "Well, I think, and many others on board the ship think, that Brown is the murderer; but I don't know anything about it." He was rather short in his replies.

Q. Anything further said by either of you?

A. No; there was nothing further said on that occasion.

*The direct examination of this wit- [540 ness was limited to the interview between the witness and the defendant Bram.

On cross-examination of the witness Power, he testified that at the time of the above-stated examination he took possession of a pair of suspenders belonging to the defendant, and kept the same in his office until the prisoners were coming to Boston—the whole crew and the passenger were imprisoned at Halifax, and sent as prisoners to Boston—when he handed them over to the Halifax superintendent of police, and they were sent to Boston, with other property of the defendant.

Defendant's counsel, upon the ground of showing interest on the part of the witness, then asked: "What other articles belonging to the defendant did you take possession of at that time?"

This line of inquiry was objected to by the district attorney on the ground that the matter was not opened on the direct examination, and the defendant could call the witness as part of his case if he saw fit. The court excluded the inquiry, ruling that it was not proper cross-examination and did not tend to show interest, and the defendant duly excepted, and the exception was allowed.

The contention is that the foregoing conversation between the detective and the accused was competent only as a confession by him made; that it was offered as such, and that it was erroneously admitted, as it was not shown to have been voluntary. The question thus presented was manifestly covered by the exception which was taken at the trial. When it was proposed to examine the detective officer as to the conversation had by him with the accused, objection was duly made. The court thereupon allowed the officer to be examined and cross examined as to the circumstances attending the conversation which it was proposed to offer as a confession. When this examination was concluded the accused renewed his objection, and his exception to the admissibility of the conversation was allowed and regularly noted. The witness then proceeded to give the conversation. To say that under these circumstances the objection which was 541] twice presented *and regularly allowed should have been renewed at the termination of the testimony of the witness, would be pushing to an unreasonable length the salutary rule which requires that exceptions be taken at the trial to rulings which are considered erroneous, and the legality of which are thereafter to be questioned on error. There can be no doubt that the manner in which the exception was allowed and noted fully called attention to the fact that the admission of the conversation was objected to because it was not voluntary, and the overruling of this objection is the matter now assigned as error here. Indeed, in the argument at bar no contention was made as to the sufficiency and regularity of the exception. It is manifest that the sole ground upon which the proof of the conversation was tendered was that it was a confession, as this was the only conceivable hypothesis upon which it could have been legally admitted to the jury. It is also clear that in determining whether the proper foundation was laid for its admission, we are not concerned with how far the confession tended to prove guilt. Having been offered as a confession and being admissible only because of that fact, a consideration of the measure of proof which resulted from it does not arise in its admissibility. If found to have been illegally admitted, reversible error will result, since the prosecution cannot on the one hand offer evidence to prove guilt, and which by the very offer is vouched for as tending to that end, and on the other hand for the purpose of avoiding the consequence of the error, caused by its wrongful admission, be heard to assert that the matter offered as a confession was not prejudicial because it did not tend to prove guilt. The principle on the subject is thus stated in a note to § 219 of Greenleaf on Evidence: "The rule excludes, not only direct confessions, but any other declaration tending to implicate the prisoner in the crime charged, even though, in terms, it is an accusation of another, or a refusal to confess. Rex v. Tyler, 1 Car. & P. 129; Rex v. Enoch, 5 Car. & P. 539. See further, as to the object of the rule, Rex v. Court, 7 Car. & P. 486, per Littledale, J.; People v. Ward, 15 Wend. 231." Nor from the fact that in Wilson v. United States, 162 U. S. 621 542] [40: 1096], mention *was made of the circumstance that the statement of the accused was a mere denial of guilt accompanied with exculpatory explanations, does the decision in that case conflict with the principle we have just stated. The ruling there made that error to the prejudice of the accused did not arise from the admission of the statement there considered, was based, not alone upon the nature of the statement, but upon "the evidence of its voluntary character, the absence of any threat, compulsion, or inducement, or assertion or indication of fear, or even of such influence as the administration of an oath has been supposed to exert." p. 624 [40: 1097].

The contradiction involved in the assertion that the statement of an accused tended to prove guilt, and therefore was admissible, and then after procuring its admission claiming that it did not tend to prove guilt, and could not, therefore, have been prejudicial, has been well stated by the supreme court of North Carolina (State v. Rorie (1876) 74 N. C. 148):

"But the state says this was a denial of guilt and not a confession. It was a declaration which the state used to procure a conviction; and it is not for the state to say the declaration did not prejudice the prisoner's case. Why introduce it at all unless it was to lay a foundation for the prosecution? The use which was made of the prisoner's statement precludes the state from saying that it was not used to his prejudice."

In criminal trials, in the courts of the United States, wherever a question arises whether a confession is incompetent because not voluntary, the issue is controlled by that portion of the 5th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, commanding that no person "shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself." The legal principle by which the admissibility of the confession of an accused person is to be determined is expressed in the text-books.

In 3 Russell on Crimes, 6th ed. 478, it is stated as follows:

"But a confession in order to be admissible must be free and voluntary; that is, must not be extracted by any sort of threats or violence, nor obtained by any direct or implied promises,*however slight, nor by the exertion [543 of any improper influence. . . . A confession can never be received in evidence where the prisoner has been influenced by any threat or promise; for the law cannot measure the force of the influence used, or decide upon its effect upon the mind of the prisoner, and therefore excludes the declaration if any degree of influence has been exerted."

And this summary of the law is in harmony with the doctrine as expressed by other writers, although the form in which they couch its statement may be different. 1 Greenl. Ev. 15th ed. § 219; Wharton, Crim. Ev. 9th ed. § 631; 2 Taylor, Ev. 9th ed. § 872[3]; 1 Bishop, New Crim. Proc. § 1217, ¶ 4.

These writers but express the result of a multitude of American and English cases, which will be found collected by the authors and editors either in the text or in notes, especially in the ninth edition of Taylor, second volume, tenth chapter, and the American notes, following page 588, where a very full reference is made to decided cases. The statement of the rule is also in entire accord with the decisions of this court on the subject. Hopt v. Utah (1883) 110 U. S. 574 [28: 262]; Sparf v. United States (1895) 156 U. S. 51, 55 [39: 343, 345]; Pierce v. United States (1896) 160 U. S. 355 [40: 454], and Wilson v. United States (1896) 162 U. S. 613 [40: 1090].

A brief consideration of the reasons which gave rise to the adoption of the 5th Amendment, of the wrongs which it was intended to prevent, and of the safeguards which it was its purpose unalterably to secure, will make it clear that the generic language of the amendment was but a crystalization of the doctrine as to confessions, well settled when the amendment was adopted, and since expressed in the text-writers and expounded by the adjudications, and hence that the statements on the subject by the text-writers and adjudications but formulate the conceptions and commands of the amendment itself. In Boyd v. United States, 116 U. S. 616 [29: 746], attention was called to the intimate relation existing between the provision of the 5th Amendment securing one accused against being compelled to testify against himself, and those of the 4th Amend-544] ment *protecting against unreasonable searches and seizures; and it was in that case demonstrated that both of these amendments contemplated perpetuating, in their full efficacy, by means of a constitutional provision, principles of humanity and civil liberty, which had been secured in the mother country only after years of struggle, so as to implant them in our institutions in the fullness of their integrity, free from the possibilities of future legislative change. In commenting on the same subject, in Brown v. Walker, 161 U. S. 596 [40: 821], the court, speaking through Mr. Justice Brown, said:

"The maxim Nemo tenetur seipsum accusare had its origin in a protest against the inquisitorial and manifestly unjust methods of interrogating accused persons, which has long obtained in the continental system, and until the expulsion of the Stuarts from the British throne in 1688, and the erection of additional barriers for the protection of the people against the exercise of arbitrary power, was not uncommon even in England. While the admissions or confessions of the prisoner, when voluntarily and freely made, have always ranked high in the scale of incriminating evidence, if an accused person be asked to explain his apparent connection with a crime under investigation, the ease with which the questions put to him may assume an inquisitorial character, the temptation to press the witness unduly, to browbeat him if he be timid or reluctant, to push him into a corner, and to entrap him into fatal contradictions, which is so painfully evident in many of the earlier state trials, notably in those of Sir Nicholas Throckmorton and Udal, the Puritan minister, made the system so odious as to give rise to a demand for its total abolition. The change in the English criminal procedure in that particular seems to be founded upon no statute and no judicial opinion, but upon a general and silent acquiescence of the courts in a popular demand. But, however adopted, it has become firmly imbedded in English as well as in American jurisprudence. So deeply did the iniquities of the ancient system impress themselves upon the minds of the American colonists that the states, with one accord, made a denial of the right to question an accused person a part of their fun-545] damental law, so that a maxim *which in England was a mere rule of evidence, became clothed in this country with the impregnability of a constitutional enactment."

There can be no doubt that long prior to our independence the doctrine that one accused of crime could not be compelled to testify against himself had reached its full development in the common law, was there considered as resting on the law of nature, and was imbedded in that system as one of its great and distinguishing attributes.

In Burrowes v. High Commission Court (1616) Bulst. 49, Lord Coke makes reference to two decisions of the courts of common law as early as the reign of Queen Elizabeth, wherein it was decided that the right of a party not to be compelled to accuse himself could not be violated by the ecclesiastical courts. Whatever, after that date, may have been the departure in practice from this principle of the common law (Taylor, Ev. § 886[2]), certain it is that, without a statute so commanding, in Felton's Case (1628) 3 How. St. Tr. 371, the judges unanimously resolved, on the question being submitted to them by the King, that "no such punishment as torture by the rack was known or allowed by our law."

Lord Hale died December 25, 1676. In the first volume of his Pleas of the Crown (1st ed. 1736), treating of the subject of confessions in cases of treason, it is said at p. 304:

"That the confession before one of the privy council or a justice of the peace being voluntary made without torture is sufficient as to the indictment or trial to satisfy the statute, and it is not necessary that it be a confession in court; but the confession is sufficient if made before him that hath power to take an examination."

In the second volume, at p. 225, it is said:

"When the prisoner is arraigned, and demanded what he saith to the indictment, either he confesseth the indictment, or pleads to it, or stands mute, and will not answer. The confession is either simple, or relative in order to the attainment of some other advantage. That which I call a simple confession is, where the defendant *upon [546 hearing of his indictment without any other respect confesseth it, this is a conviction; but it is usual for the court, especially if it be out of clergy, to advise the party to plead and put himself upon his trial, and not presently to record his confession, but to admit him to plead. 27 Assiz. 40. If it be but an extra judicial confession, tho it be in court, as where the prisoner freely tells the fact, and demands the opinion of the court, whether it be felony, tho upon the fact thus shown it appear to be felony, the court will not record his confession, but admit him to plead to the felony not guilty. 22 Assiz. 71. Stamf. P. C. Lib. 2, cap. 51, fol. 142*b*."

In chapter 38 of vol. 2, at p. 284, after referring to the power of justices of the peace and coroners, under the statutes of Philip & Mary, to take examinations of accused persons, but not upon oath, and that the same might be read in evidence on the trial of the prisoner, it is said:

"But then, 1. Oath must be made either by the justice or coroner that took them, or the clerk that wrote them, that they are the true substance of what the informer gave in upon oath, and what the prisoner confessed upon his examination. 2. As to the examination of the prisoner, it must be testified that he did it freely without any menace, or undue terror imposed upon him; for I have often known the prisoner disown his confession upon his examination, and hath sometimes been acquitted against such his confession."

Gilbert, in his treatise on Evidence (2d ed., published in 1760), says, at p. 139:

" . . . But then this confession must be voluntary and without compulsion; for our law in this differs from the civil law, that it will not force any man to accuse himself; and in this we do certainly follow the law of nature, which commands every man to endeavor his own preservation; and therefore pain and force may compel men to confess what is not the truth of facts, and consequently such extorted confessions are not to be depended on."

In Hawkins' Pleas of the Crown (6th ed., by Leach, published in 1787), book 2, chap. 31, it is said:

"Sec. 2. . . . And where a person upon 547] his arraignment *actually confesses himself guilty, or unadvisedly discloses the special manner of the fact, supposing that it doth not amount to felony where it doth, yet the judges, upon probable circumstances, that such confession may proceed from fear, menace, or duress, or from weakness, or ignorance, may refuse to record such confession, and suffer the party to plead not guilty."

In § 3, chap. 46, it is stated that examinations by the common law before a Secretary of State or other magistrate for treason or other crimes not within the statutes of Philip & Mary, and also the confession of the defendant himself in discourse with private persons, might be given in evidence against the party confessing. A note (2) to this section, presumably inserted by the editor (see note to Gilham's Case, 2 Moody, 194, 195), reads as follows:

"The human mind under the pressure of calamity is easily seduced; and is liable, in the alarm of danger, to acknowledge indiscriminately a falsehood or a truth, as different agitations may prevail. A confession, therefore, whether made upon an official examination or in discourse with private persons, which is obtained from a defendant, either by the flattery of hope, or by the impressions of fear, however slightly the emotions may be implanted (vide O. B. 1786, p. 387), is not admissible evidence; for the law will not suffer a prisoner to be made the deluded instrument of his own conviction."

Although the English reports, prior to the separation, are almost devoid of decisions applying the principles stated by Lord Hale, Hawkins, and Gilbert, both the opinion of Lord Mansfield in Rex v. Rudd (1775) Cowp. 333, and that of Mr. Justice Wilson, some years after the separation, in Lambe's Case (1791) 2 Leach, C. C. 4th ed. 552, make it certain that the rule as stated by Hawkins, Gilbert, and Hale was considered in the English courts as no longer open to question and as one of the fundamental principles of the common law. Looking at the doctrine as thus established, it would seem plainly to be deducible that as the principle, from which, under the law of nature, it was held that one accused could 548] not be compelled to *testify against himself, was in its essence comprehensive enough to exclude all manifestations of compulsion, whether arising from torture or from moral causes, the rule formulating the principle with logical accuracy came to be so stated as to embrace all cases of compulsion which were covered by the doctrine. As the facts by which compulsion might manifest itself, whether physical or moral, would be necessarily ever different, the measure by which the involuntary nature of the confession was to be ascertained was stated in the rule, not by the changing causes, but by their resultant effect upon the mind, that is, hope or fear, so that, however diverse might be the facts, the test of whether the confession was voluntary would be uniform, that is, would be ascertained by the condition of mind which the causes ordinarily operated to create. The well-settled nature of the rule in England at the time of the adoption of the Constitution and of the 5th Amendment, and the intimate knowledge had by the framers of the principles of civil liberty which had become a part of the common law, aptly explains the conciseness of the language of that Amendment. And the accuracy with which the doctrine as to confessions as now formulated embodies the rule existing at common law and imbedded in the 5th Amendment was noticed by this court in Wilson v. United States, supra, where, after referring to the criteria of hope and fear, speaking through Mr. Chief Justice Fuller, it was said: "In short, the true test of admissibility is that the confession is made freely, voluntarily, and without compulsion or inducement of any sort." 162 U. S. 623 [40: 1096].

In approaching the adjudicated cases for the purpose of endeavoring to deduce from them what quantum of proof, in a case presented, is adequate to create, by the operation of hope or fear, an involuntary condition of the mind, the difficulty encountered is, that all the decided cases necessarily rest upon the state of facts which existed in the particular case, and therefore furnish no certain criterion, since the conclusion that a given state of fact was adequate to have produced an involuntary confession does not establish that the same result has been created by a different although somewhat similar condition of fact. *Indeed, the embarrassment which [549 comes from the varying state of fact, considered in the decided cases, has given rise to the statement that there was no general rule of law by which the admissibility of a confession could be determined, but that the courts had left the rule to be evolved from the facts of each particular case. 2 Taylor, Ev. § 872[2]. And, again, it has been said that so great was the perplexity resulting from an attempt to reconcile the authorities that it was manifest that not only must each case solely depend upon its own facts, but that even the legal rule to be applied was involved in obscurity and confusion. Green v. State, 88 Ga. 516; State v. Patterson, 73 Mo. 695, 705; State v. Matthews, 66 N. C. 106, 109.

The first of these statements but expresses the thought that whether a confession was voluntary was primarily one of fact, and therefore every case must depend upon its own proof. The second is obviously a misconception, for however great may be the divergence between the facts decided in previous cases and those presented in any given case, no doubt or obscurity can arise as to the rule itself, since it is found in the text of the Constitution. Much of the confusion which has resulted from the effort to deduce from the adjudged cases what would be a sufficient quantum of proof to show that a confession was or was not voluntary, has arisen from a misconception of the subject to which the proof must address itself. The rule is not that in order to render a statement admissible the proof must be adequate to establish that the particular communications contained in a statement were voluntarily made, but it must be sufficient to establish that the making of the statement was voluntary; that is to say, that from causes, which the law treats as legally sufficient to engender in the mind of the accused hope or fear in respect to the crime charged, the accused was not involuntarily impelled to make a statement, when but for the improper influences he would have remained silent. With this understanding of the rule we come to a consideration of the authorities.

By statutes enacted early in the second half of the sixteenth century (1 & 2 Ph. & M. chap. 13, and 2 & 3 Ph. & M. chap. 10), justices of the 550] peace *were directed on accusations of felony to "take the examination of the said prisoner and information of them that bring him." In 1555, the judges directed that the examination of prisoners should be without oath (Kelyng. 2), and the reason of this rule, Starkie on Evidence (2d ed. p. 29) says, was that an examination under oath "would be a species of duress and a violation of the maxim that no one is bound to criminate himself." The ruling of the judges in this regard was recognized in the statute of 7 Geo. IV. chap. 64, which, although requiring "information of witnesses" to be "upon oath," simply directed an "examination" of the accused.

But, even where the examination was held without oath, it came to be settled by judicial decisions in England that before such an examination could be received in evidence it must appear that the accused was made to understand that it was optional with him to make a statement. Rex v. Green (1833) 5 Car. & P. 312; Reg. v. Arnold (1838) 8 Car. & P. 621. The reason upon which this rule rested undoubtedly was, that the mere fact of the magistrate's taking the statement, even though unaccompanied with an oath, might, unless he was cautioned, operate upon the mind of the prisoner to impel him involuntarily to speak. The judicial rule as to caution was finally embodied into positive law by the statute of 11 & 12 Vict. chap. 42, where, by § 18, the magistrate was directed, after having read or caused to be read to the accused the depositions against him, to ask the accused: "Having heard the evidence, do you wish to say anything in answer to the charge? You are not obliged to say anything unless you desire to do so, but whatever you say will be taken down in writing, and may be given in evidence against you upon your trial."

The English courts were frequently called upon to determine whether language used by a magistrate when about to take the examination of one accused tended to induce in the mind of the latter such hope or fear as to lead to involuntary mental action. In Reg. v. Drew (1837) 8 Car. & P. 140, and Queen v. Harris (1844) 1 Cox, C. C. 106, though the accused had been cautioned not to say anything to pre-551] judice himself, the further *statement, in substance, by the magistrate or his clerk, that what the prisoner said would be taken down, and "would" be used for or against him at his trial, was held by Coleridge, J., to be equivalent to saying that what the prisoner chose to say might be used in his favor at the trial, and to be a direct inducement to make a confession, rendering the statement incompetent as evidence. Like rulings were also made in cases where similar assurance that the statement of the prisoner would be used were made to him by a police officer. Reg. v Morton (1843) 2 Moody & R. 514, and Reg. v. Furley (1844) 1 Cox, C. C. 76.

In cases where statements of one accused had been made to others than the magistrate upon an examination, differences of opinion arose among the English judges, as to whether a confession made to a person not in a position of authority over the accused was admissible in evidence after an inducement has been held out to the prisoner by such person. Rex v. Spencer (1837) 7 Car. & P. 776. It was finally settled, however, that the effect of inducements must be confined to those made by persons in authority (Reg. v. Taylor (1839) 8 Car. & P. 734; Reg. v. Moore (1852) 2 Den. C. C. 522); although, in the last-cited case, while former precedents were followed, the court expressed strong doubts as to the wisdom of the restriction. (p. 527.) There can be no question, however, that a police officer, actually or constructively in charge of one in custody on a suspicion of having committed crime, is a person in authority within the rule, and as this is so well established, we will not consider the adjudicated cases in order to demonstrate it, but content ourselves with a reference to the statement on the subject made in Russell on Crimes, third volume, at page 501.

Many other cases in the English reports illustrate the application of the rule excluding statements made under inducement improperly operating to influence the mind of an accused person.

In Reg. v. Thompson (1783) 1 Leach, C. C. (4th ed.) 291, a declaration to a suspected person, that unless he gave a more satisfactory account of his connection with a stolen bank note his *interrogator would take him [552 before a magistrate, was held equivalent to stating that it would be better to confess, and to have operated to lead the prisoner to believe that he would not be taken before a magistrate if he confessed. Baron Hotham, after commenting upon the evidence, in substance, said that the prisoner was hardly a free agent at the time, as, though the language addressed to him scarcely amounted to a threat, it was certainly a strong invitation to the prisoner to confess, the manner in which it had been expressed rendering it more efficacious.

In Cass's Case (1784) 1 Leach, C. C. 293, note, a confession induced by the statement of the prosecutor to the accused, "I am in great distress about my irons; if you will tell me where they are, I will be favorable to you," was held inadmissible. Mr. Justice Gould said that the slightest hopes of mercy held out to a prisoner to induce him to disclose the fact was sufficient to invalidate a confession.

In the cases following, statements made by a prisoner were held inadmissible, because induced by the language set out in each case: In Rex v. Griffin (1809) Russ. & R. C. C. 151, telling the prisoner that it would be better for him to confess; in Rex v. Jones (1809) Russ. & R. C. C. 142, the prosecutor saying to the accused that he only wanted his money, and if the prisoner gave him that he might go to the devil, if he pleased; in Rex v. Kingston (1830) 4 Car. & P. 387, saying to the accused, "You are under suspicion of this, and you had better tell all you know;" in Rex v. Enoch and Pulley (1833) 5 Car. & P. 539, saying: "You had better tell the truth or it will lie upon you, and the man go free;" in Rex v. Mills (1833) 6 Car. & P. 146, saying: "It is no use for you to deny it, for there is the man and boy who will swear they saw you do it;" in Sherrington's Case (1838) 2 Lewin, C. C. 123, saying: "There is no doubt thou wilt be found guilty, it will be better for you if you will confess;" in Rex v. Thomas (1833) 6 Car. & P. 353, saying: "You had better split, and not suffer for all of them;" in Rex v. Simpson (1834) 1 Moody, C.C. 410, and Russ. & R. C. C. 410, repeated importunities by neighbors and relatives of the prosecutor, coupled 553] with assurances to the *suspected person that it would be a good deal worse for her if she did not, and that it would be better for her if she did, confess; in Rex v. Upchurch (1836) 1 Moody, C. C. 465, saying: "If you are guilty, do confess; it will perhaps save your neck; you will have to go to prison; if William H. (another person suspected, and whom the prisoner had charged) is found clear, the guilt will fall on you. Pray tell me if you did it;" in Reg. v. Croydon (1846) 2 Cox, C. C. 67, saying: "I dare say you had a hand in it; you may as well tell me all about it;" in Reg. v. Garner (1848) 1 Den. C. C. 329, saying: "It will be better for you to speak out."

In Reg. v. Fleming (1842) Arm. M. & O. 330, statements of a police officer suspected of having committed a crime, in answer to questions propounded by his superior in office, after the latter had warned the accused to be cautious in his answers, were held inadmissible. The court said: "The prisoner and the witnesses being both in the police force, the prisoner, as the witness admitted, might have conceived himself bound to tell the truth; and the caution was not of that nature which should make the confession of the prisoner admissible."

In the leading case of Reg. v. Baldry (1852) 2 Den. C. C. 430, after full consideration, it was held that the declaration made to a prisoner, who had first been cautioned that what he said "would" be used as evidence, merely imported that such statement "might" be used, and could not have induced in the mind of the prisoner a hope of benefit sufficient to lead him to make a statement. The cases of Rex v. Drew, Reg. v. Harris, Rex v. Morton, and Reg. v. Furley, heretofore referred to, were held to have been erroneously decided.

In the course of the argument, counsel for the prisoner cited and commented upon Cass's Case, Rex v. Thomas, Sherrington's Case, and Rex v. Enoch, also heretofore referred to, as illustrating the doctrine that assuring the accused that it would be better for him to speak, or other intimation given of possible benefit, would invalidate a confession thus induced. After counsel had concluded his reference to these cases, Pollock, C. B., said (p. 432): "There is no doubt as to the application *of the [554 rule in those cases, which are all familiar to the judges and to the bar."

In the course of the opinion subsequently delivered by him Chief Baron Pollock said (p. 442):

"A simple caution to the accused to tell the truth, if he says anything, it has been decided not to be sufficient to prevent the statement made being given in evidence, and although it may be put that when a person is told to tell the truth, he may possibly understand that the only thing true is that he is guilty, that is not what he ought to understand. He is reminded that he need not say anything, but if he says anything let it be true. It has been decided that that would not prevent the statement being received in evidence by Littledale, J., in the case of Rex v. Court, 7 Car. & P. 486, and by Rolfe, B., in a case at Gloucester (Reg. v. Holmes, 1 Car. & K. 248), but where the admonition to speak the truth has been coupled with any expression importing that it would be better for him to do so, it has been held that the confession was not receivable, the objectionable words being that it would be better to speak the truth, because they import that it would be better for him to say something. This was decided in the case of Reg. v. Garner, 1 Den. C. C. 329. The true distinction between the present case and a case of that kind is, that it is left to the prisoner a matter of perfect indifference whether he should open his mouth or not."

In Reg. v. Moore (1852) 2 Den. C. C. 523, also decided by the court of crimiual appeal, an admonition to a person suspected of crime that she "had better speak the truth," was held not to vitiate a subsequent confession, because not made by a person in authority. Parke, B., delivering the opinion of the judges, said, in substance (p. 526), that one element in the consideration of the question whether a confession ought to be excluded was "whether the threat or inducement was such as to be likely to influence the prisoner," and "that if the threat or inducement was held out, actually or constructively, by a person in authority, it cannot be received, however slight the threat or inducement."

*In Reg. v. Cheverton (1862) 2 Fost & F. 833, a statement made by a policeman to a person in his custody, that "you had better tell all about it, it will save you trouble," was held to operate as a threat or inducement sufficient to render what was said by the prisoner inadmissible. [555

In Reg. v. Fennell (1881) L. R. 7 Q. B. Div. 147, the court for crown cases reserved referred approvingly to the statement of the rule contained in Russell on Crimes, and, "upon all the decided cases," held inadmissible a statement made induced by the prosecutor saying to the prisoner in the presence of an inspector of police: "The inspector tells me you are making housebreaking implements; if this is so you had better tell the truth, it may be better for you."

The latest decision in England on the subject of inducement, made by the court for crown cases reserved, is Reg. v. Thompson [1893] 2 Q. B. 12. At the trial a confession was offered in evidence, which had been made by the defendant before his arrest upon the charge of having embezzled funds of a certain corporation. Objection was interposed to its reception in evidence, on the ground that it had been made under the operation of an inducement held out by the chairman of the company in a statement to a relative of the accused, intended to be and actually communicated to the latter, that "it will be the right thing for Marcellus (the accused) to make a clean breast of it." The evidence having been admitted and the prisoner convicted, the question was submitted to the upper court whether the evidence of the confession was properly admitted. The opinion of the appellate court was delivered by Cave, J., and concurred in by Lord Coleridge, C. J., Hawkins, Day, and Wills, JJ. After stating and adopting the ruling of Baron Parke in Reg. v. Warringham, 2 Den. C. C. 447, note, to the effect that it was the duty of the prosecutor to satisfy the trial judge that the confession had not been obtained by improper means, and that where it was impossible to collect from the proof whether such was the case or not, the confession ought not to be received, the opinion referred approvingly to the declaration of Pollock, C. B., in Reg. v. 556] Baldry, that the true ground of the exclusion of statements not voluntary was that "it would not be safe to receive a statement made under any influence of fear." The court then quoted the rule laid down in Russell on Crimes as being a statement of the principles which had been restated and affirmed by the Lord Chief Justice in the Fennell Case, and added:

"If these principles and the reasons for them are, as it seems impossible to doubt, well founded, they afford to magistrates a simple test by which the admissibility of a confession may be decided. They have to ask, Is it proved affirmatively that the confession was free and voluntary—that is, was it preceded by any inducement to make a statement held out by a person in authority? If so, and the inducement has not clearly been removed before the statement was made, evidence of the statement is inadmissible."

After reviewing the evidence and holding that, under the ruling of Pollock, C. B., in the Baldry Case, it was immaterial whether the statements made by the chairman were calculated to elicit the truth, and intimating that they tended to lead the prisoner to believe that it would be better for him to say something, the opinion concluded with deciding that "on the broad, plain ground that it was not proved satisfactorily that the confession was free and voluntary," the confession ought not to have been received.

Whilst, as we have said, there is no question that a police officer having a prisoner in custody is a person in authority within the rule in England, and therefore that any inducement by him offered, calculated to operate upon the mind of the prisoner, would render a confession as a consequence thereof inadmissible, there seems to be doubt in England whether the doctrine does not extend further, and hold that the mere fact of the interrogation of a prisoner by a police officer would per se render the confession inadmissible, because of the inducement resulting from the very nature of the authority exercised by the police officer, assimilating him in this regard to a committing or examining magistrate. 3 Russell, Crimes, p. 510, note t. In Reg. v. Johnston (1864) 15 Ir. C. L. Rep. 60, this subject was elaborately considered by the *Irish court of criminal [557 appeal, seven of the judges writing opinions, and the majority concluding, on a full consideration of the English and Irish authorities, that a policeman was not such an official as would render per se any confession elicited by his questioning the prisoner inadmissible, although the fact of his questioning became an important element in determining whether inducement resulted from the language by him used. The English authorities, however, referred to in the above note to Russell on Crimes, are later in date than Reg. v. Johnston, although they emanate from nisi prius courts and not from appellate tribunals. Whatever be the rule in this regard in England, however, it is certain that where a confession is elicited by the questions of a policeman, the fact of its having been so obtained it is conceded may be an important element in determining whether the answers of the prisoner were voluntary. The attempt on the part of a police officer to obtain a confession by interrogating has been often reproved by the English courts as unfair to the prisoner and as approaching dangerously near to a violation of the rule protecting an accused from being compelled to testify against himself. Berriman's Case (1854) 6 Cox, C. C. 388; Cheverton's Case (1862) 2 Fost. & F. 833; Mick's Case (1863) 3 Fost. & F. 822; Regan's Case (1867) 17 L. T. N. S. 325, and Reason's Case (1872) 12 Cox, C. C. 228.

From this review it clearly appears that the rule as to confessions by an accused (leaving out of consideration the rule now followed in England restricting the effect of inducements, according as such inducements were or were not held out by persons in authority) is in England to-day what it was prior to and at the adoption of the 5th Amendment, and that, whilst all the decided cases necessarily rest upon the state of facts which the cases considered, nevertheless the decisions as a whole afford a safe guide by which to ascertain whether in this case the confession was voluntary, since the facts here presented are strikingly like those considered in many of the English cases.

We come then to the American authorities. In this court the general rule that the confession must be free and voluntary, *that [558 is, not produced by inducements engendering either hope or fear, is settled by the authorities referred to at the outset. The facts in the particular cases decided in this court and which have been referred to manifested so clearly that the confessions were voluntary that no useful purpose can be subserved by analyzing them. In this court also it has been settled that the mere fact that the confession is made to a police officer, while the accused was under arrest in or out of prison, or was drawn out by his questions does not necessarily render the confession involuntary, but, as one of the circumstances, such imprisonment or interrogation may be taken into account in determining whether or not the statements of the prisoner were voluntary. Hopt v. Utah, 110 U. S. 574 [28: 262]; Sparf v. United States, 156 U. S. 51, 55 [39: 343, 345]. And this last rule thus by this court established is also the doctrine upheld by the state decisions.

In the various state courts of last resort the general rule we have just referred to, that a confession must be voluntary, is generally recognized; although in Indiana there is a statute authorizing confessions obtained by inducements to be given in evidence to the jury with all the attending circumstances, except when made under the influence of fear produced by threats, while it is also provided that a conviction cannot be had by proof of a confession made under inducement, "without corroborating testimony." Revised Stat. Ind. 1881, § 1802. And in the Texas Code of Procedure, art. 750, it is provided that confessions shall not be used against a prisoner at his trial, "if, at the time it was made, the defendant was in jail or other place of confinement, nor where he was in custody of an officer, unless such confession be made in the voluntary statement of the accused, taken before an examining court in accordance with law; or be made voluntarily, after having been first cautioned that it may be used against him; or unless, in connection with such confession, he make statement of facts or of circumstances that are found to be true, which conduce to establish his guilt, such as the finding of secreted or stolen property, or instrument with which he states the offense was committed."

559] *The English doctrine which restricts the operation of inducements solely to those made by one in authority has been adopted by some state courts, but disapproved of in others, as in Ohio. Spears v. State, 2 Ohio St. 583. Whether it is one which should be followed by this court in view of the express terms of the Constitution, need not be now considered as it does not arise under the state of facts here presented. In some it is also held that the fact that the accused is examined on oath by a magistrate or coroner, or by a grand jury, with or without an oath, will, per se, exclude confessions, because of the influence presumed to arise from the authority of the examining officer or body. People v. McMahon (1857) 15 N. Y. 384, followed in People v. Mondon (1886) 103 N. Y. 211, 218 [57 Am. Rep. 709]; State v. Matthews (1872) 66 N. C. 106; Jackson v. State (1879) 56 Miss. 311, 312; State v. Clifford (1892) 86 Iowa, 550. This doctrine as to examining magistrates is in some states enforced by statutes somewhat similar in character to the English statutes. 2 Taylor, Ev. § 888, note 2.

In some of the states it has been held that where questions are propounded to a prisoner by one having a right to ask them, and he remains silent, where from the nature of the inquiries, if innocent, reply would naturally be made, the fact of such silence may be weighed by the jury. See authorities collected in Chamberlayne's note to 2 Taylor on Evidence, pp. 588[4] et seq.

Having stated the general lines upon which the American cases proceed, we will not attempt to review in detail the numerous decisions in the various courts of last resort in the several states, treating of confessions in the divergent aspects in which that doctrine may have presented itself, but will content ourselves with a brief reference to a few leading and well considered cases treating of the subject of inducements, and which are, therefore, apposite to the issue now considered.

In the following cases, the language in each mentioned was held to be an inducement sufficient to exclude a confession or statement made in consequence thereof: In Kelly v. State (1882) 72 Ala. 244, saying to the prisoner, "You have got your foot in it, and somebody else was with you; now, *if you did [560 break open the door, the best thing you can do is to tell all about it, and to tell who was with you, and to tell the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth;" in People v. Barric, 49 Cal. 342, saying to the accused, "It will be better for you to make a full disclosure;" in People v. Thompson (1890) 84 Cal. 598, 605, saying to the accused, "I don't think the truth will hurt anybody. It will be better for you to come out and tell all you know about it, if you feel that way;" in Berry v. United States (1893) 2 Colo. 186, 188, 203, advising the prisoner to make full restitution, and saying, "If you do so it will go easy with you; it will be better for you to confess; the door of mercy is open and that of justice closed;" and threatening to arrest the accused and expose his family if he did not confess; in State v. Bostick (1845) 4 Harr. (Del.) 563, saying to one suspected of crime, "The suspicion is general against you, and you had as well tell all about it, the prosecution will be no greater, I don't expect to do anything with you; I am going to send you home to your mother;" in Green v. State (1891) 88 Ga. 516, saying to the accused, "Edmund, if you know anything, it may be best for you to tell it," or "Edmund, if you know anything, go and tell it, and it may be best for you;" in Rector v. Commonwealth (1882) 80 Ky. 468, saying to the prisoner in a case of larceny, "It will go better with you to tell where the money is; all I want is my money, and if you will tell me where it is, I will not prosecute you hard;" in Biscoe v. State (1887) 67 Md. 6, saying to the accused, "It will be better for you to tell the truth and have no more trouble about it;" in Com. v. Nott (1883) 135 Mass. 269, saying to the accused, "You had better own up; I was in the place when you took it; we have got you down fine; this is not the first you have taken; we have got other things against you nearly as good as this;" in Com. v. Meyers (1894) 160 Mass. 530, saying to the accused, "You had better tell the truth;" in People v. Wolcott (1883) 51 Mich. 612, saying to the accused, "It will be better for you to confess;" in Territory v. Underwood (1888) 8 Mont. 131, saying to the prisoner that it would be better *to tell [561 the prosecuting witness all about it, and that the officer thought the prosecuting witness would withdraw the prosecution or make it as light as possible; in State v. York (1858) 37 N. H. 175, saying to one under arrest immediately before a confession, "If you are guilty you had better own it;" in People v. Phillips (1870) 42 N. Y. 200, saying to the prisoner, "The best you can do is to own up; it will be better for you;" in State v. Whitfield (1874) 70 N. C. 356, saying to the accused, "I believe you are guilty; if you are, you had better say so; if you are not, you had better say that;" in State v.

Drake (1893) 113 N. C. 624, saying to the prisoner, "If you are guilty, I would advise you to make an honest confession; it might be easier for you. It is plain against you;" in Vaughan v. Commonwealth (1867) 17 Gratt. 576, saying to the accused, "You had as well tell all about it."

We come, then, to a consideration of the circumstances surrounding, and the facts established to exist, in reference to the confession, in order to determine whether it was shown to have been voluntarily made. Before analyzing the statement of the police detective as to what took place between himself and the accused it is necessary to recall the exact situation. The crime had been committed on the high seas. Brown, immediately after the homicide, had been arrested by the crew in consequence of suspicion aroused against him, and had been by them placed in irons. As the vessel came in sight of land, and was approaching Halifax, the suspicions of the crew having been also directed to Bram, he was arrested by them and placed in irons. On reaching port, these two suspected persons were delivered to the custody of the police authorities of Halifax and were there held in confinement awaiting the action of the United States consul, which was to determine whether the suspicious which had caused the arrest justified the sending of one or both of the prisoners into the United States for formal charge and trial. Before this examination had taken place the police detective caused Bram to be brought from jail to his private office, and when there alone with the detective he was stripped of his clothing, and either whilst the detective was in the act of so stripping him, or after he was de-562] nuded, *the conversation offered as a confession took place. The detective repeats what he said to the prisoner, whom he had thus stripped, as follows:

"When Mr. Bram came into my office I said to him: 'Bram, we are trying to unravel this horrible mystery.' I said: 'Your position is rather an awkward one. I have had Brown in this office, and he made a statement that he saw you do the murder.' He said: 'He could not have seen me. Where was he?' I said: 'He states he was at the wheel.' 'Well,' he said, 'he could not see me from there.' "

The fact, then, is, that the language of the accused, which was offered in evidence as a confession, was made use of by him as a reply to the statement of the detective that Bram's cosuspect had charged him with the crime, and, although the answer was in the form of a denial, it was doubtless offered as a confession because of an implication of guilt which it was conceived the words of the denial might be considered to mean. But the situation of the accused, and the nature of the communication made to him by the detective, necessarily overthrows any possible implication that his reply to the detective could have been the result of a purely voluntary mental action; that is to say, when all the surrounding circumstances are considered in their true relations, not only is the claim that the statement was voluntary overthrown, but the impression is irresistibly produced that it must necessarily have been the result of either hope or fear, or both, operating on the mind.

It cannot be doubted that placed in the position in which the accused was when the statement was made to him that the other suspected person had charged him with crime, the result was to produce upon his mind the fear that if he remained silent it would be considered an admission of guilt, and therefore render certain his being committed for trial as the guilty person, and it cannot be conceived that the converse impression would not also have naturally arisen that by denying there was hope of removing the suspicion from himself. If this must have been the state of mind of one situated as was the prisoner when the confession was made, how in reason *can it be said that the [563 answer which he gave and which was required by the situation was wholly voluntary and in no manner influenced by the force of hope or fear? To so conclude would be to deny the necessary relation of cause and effect. Indeed, the implication of guilt resulting from silence has been considered by some state courts of last resort, in decided cases, to which we have already made reference, as so cogent that they have held that where a person is accused of guilt, under circumstances which call upon him to make denial, the fact of his silence is competent evidence as tending to establish guilt. Whilst it must not be considered that by referring to these authorities we approve them, it is yet manifest that if learned judges have deduced the conclusion that silence is so weighty as to create an inference of guilt, it cannot, with justice, be said that the mind of one who is held in custody under suspicion of having committed a crime would not be impelled to say something, when informed by one in authority that a cosuspect had declared that he had seen the person to whom the officer was addressing himself commit the offense, when otherwise he might have remained silent but for fear of the consequences which might ensue; that is to say, he would be impelled to speak either for fear that his failure to make answer would be considered against him, or of hope that if he did reply he would be benefited thereby. And these self evident deductions are greatly strengthened by considering the place where the statements were made and the conduct of the detective towards the accused. Bram had been brought from confinement to the office of the detective, and there, when alone with him, in a foreign land, while he was in the act of being stripped or had been stripped of his clothing, was interrogated by the officer, who was thus, while putting the questions and receiving answers thereto, exercising complete authority and control over the person he was interrogating. Although these facts may not, when isolated each from the other, be sufficient to warrant the inference that an influence compelling a statement had been exerted, yet when taken as a whole, in conjunction with the nature of the communication made, they give room to the strongest inference that the *statements of Bram were not [564 made by one who in law could be considered a free agent. To communicate to a person suspected of the commission of crime the fact that his cosuspect has stated that he has seen him commit the offense, to make this statement to him under circumstances which call imperatively for an admission or denial and to accompany the communication with conduct which necessarily perturbs the mind and engenders confusion of thought, and then to use the denial made by the person so situated as a confession, because of the form in which the denial is made, is not only to compel the reply but to produce the confusion of words supposed to be found in it, and then use statements thus brought into being for the conviction of the accused. A plainer violation as well of the letter as of the spirit and purpose of the constitutional immunity could scarcely be conceived of.

Moreover, aside from the natural result arising from the situation of the accused and the communication made to him by the detective, the conversation conveyed an express intimation rendering the confession involuntary within the rule laid down by the authorities. What further was said by the detective? " 'Now, look here, Bram, I am satisfied that you killed the captain from all I have heard from Mr. Brown. But,' I said, 'some of us here think you could not have done all that crime alone. If you had an accomplice, you should say so, and not have the blame of this horrible crime on your own shoulders.' " But how could the weight of the whole crime be removed from the shoulders of the prisoner as a consequence of his speaking, unless benefit as to the crime and its punishment was to arise from his speaking? Conceding that, closely analyzed, the hope of benefit which the conversation suggested was that of the removal from the conscience of the prisoner of the merely moral weight resulting from concealment, and therefore would not be an inducement, we are to consider the import of the conversation, not from a mere abstract point of view, but by the light of the impression that it was calculated to produce on the mind of the accused, situated as he was at the time the conversation took place. Thus viewed, the weight to be removed by speaking natur-565] ally imported *a suggestion of some benefit as to the crime and its punishment as arising from making a statement.

This is greatly fortified by a consideration of the words which preceded this language—that is, that Brown had declared he had witnessed the homicide, and that the detective had said he believed the prisoner was gulity and had an accomplice. It, in substance, therefore, called upon the prisoner to disclose his accomplice, and might well have been understood as holding out an encouragement that by so doing he might at least obtain a mitigation of the punishment for the crime which otherwise would assuredly follow. As said in the passage from Russell on Crimes already quoted, "The law cannot measure the force of the influence used or decide upon its effect upon the mind of the prisoner, and therefore excludes the declaration if any degree of influence has been exerted." In the case before us we find that an influence was exerted, and as any doubt as to whether the confession was voluntary must be determined in favor of the accused, we cannot escape the conclusion that error was committed by the trial court in admitting the confession under the circumstances disclosed by the record.

Our conclusion that the confession was wrongfully admitted renders it unnecessary to pass on the serious question arising from the ruling of the trial court by which in cross-examination the accused was denied the right to ask the detective as to an article of personal property taken from the prisoner at the time the alleged confession was had. In other words, that the accused could not bring out by way of cross-examination everything which took place at the time of the alleged confession, but was compelled, in order to do so, to make the detective his own witness, and therefore be placed in the position where he could not impeach him. We are also, as the result of our conclusion on the subject of the confession, relieved from examining the many other assignments of error, except in so far as they present questions which are likely to arise on the new trial.

We will now briefly consider the alleged errors of this character.

*By plea and supplemental plea in [566 abatement, and by motion to quash, defendant, preliminary to the trial, attacked the sufficiency of the indictment, because one of the grand jurors was permitted to affirm and the indictment failed to state that such juror was "conscientiously scrupulous" of being sworn, and because the indictment recited that it was presented upon the "oath" of the jurors, when, in fact it was presented upon the oath and affirmation of the jurors. At the hearing of the pleas in abatement, it appeared that when the grand jurors were impaneled one of them, upon being called to be sworn, stated that he affirmed, and declined to take an oath, and after his fellows had been regularly sworn he was formally affirmed to the same duties specified in the oath administered to the others. It is also stated in the record, following the recital of the issuance of venires for grand and petit jurors that,—

"In obedience to the said order of court, and to the venires issued thereunder, the following named grand jurors attended on the 15th day of October, A. D. 1896. On that day the said grand jurors were duly impaneled as the grand jury for the October term of this court, A. D. 1896. All of said grand jurors, being impaneled aforesaid, were duly sworn, except grand juror William Merrill, Junior, of West Newbury, who duly affirmed, twenty-one grand jurors being in attendance."

In § 1 of the Revised Statutes of the United States it is provided, among other things, that, in determining the meaning of the Revised Statutes, "a requirement of an 'oath' shall be deemed complied with by making affirmation in judicial form." Section 800 also provides that:

"Jurors to serve in the courts of the United States, in each state respectively, shall have the same qualifications, subject to the provisions hereinafter contained, and be entitled to the same exemptions, as jurors of the highest court of law in such state may have and be entitled to at the time when such jurors for service in the courts of the United States are summoned; and they shall be designated by ballot, lot, or otherwise, according to the mode of forming such juries then practised in such state court, so far as such may be practicable *by the courts of the United States or [567

the officers thereof. And for this purpose the said courts may, by rule or order, conform the designation and impaneling of juries, in substance, to the laws and usages relating to jurors in the state courts from time to time in force in such state. This section shall not apply to juries to serve in the courts of the United States in Pennsylvania."

The Public Statutes of Massachusetts 1882, chap. 213, § 6, provides as follows:

"Sec. 6. When a person returned as grand juror is conscientiously scrupulous of taking the oath before prescribed he shall be allowed to make affirmation, substituting the word 'affirm' instead of the word 'swear,' and also the words 'this you do under the pains and penalties of perjury,' instead of the words 'so help you God.'"

And § 3 of chap. 3 of the same statutes provides as follows (p. 58):

"In the construction of statutes the following rules shall be observed, unless such construction would be inconsistent with the manifest intent of the general court or repugnant to the context of the same statute, that is to say, . . . Fourteenth. The word 'oath' shall include 'affirmation' in cases where, by law, an affirmation may be substituted for an oath."

The objection that the indictment recited that it was presented "upon the oath" of the jurors, when the fact was that it was presented upon the "oath and affirmation" of the jurors, is without merit. Waiving a consideration of the question whether, under the provisions of the statutes to which reference has been made, the word "oath" might not properly be construed as meaning either "oath" or "affirmation," the recital alluded to was purely formal, and if defective was open to amendment. The record disclosing the fact that all of the grand jurors were duly sworn except grand juror William Merrill, who was "duly affirmed," the defendant could not have been prejudiced by the form of the statement made in the indictment, and the defect, if any, was rendered harmless by the curative provisions of § 1025, Revised Statutes.

568] *The further objection that neither in the indictment nor in the proof at the hearing of the pleas in abatement was it affirmatively stated or shown that grand juror Merrill, before being permitted to affirm, was proved to have possessed conscientious scruples against taking an oath, is practically concluded by the disposition made of the objection just passed upon, and is rendered nugatory by the terms of § 1025, Revised Statutes. Further, the mode of ascertaining the existence or nonexistence of such conscientious scruples was committed to the discretion of the officer who affirmed the juror, and such affirmation conclusively established that the officer had properly exercised his discretion. Commonwealth v. Fisher, 7 Gray, 492; State v. Adams, 78 Me. 486.

The remaining assignments which we deem it proper to notice relate to the overruling of objections interposed to questions propounded to certain witnesses in the character of experts. Some of these objections were made to hypothetical questions asked a number of sailors, reciting the condition of things assumed to have been established by the evidence as existing about the time of the killing, viz., the speed of the Herbert Fuller, the condition of her sails, direction of wind, etc., and inquiry as to the effect it would have on the vessel if the wheelman had taken his hands off the wheel, and what effect would be produced by lashing the wheel under similar conditions. These questions were evidently intended to supplement the testimony of Brown, who swore that he stood with both hands on the wheel during the time between 12 and 2 o'clock, and, consequently, when the murders were committed. The questions were competent, as the testimony sought to be elicited was relevant to the issue. Aside from the testimony of Brown the evidence against Bram was purely circumstantial, and it was clearly proper for the government to endeavor to establish, as a circumstance in the case, the fact that another person who was present in the vicinity at the time of the killing, could not have committed the crime. The testimony sought to be adduced had this tendency, and the fact that it might operate indirectly to fortify the credit of such person as a witness in the cause could not affect its admissibility.

*An objection to a question asked of a [569 medical witness, whether, in his opinion, a man standing at the hip of a recumbent person and striking blows on that person's head and forehead with an axe would necessarily be spattered with, or covered with, some of the blood, was also properly overruled. We think the assumed facts recited in the question were warranted by the proof in the case, and that the evidence sought to be elicited from the witness was of a character justifying an expression of opinion by the witness, the jury after all being at liberty to give to the evidence such weight as in their judgment it was entitled to. Hopt v. Utah, 120 U. S. 430 [30: 708].

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded with directions to set aside the verdict and to order a new trial.

Mr. Justice Brewer dissenting:

I dissent from the opinion and judgment in this case—

First, because I think the testimony was not open to objection. "A confession if freely and voluntarily made is evidence of the most satisfactory character." Hopt v. Utah, 110 U. S. 574, 584 [28: 262, 267]; reaffirmed in Sparf v. United States, 156 U. S. 51, 55 [39: 343, 345]. The fact that the defendant was in custody and in irons does not destroy the competency of a confession. "Confinement or imprisonment is not in itself sufficient to justify the exclusion of a confession, if it appears to have been voluntary, and was not obtained by putting the prisoner in fear or by promises." Sparf v. United States, supra. See also Wilson v. United States, 162 U. S. 613–623 [40: 1090–1096].

The witness Power, when called, testified positively that no threats were made nor any inducements held out to Bram, and this general declaration he affirmed and reaffirmed in response to inquiries made by the court and the defendant's counsel. The court, therefore, properly overruled the objection at that time made to his testifying to the statements of defendant. It is not suggested that there was error in this ruling, and the fact that inducements were held out is deduced only from the testimony subsequently given by Power of [570] the conversation between him and Bram. The first part of that conversation is as follows: "When Mr. Bram came into my office, I said to him: 'Bram, we are trying to unravel this horrible mystery.' I said: 'Your position is rather an awkward one. I have had Brown in this office, and he made a statement that he saw you do the murder.' He said: 'He could not have seen me; where was he?' I said: 'He states he was at the wheel.' 'Well,' he said, 'he could not see me from there.'" In this there is nothing which by any possibility can be tortured into a suggestion of threat or a temptation of hope. Power simply stated the obvious fact that they were trying to unravel a horrible mystery, and the further fact that Brown had charged the defendant with the crime, and the replies of Bram were given as freely and voluntarily as it is possible to conceive.

It is strange to hear it even intimated that Bram up to this time was impelled by fear or allured by hope caused in the slightest degree by these statements of Power.

The balance of the conversation is as follows: "I said, 'Now, look here, Bram, I am satisfied that you killed the captain from all I have heard from Mr. Brown. But,' I said, 'some of us here think you could not have done all that crime alone. If you had an accomplice, you should say so, and not have the blame of this horrible crime on your own shoulders.' He said: 'Well, I think, and many others on board the ship think, that Brown is the murderer; but I don't know anything about it.' He was rather short in his replies." And here, it is argued, was a suggestion of a benefit—the holding out of a hope that a full disclosure might somehow inure to his advantage. To support this contention involves a refinement of analysis which, while it may show marvelous metaphysical ability, is of little weight in practical affairs. But even if it did carry any such improper suggestion it was made at nearly the close of the conversation, and that this suggestion then made had a retroactive effect and transformed the previous voluntary statements of Bram into statements made under the influence of fear or hope, is a psychological process which I am unable to com- [571] prehend. The only reply which *Bram made to the question containing this supposed improper suggestion was this: "Well, I think, and many others on board the ship think, that Brown is the murderer; but I don't know anything about it." Can it for a moment be thought that such a reply was so significant that permitting it to go to the jury compels the putting at naught this protracted trial, and overthrowing the deliberate verdict of the twelve men who heard the evidence and condemned the defendant? With all respect to my brethren who are of a different opinion, I can but think that such a contention is wholly unsound, and that in all this conversation with Bram there was nothing of sufficient importance to justify the reversal of the judgment.

Again, there is a lack of any proper objection or exception, and if there is any one thing which may be considered as settled in all appellate courts it is that an error in the admission of testimony will not be considered unless there was a specific objection and exception at the trial. "To authorize any objection to the admission or exclusion of evidence, or to the giving or refusal of any instructions to the jury, to be heard in this court, the record must disclose, not merely the fact that the objection was taken in the court below, but that the parties excepted at the time to the action of the court thereon." Hutchins v. King, 68 U. S. 1 Wall. 53, 60 [17: 544, 546]; United States v. McMasters, 71 U. S. 4 Wall. 680, 682 [18: 311, 313]. "Our power is confined to exceptions actually taken at the trial." Pittsburgh, C. & St. L. Railway Company v. Heck, 102 U. S. 120 [26: 58]. See also Moore v. Bank of Metropolis, 38 U. S. 13 Pet. 302 [10: 172]; Camden v. Doremus, 44 U. S. 3 How. 515 [11: 705]; Zeller's Lessee v. Eckert, 45 U. S. 4 How. 289, 297 [11: 979, 982]; Phelps v. Mayer, 56 U. S. 15 How. 160 [14: 643]; Dredge v. Forsyth, 67 U. S. 2 Black, 563 [17: 253]; Young v. Martin, 75 U. S. 8 Wall. 354 [19: 418]; Belk v. Meagher, 104 U. S. 279 [26: 735]; Hanna v. Maas, 122 U. S. 24 [30: 1117]; White v. Barber, 123 U. S. 392, 419 [31: 243, 252]; Stewart v. Wyoming Cattle Ranche Company, 128 U. S. 383 [32: 439]; Anthony v. Louisville & N. Railroad Company, 132 U. S. 172 [33: 301]; Block v. Darling, 140 U. S. 234 [35: 476]; Bogk v. Gassert, 149 U. S. 17 [37: 631].

It is true these were civil cases. For it is only in the later history of this court that we have had jurisdiction of writs *of error [572] in criminal cases, but the law is equally applicable to the latter. "It is the duty of counsel seasonably to call the attention of the court to any error in impaneling the jury, in admitting testimony, or in any other proceeding during the trial by which his rights are prejudiced, and in the case of an adverse ruling to note an exception." Alexander v. United States, 138 U. S. 353, 355 [34: 954, 956]. "The general rule undoubtedly is that an objection should be so framed as to indicate the precise point upon which the court is asked to rule." Sparf v. United States, 156 U. S. 51, 56 [39: 343, 345]; Holder v. United States, 150 U. S. 91 [37: 1010]; Tucker v. United States, 151 U. S. 164 [38: 112].

It is true the defendant objected to the admission of the conversation before it was given, but upon the state of facts as then presented unquestionably the trial court ruled properly in permitting the witness to testify, for he positively declared that there was neither threat nor promise, intimidation nor inducement. If it be true, as the court now holds, that in the progress of his testimony it was developed that he did make a statement which carried an inducement—a suggestion of hope—it was then the duty of the defendant to call the attention of the court to the matter, either by objecting to any further disclosures of the conversation, or else by a motion to strike out. Nothing of the kind took place. Defendant was apparently content to let all of the subsequent conversation come in. Can it be held that the court erred in not of its own motion stopping the witness, or striking out the testimony, or instructing the jury to disregard it, when defendant asked nothing of the kind? Surely by this decision we practically overrule the long line of authorities heretofore cited affirming the necessity of calling the attention of the trial court to the specific matter, obtaining its ruling thereon and saving an exception thereto before there is any jurisdiction in this court to review. Nor is this a mere technical and arbitrary rule which may be dispensed with whenever the exigencies of any case seem to demand, and in no other way a ground for reversal can be discovered. It may be, and undoubtedly often is, the case, that though incompetent testimony be given the defendant prefers that it shall remain in order, 573] for certain *purposes, to take advantage of it in the argument before the jury. Can it be possible that he may obtain this advantage, and, having obtained and used it, insist that, because of such incompetent testimony, he is entitled to a reversal of the judgment against him? Wilson v. United States, 162 U. S. 613-624 [40: 1090-1096]. Who shall say that this defendant, though at first objecting to any testimony respecting his statements, yet, after hearing what the witness said, did not prefer that such testimony remain, as it disclosed that, at the very first moment he was informed that Brown charged him with the crime, he protested that Brown was not in a position where he could see who did the killing? Indeed, for anything in this record to the contrary, he, when a witness in his own behalf, may have given the same version of the conversation, and admitted that his statements were voluntarily made. Who shall say that he did not wish to argue before the jury that the claim made of Brown's inability to see what took place was not an excuse suggested only by the exigencies of the trial, but was presented at the very first moment of the charge; and if he was willing to let the testimony remain and have all the advantage which he could take of it in argument before the jury, can it be that he can now come to this court and say, "True I did not object to this specific testimony, nor ask to have it stricken out, but it was incompetent," and obtain a reversal on the ground of its admission?

I dissent, therefore, first, because I think the testimony was properly received; and, secondly, because no motion was made to strike it out and no exception taken to its admission.

The Chief Justice and Mr. Justice Brown concur in this dissent.

LOUIS B. ADAMS and Watson N. Shilling, Appts.,
v.
HIRAM H. HENDERSON, George H. Burgitt, Administrator of Edward A. Reed, Deceased, and Millie G. Reed.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 573-583.)

Power of court of equity to correct mutual mistake in contract—good and indefeasible title in fee—encumbrance—when payments may be recovered back.

1. A court of equity has power to correct a mutual mistake in the description of land, and make the contract for the sale of the land conform to the real intention of the parties.
2. A good and indefeasible title in fee imports such ownership of the land as enables the owner to exercise absolute and exclusive control of it as against all others.
3. Land encumbered with the right of a railroad company, for all time, to pass over and across it for the purpose of prospecting for and mining minerals other than coal, is not held by a good and indefeasible title in fee simple, which a purchaser who buys under representations from the seller that he has such a title can be compelled to accept.
4. Cash payments for land, made on the basis of a good and indefeasible title, may be recovered back by the purchaser when it is found that the vendor cannot make such a title.

Argued and Submitted November 1, 1897. Decided December 6, 1897.

APPEAL from a decree of the Supreme Court of the Territory of Utah affirming the decree of the District Court of the Fourth Judicial District of that Territory adjudging a contract for the sale of land made between Louis B. Adams et al. and Edward A. Reed et al. to be void, and also adjudging void three promissory notes and a mortgage. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. J. M. Wilson, P. L. Williams, Kimball & Kimball, John F. Dillon, and E. Ellery Anderson, for appellants:

The sellers, Adams and Schilling, had good title to the premises in question at the time of the sale to Reed and Henderson.

The lands were included within the Union Pacific land grant conferred upon that company by the act of July 2, 1862. It is entirely settled that, by the terms of this act and subject to the exceptions therein contained, there was granted to the Union Pacific Railroad Company an immediate legal title to the lands referred to in the grant, which lands became fixed as to metes and bounds by the location of the road.

Material representations which are untrue, though innocently made, or the concealment of material facts by mistake or inadvertence, when relied on and become the foundation of the active relations between the parties, operate as a "surprise and imposition" and constitute such fraud as will move a court of equity to decree a rescission of an executory contract.

and W. N. Shilling on one side, and Edward A. Reed and H. H. Henderson on the other side, and three promissory notes given by the purchasers, together with a mortgage executed by them to secure the payment of such notes, were adjudged to be null and void.

It was also adjudged that Henderson and Burgitt—the latter having become guardian of the person and estate of Reed who was incapable of conducting his own affairs—recover of 575] Adams *and Shilling the amount paid by Henderson and Reed on the agreed price of the land purchased by them from Adams and Shilling.

The decree was affirmed by the supreme court of the territory, and the case is here for review upon the appeal of Adams and Shilling.

The material facts out of which the case arises, and which are embodied in a report of a special master in chancery, are as follows:

In March, 1890, Shilling and Adams, in response to an inquiry made by Reed and Henderson, stated that they owned and had a good, indefeasible title in fee simple to 440 acres of land lying a few miles west of Ogden City, Weber county, Utah territory.

The lands referred to—as was understood by all parties at the time—were the east half of section 9, township 5 north of range 2 west of the Salt Lake meridian; the south half of the southwest quarter of said section; and the northeast quarter of the southwest quarter of that section.

Reed and Henderson had not at that time seen the land, and had no knowledge as to the title. But Shilling and Adams promised that they would furnish an abstract of title. Reed and Henderson, relying and acting upon the representation of Adams and Shilling that they had a good and indefeasible estate in fee simple to the lands inquired about, without investigating the title, purchased an undivided two-thirds interest in the 440 acres for the sum of $7,333.32, of which one third was to be paid and was paid in cash, and time was given for the payment of the balance with interest. They would not have made the purchase if they had not believed the above representation as to title to be true.

On the 27th of March, 1890, Reed and Henderson received from Adams and Shilling a deed of general warranty for the following land: An undivided two thirds of the east half of section 9, township 6 north of range 2 west of the Salt Lake meridian, of the south half of the southwest quarter of that section, and of the northeast quarter of the southwest quarter of the same section, in Weber county, Utah.

The land contracted for, it will be observed, 576] was in *township 5, while the land actually conveyed was in township 6. But the grantors intended by the above deed to convey an undivided two thirds of the land in township 5, and the grantees supposed that the estate embraced by the conveyance was that which they intended to purchase. But by mistake of the scrivener, the premises conveyed were described as lying in township 6.

At the time the above deed was received the grantees, in addition to the cash payment of one third of the purchase price, executed two promissory notes payable to the grantors for the sum of $2,444.45, each bearing 8 per cent interest, payable one year and six months from March 26, 1890, and secured by a mortgage on the premises. But in that mortgage, by the mistake of the scrivener who prepared it, the land was described as lying in township 6. The mortgage was duly signed, witnessed, and acknowledged, Reed and Henderson, at the time, fully believing and acting upon the representation of the grantors as to title, and paying to the grantors the interest on said notes down to and including September 26, 1890, which amounted to $180. They also signed a promissory note of June 26, 1891, payable to the Utah National Bank of Ogden, Utah, for the sum of $391.10, as the interest on the above notes, which were held by the bank. The note last named was brought into court, and when the final decree was rendered it was still in court for the defendants.

The plaintiffs Shilling and Adams failed to furnish an abstract of title; and Reed and Henderson, having an opportunity to sell the land in township 5, and assuming that that was the land conveyed to and mortgaged back by themselves, procured an abstract on the 3d day of September, 1891.

The above lands in township 5 are within 10 miles of the line of the Union Pacific Railroad, and within the limits of the lands granted to that company by the act of Congress of July 1, 1862. 12 Stat. at L. 489, chap. 120. They lie in a valley at the base of the Wasatch mountains, and had theretofore been used and cultivated as agricultural lands. But no exploration or examination has ever been made on them for coal or minerals of any kind or description.

*As bearing on the condition of the [577 title to the land in township 5, it may be stated that the Union Pacific Railroad Company twice mortgaged all the lands granted to it by the act of Congress of July 1, 1862, and the act amendatory thereof approved July 2, 1864 (12 Stat. at L 489, chap. 120; 13 Stat. at L. 356, chap. 216); one of the mortgages being dated April 16, 1867, and the other, December 18, 1873.

Adams and Shilling acquired by proper conveyance made in 1889 all the interest of the Union Pacific Railroad Company in the lands in township 5, sold by them to Reed and Henderson, and freed from the liens created by the above mortgages, except that the deed received by them from that company contained a clause, reserving "to the said Union Pacific Railroad Company the exclusive right to prospect for coal and other minerals within and underlying said lands, and to mine for and remove the same if found, and for this purpose it shall have the right of way over and across said lands a space necessary for the conduct of said business thereon without charge or liability for damage therefor."

No patent has ever issued from the government for the land in township 5.

Parties applied to Reed and Henderson for the purchase of that land, but they declined and refused to buy, and a sale by them was defeated.

Within two days of the 3d of September, 1891, and before the bringing of this action, Reed and Henderson ascertained that the plaintiffs were not the owners of and had no title to the land which the deed from Adams and Shilling purported to convey to them, that is, to the land in township 6.

On or about the 4th day of September, 1891, Reed and Henderson notified Adams and Shilling that they rescinded the contract of sale, and demanded, not only the return to them of the moneys paid on account of their purchase, with interest, but the surrender of the two notes of $1,444.45 each, bearing date March 27, 1890, and the note for $391.10, dated June 26, 1891. All of those notes had been returned by the bank to Adams and Shilling.

After Reed and Henderson notified Adams 578]and Shilling of *the rescission of the contract of sale, and before the bringing of this suit, Adams and Shilling tendered another deed—a special warranty deed, containing a proper description of the land intended to be sold by them to Reed and Henderson. The latter refused to accept that deed, saying that they rescinded the contract of sale; that Adams and Shilling did not have a good title to the land described therein; and urging the objection also that the deed was not one of general warranty. The deed so tendered was dated September 29, 1891.

At the time Adams and Shilling tendered the deed of special warranty, the title to the land therein described was encumbered by the above reservation in the deed of 1889 made by the Union Pacific Railroad Company to Adams and Shilling, of an exclusive right in the Union Pacific Railroad Company to mine, under said land, for coal and other minerals, and to remove the same.

Subsequently, the Union Pacific Railroad Company executed and delivered to Reed and Henderson a quitclaim deed dated November 2, 1891, and which was acknowledged November 17, 1891, and duly recorded on the 8th of January, 1892. This deed released the land in township 5 from the claim of that company under the coal reservation contained in the deed of 1889. But it did not release the right of that company to prospect for and mine "other minerals" under that land.

On the 28th of March, 1890, Reed and Henderson let, leased, and demised unto Adams and Shilling, who were occupying the land, for the term of six months from that date, the land in township 5. But neither Henderson nor Reed ever actually occupied any part of it.

Neither of the notes described in the mortgage of March 27, 1890, made by Reed and Henderson, has been paid. Adams and Shilling are still the owners and holders of them, as well as of the mortgage. The amount unpaid on those notes is the principal of each one, with interest from September 26, 1890, at the rate of 8 per cent per annum.

The relief sought by the suit was a decree reforming the mortgage given by Reed and Hen- 579]derson so as to correctly *describe the land in township 5, and then a sale thereof in satisfaction of the costs of the action, and the balance of the purchase money, with a personal decree for any deficiency in purchase price that may be found to exist.

The defendants controverted the right of the plaintiffs to any decree, and by cross-complaint, asked the cancelation of the above mortgage and notes, and a judgment for the amount they had paid to the plaintiffs with interest.

The decree rendered was in accordance with the prayer of the cross-complaint. In legal effect it was a decree rescinding the contract between the parties, because of the inability of the plaintiffs to make a sufficient title to the lands sold by them.

Under the facts stated, the case is within a very narrow compass. It is found, and the plaintiffs and defendants agree, that the former intended to sell, and the latter intended to buy, the land in township 5. By mistake the vendors conveyed land in another township which they did not intend to sell, to which they had no title, and which the defendants had no thought of buying; and by mistake, the grantees, in order to secure the purchase price for the land they in fact purchased, mortgaged back to the plaintiffs the land in township 6 which the latter had assumed to convey to them. That a court of equity has power to correct this mutual mistake, make the instruments given in execution of the contract conform to the real intention of the parties, as established by clear and convincing proof, and hold the parties to their actual agreement, cannot be doubted.† But before the mortgage executed by the defendants can be reformed so as to properly describe the land which the plaintiffs intended to sell, and which the defendants intended to buy and mortgage back, *it must appear that the plain- [580 tiffs have such title as they represented themselves to have when selling the land. A good and indefeasible title in fee imports such ownership of the land as enables the owner to exercise absolute and exclusive control of it as against all others.

That the plaintiffs have no such title is too clear to admit of dispute. They hold under the Union Pacific Railroad Company. They accepted a conveyance from that company which expressly reserved, in its favor, and without limit of time, an exclusive right not only "to prospect for coal and other minerals" under the land in question, and "to mine for and remove the same if found," but "a right of way over and across said lands a space necessary for the conduct of said business thereon without charge or liability for damage therefor." It does not appear that the railroad company is under any legal obligation to surrender or waive this reservation. The plaintiffs cannot compel it to do so. It is true that the reservation was subsequently released or withdrawn, so far as it related to coal, but it is in full force as to other minerals. So that the plaintiffs, in effect, ask that, instead of a good and indefeasible title in fee simple, the defendants shall take and pay for land encumbered with the right of the railroad company for all time, to pass over and across it for the purpose of prospecting for and mining minerals other than coal. A court of equity could not compel the defendants to take and pay for land thus encumbered without making for the parties a contract which they did not choose to make for themselves. "Equity," this court said in Hunt v. Rousmanier's Admrs. 26 U. S. 1 Pet. 1, 14 [7: 27, 33], "may compel parties to perform their agreements, when fairly entered into, according to their terms; but it has no power to make agreements for parties, and then compel them to execute the same. The former is a legitimate branch of its jurisdiction, and in its exercise, is highly beneficial to society; the latter is without its authority, and the exercise of it would be, not only an usurpation of power, but would be highly mischievous in its consequences."

Reference was made in argument to the fact that no patent has ever been issued to the rail-[581]road company for the land in *question, and it has been suggested by the defendants that if it was discovered, before a patent issued, that it was mineral land, the title of the company would fail altogether; for the grant made by Congress to the company did not include mineral lands. Barden v. Northern Pacific Railroad Company, 154 U. S. 288, 331 [38: 992, 1003]. We do not think it necessary to consider this aspect of the case, nor to determine whether the plaintiffs would be entitled to the relief asked, if the mineral reservation had not been made by the railroad company, and nothing else appeared affecting the title except the fact that no patent had been issued by the United States, together with a possibility that before the issuing of a patent the land might be ascertained to be mineral land which did not pass under the grant by Congress. We forbear any expression of opinion upon that point, because, if it be assumed for the purposes of this case that the fact just stated would not stand in the plaintiffs' way, we are of opinion that the mineral reservation made by the railroad company is in itself such an encumbrance as prevents the plaintiffs from making a good and indefeasible title to the land.

It is suggested that the reservation as to "other minerals" ought not to be deemed an obstacle to the relief asked, because it may never appear that there are any minerals under the land; that it cannot be assumed, in the absence of proof, that the defendants are likely to be disturbed in the full and complete enjoyment of the land for every purpose for which it is adapted. On the other hand, it cannot be affirmed, in view of the discovery of valuable minerals in many parts of the west, that there are no minerals, other than coal, under the land in question. What the defendants are entitled to is a marketable title—a good and indefeasible title in fee. But that they will not obtain if forced to take the land subject to the railroad company's right of way over it for the purpose of prospecting for and mining minerals, which may be taken off, when found. From that burden they cannot be relieved in any way except by the voluntary action of the railroad company.

But it is contended by the plaintiffs that the act of March 3, 1887, *entitled "An Act [582] to Provide for the Adjustment of Land Grants Made by Congress to Aid in the Construction of Railroads and for the Forfeiture of Unearned Lands, and for Other Purposes" (24 Stat. at L. chap. 376), the act of March 2, 1896 (29 Stat. 556, at L. 42, chap. 39), and the concurrent resolution of June 10, 1896 (29 Stat. at L. Appx. p. 10), confirmed as against the United States the right and title of bona fide purchasers of lands contained within the limits of railroad grants; so that, as against such bona fide purchasers, the United States, by the acts cited, expressly disclaims any rights whatever, and confirms absolutely the title of such bona fide purchasers. By this contention is meant that the act of March 3, 1887, as the same has been construed by this court in United States v. Winona & St. Peter Railroad Company, 165 U. S. 463, 466-469 [41: 789, 791], protects the title of Adams and Shilling as bona fide purchasers, even if, before a patent was issued by the United States, the lands in question should prove to be mineral lands.

It is sufficient, upon this point, to say that if the legislative enactments referred to have any reference whatever to mineral lands—if they were held applicable to lands purchased in good faith from the railroad company, and which turned out to be mineral lands that Congress never granted—that would only remove one of the difficulties which, it is insisted, are in the way of plaintiffs. For, if the plaintiffs' title is, under the legislation of 1887 and 1896, good as against the United States, there will still remain the encumbrance upon it arising from the right reserved by the railroad company, for all time—whether the plaintiffs or their vendees consented or not—to go upon the lands in question, for the purpose of prospecting and mining for minerals other than coal, and removing any found there. A patent would convey the interest of the United States in the land. But it would not destroy or release the mineral reservation made by the Union Pacific Railroad Company in its deed to Adams and Shilling. Purchasers from Adams and Shilling would be bound by that reservation, even if the United States issued a patent to the railroad company or to its vendees.

The result of these views is that the defendants were not *bound to accept the deed [583] tendered by the plaintiffs; and as it appears that the plaintiffs cannot make such a title as they agreed to give, as the cash payment was made upon the basis of a good and indefeasible title in the plaintiffs, the defendants were entitled upon their cross-complaint, framed in accordance with the established modes of procedure in the territory, to have a decree which, in effect, rescinds the contract, and gives them back what they paid.

The decree is affirmed.

Re TAMPA SUBURBAN RAILROAD COMPANY, Petitioner.

Certiorari, when will not be granted.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 583–588.)

A certiorari cannot be granted to review a preliminary restraining order, and an order appointing a receiver and continuing an injunction in aid of a receivership, on the ground that these orders are void for want of power in the judge to grant them outside of his circuit, when they are made in a case in which an appeal can be taken from a final decree to the circuit court of appeals, since there is a plain and adequate remedy by appeal from such interlocutory orders in such cases under the judiciary act of March 3, 1891, as amended by the act of February 18, 1895.

[Original.]

Argued November 29, 1897. Decided December 20, 1897.

ON APPLICATION for leave to file the petition of the Tampa Suburban Railroad Company for a writ of certiorari directed to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of Florida to remove the proceedings in a suit brought by the Central Trust Company of New York, plaintiff, against the Consumers' Electric Light & Street Railroad Company of Tampa and the Tampa Suburban Railroad Company, for the foreclosure of a mortgage executed by the Consumers' Company to the Central Trust Company to secure its bonds upon the property of the last-named company, including its street railways, franchises, and leases, and its rights under a lease from the Tampa Suburban Railway Company, the certiorari being asked in order to review certain orders made by the circuit judge in the state of Ohio on the ground of his want of jurisdiction, etc. Leave denied.

Statement by Mr. Chief Justice Fuller:

The Consumers' Electric Light & Street Railroad Company of Tampa executed a mortgage to the Central Trust Company of New York July 1, 1895, to secure an issue of bonds amounting to $350,000 upon all the property of the company, including its street railways, franchises, and leases, and, among other things, all its rights under a lease from the Tampa Suburban Railroad Company, made or to be made, and covering all the property of the latter.

On July 22, 1897, the Trust Company presented its bill of complaint against the consumers and suburban companies for the foreclosure of its mortgage on an alleged default in the payment of interest due July 1, 1897, to one of 584 the circuit judges *for the fifth judicial circuit, at the town of Wadsworth, in the state of Ohio, and made application thereon for the appointment of a receiver. It was admitted that this application was made ex parte, but claimed that one Chapin, president of the companies, consented thereto. The circuit judge thereupon, on that day, granted an order taking jurisdiction; directing that cause be shown at Tampa, in the state of Florida, August 4, 1897, why a receiver should not be appointed; and in the meantime restraining defendants from interfering with or disposing of the mortgaged property. This order was transmitted to be entered as of July 22, 1897, in the circuit court for the southern district of Florida, and was so entered, and the bill filed as of that date. Notice was then given to defendants that, on the bill of complaint and the affidavit of Chester W. Chapin, complainant would apply to said judge of the circuit court "at his chambers at Wadsworth, Medina county, Ohio, on the 3d day of August, 1897, for an order appointing a temporary receiver." On that day counsel for the trust company and counsel for defendants appeared before the circuit judge at Wadsworth, Ohio; but counsel for the suburban company objected to the jurisdiction and authority of the circuit judge to make or enter any order or decree outside the territorial limits of the fifth judicial circuit of the United States, in which the suit was pending. These objections were overruled and an amendment and supplement to the bill of complaint was then presented to the circuit judge, together with a number of affidavits on behalf of complainant, to which the suburban company objected, on various grounds, which objections were overruled. Thereupon the suburban company filed an answer to the original bill of complaint and certain affidavits and documents. Argument was then had and an order signed by the circuit judge at Wadsworth, Ohio, on the 3d day of August, 1897, which, after appointing Chester W. Chapin receiver, and directing him to take immediate possession "of all and singular the property above described, wherever situated and found, and to continue the operation of the railway and plant of the defendant companies and conduct systematically their business in the *same manner as at present, [585 and discharge all the public duties obligatory upon the defendants or either of them;" thus continued:

"Each and every of the officers, directors, agents, and employees of the said defendants or either of them are hereby required and commanded forthwith, upon demand of the said receiver or his duly authorized agent, to turn over and deliver to the said receiver or his duly constituted representative all the property of the defendant companies above mentioned, and all books of accounts, vouchers, papers, deeds, leases, contracts, bills, notes, accounts, moneys, and other property in his or their hands or under his or their control, and each and every of such directors, officers, agents, and employees are hereby commanded and required to obey and conform to such orders as may be given to them from time to time by said receiver or his duly constituted representative in conducting the operation of the said property and in discharging his duty as receiver, and each and every of such officers, directors, agents, and employees of the defendant companies or either of them are hereby enjoined from interfering in any manner whatever with the possession or management of any part of the property over which the receiver is hereby appointed, or from interfering in any way to prevent the discharge of the duties of such receiver."

NOTE.—As to certiorari in the United States courts, —see note to Clark v. Hackett, 17: 69.

As to certiorari to review quashing of appeal from conviction, see note to Grand Rapids v. Braudy (Mich.) 32 L. R. A. 116.

The receiver was then authorized by the order to operate the street railway system and other property, with the usual provisions in that regard, being required to give bond to be approved by the clerk of the court or by a judge thereof, conditioned for the proper discharge of his duties. The order concluded: "And it is further ordered that the original and supplemental bills in this cause, and all exhibits, affidavits, and other papers filed therein, be transferred to and filed in the clerk's office, at Tampa, Florida, at which place all process shall be returnable."

This order was transmitted by the circuit judge by letter from Wadsworth, Ohio, under date August 4, 1897, to the clerk of the circuit court at Jacksonville, with directions to file it, which letter informed the clerk that the circuit 586] judge *had sent by express to him "supplemental bill and numerous affidavits offered by counsel, which, on receipt, also file, of same date as order appointing receiver. Attached to the order appointing receiver I have appended an order directing the original bill and all the affidavits and exhibits filed to be transferred to the clerk's office at Tampa."

The Tampa Suburban Railroad Company presented its petition to this court for writ of certiorari directed to the circuit court for the southern district of Florida to remove the proceedings in question for review, and on the application to file the petition, a rule to show cause was granted, to which return has been made.

The petition set forth in detail the matters above stated, in brief, with others, and insisted that the orders made by the circuit judge in the state of Ohio were void for want of jurisdiction; that the mortgage of the consumers' company was invalid for not having been properly executed, as required by the statutes of Florida; that foreclosure was prematurely sought because the default in the payment of interest had not been continued for sixty days, contended to be a condition provided in the mortgage; that the original bill and exhibits were not before the circuit judge when the order of August 3d was granted; that the circuit judge improperly considered the amended bill and accompanying affidavits when notice thereof had not been given; that the restraining order was not limited in duration; and that there was no proof of danger of irreparable damage by delay. It was admitted that on the 22d of July and until and long after the 3d of August, the district judge for the southern district of Florida and both circuit judges and the circuit justice were absent from the fifth judicial circuit, and petitioner charged that it had filed in the circuit court for the southern district of Florida motions to discharge, annul, and set aside the orders of July 22d and August 3d; but that the motions had remained undisposed of up to October 9th, when the petition was verified, because there was no judge of the United States courts within that circuit who had authority to hear and determine the same.

Messrs. Noah Brooks Kent Pettingill and Thomas Mitchell Shackelford for petitioner.

Messrs. Adrian H. Joline and Henry W. Calhoun for respondent.

By § 716 of the Revised Statutes it is provided that: "The Supreme Court and the circuit and district courts shall have power to issue writs of scire facias. They shall also have power to issue all writs not specifically provided for by statute, which may be necessary for the exercise of their respective jurisdictions, and agreeable to the usages and principles of law." This undoubtedly authorized the issue of writs of certiorari in all proper cases. American Construction Company v. Jacksonville, T. & K. W. R. Co. 148 U. S. 372, 380 [37: 486, 489].

In the case of Chetwood, 165 U. S. 443, 461 [41: 782, 788], we allowed the writ to bring up for review certain final orders of the circuit court which interfered with causes pending in this court; and the question of the issue of the writ by this court in the exercise of its inherent general powers, under the Constitution, did not arise.

By this application the review of two interlocutory orders is sought, the one, a preliminary restraining order, and the other appointing a receiver and continuing the injunction in aid of the receivership, on the ground that both these orders were void for want of power in the circuit judge to grant them outside of his circuit.

That this presents a question of grave importance is obvious, but it is objected that the application cannot be entertained because the appellate jurisdiction of this court can only be exercised in respect of final judgments or decrees, and, also, because there is another adequate remedy. We need not consider the first of these objections, as the second is sufficient to dispose of the application.

When sought as between private persons, the general rule *is that the writ of certiorari, [588 such as asked here, will be granted or denied, in the sound discretion of the court, on special cause or ground shown; and will be refused where there is a plain and equally adequate remedy by appeal or otherwise.

By the 7th section of the judiciary act of March 3, 1891 (26 Stat. at L. 826, chap. 517), as amended by the act of February 18, 1895 (28 Stat. at L. 666, chap. 96), it is provided: "That where, upon a hearing in equity in a district court or a circuit court, an injunction shall be granted, continued, refused, or dissolved by an interlocutory order or decree or an application to dissolve an injunction shall be refused in a case in which an appeal from a final decree may be taken under the provisions of this act to the circuit court of appeals, an appeal may be taken from such interlocutory order or decree granting, continuing, refusing, dissolving, or refusing to dissolve an injunction to the circuit court of appeals."

The suit in which the orders complained of were entered is one in which an appeal from a final decree might be taken to the circuit court of appeals, and this even though the question of the jurisdiction of the circuit court was involved. United States v. Jahn, 155 U. S. 109 [39: 87]. An appeal to the circuit court of ap peals might therefore have been taken from these orders or from an order refusing to set them aside and dissolve the injunction. We are not called on to say that an appeal would lie from an order simply appointing a receiver, but where the order also grants an injunction, the appeal provided for may be taken, and carries up the entire order, and the case may, indeed, on occasion, be considered and decided on its merits. Smith v. Vulcan Iron Works, 165 U. S. 518 [41: 810].

The application for leave to file this petition must therefore be denied; but we must not be understood as intimating an opinion that a circuit judge has power to grant injunctions, appoint receivers, or enter orders or decrees, in invitum, outside of his circuit.

Leave denied.

MICHIGAN LAND & LUMBER COMPANY, LIMITED, Plff. in Err.,
v.
CHARLES A. RUST, Survivor, etc.

(See S.C. Reporter's ed. 589-604.)

Patent, when necessary to confer legal title to lands—power of the land department—acceptance by state—act of March 3, 1857.

1. When an act of Congress grants lands, and the granting act specifically provides for the issue of a patent, the rule is that the legal title remains in the government until the issue of the patent.
2. The power of the Land Department to inquire into the extent and validity of rights claimed against the government does not cease until the legal title has passed.
3. An acceptance by a state officer charged under an act of Congress with the duty of so doing, of resurveys of land granted to the state as within the authority of the Land Department, makes the adjustment of the grant upon the basis of such resurveys final and conclusive.
4. The confirmation by the act of Congress of March 3, 1857, which is a general act reaching to all the states, of the selection of swamp and overflowed lands "heretofore reported to the commissioner of the General Land Office," cannot be construed as intended to put an end to all further inquiry in the Land Department, nor to oust that department of jurisdiction to inquire into and correct any frauds and mistakes in the list previously approved and certified, nor to make such list a finality and an absolute transfer of the equitable title.

IN ERROR to the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit to review a judgment of that court affirming the judgment of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Michigan in favor of defendants, in an action of ejectment brought by the Michigan Land & Lumber Company, Limited, plaintiff, against Charles A. Rust et al., to recover possession of the undivided half of lands in Clare county, Michigan. Affirmed.

See same case below, 31 U. S. App. 731.

Statement by Mr. Justice Brewer:

This was an action of ejectment commenced in the circuit court of the United States for the eastern district of Michigan on February 11, 1888. On November 28, 1892, the case came on for trial before the court and a jury. At the close of the testimony the jury, under the instructions of the court, returned a verdict for defendants. On May 7, 1895, this judgment was affirmed by the court of appeals (31 U. S. App. 731), and to review such judgment the case was brought here *on [590 writ of error. The land in dispute is situated in Clare county, being the S.E. ¼ of S. E. ¼ of section 20; N.W. ¼ of S. W. ¼ of section 21; N.W. ¼ of S.E. ¼ of section 22; N.W. ¼ of N.W. ¼ of section 28; N. ½ of S. W. ¼ of section 29; N. ½ of N.E. ¼ of section 35, township 18, range 3 W.; and E. ½ of S.W. ¼ of section 1, township 18, range 4 W., and amounting to 400 acres, the undivided half of which only was claimed by plaintiff.

The contention of the plaintiff, generally speaking, is that this was swamp land, and granted to the state of Michigan by the act of Congress of date September 28, 1850, granting swamp lands to the several states (9 Stat. at L. 519, chap. 84); that it was included in a list of such lands in the Ionia land district, approved by the Secretary of the Interior and forwarded to the Governor of Michigan on January 13, 1854; that the act of March 3, 1857 (11 Stat. at L. 251, chap. 117), confirmed the action of the Secretary of the Interior, and thereby passed the title to the state of Michigan, by which state it was, on October 14, 1887, conveyed to plaintiff's grantor.

The defendants, on the other hand, contend that the original surveys of the public lands in the state of Michigan were erroneous; that, at the instance of the state, Congress ordered resurveys, which resurveys were carried on from the years 1842 to 1857; that, while it is true this land was by the original surveys classed as swamp land and included in the Ionia land district list approved and certified to the state of Michigan, the resurveys showed that it was not land of that description; that a new list for that district, not including this land, was in 1886 made out and certified to the state; that such new list was accepted by the state as correct, and a patent for the lands described therein issued to and received by it; that after all this had taken place and in 1870 the land in question was sold by the officers of the United States at auction after public

Mr. Justice Brewer delivered the opinion of the court:

This case involves questions of the power of the Land Department over the matter of the identification of the particular lands passing under the swamp land act of 1850, of the finality of the action of the Secretary of the Interior in approving and certifying to the governor of the state a list of such lands, and of the effect of the confirmatory act of 1857. There is no testimony showing what was in fact the condition of the land, whether swamp or not, at the time of the passage of the act of 1850, and the case turns wholly upon the documentary evidence.

The act of 1850 made a grant in præsenti; in other words, the title then passed to all lands which at that date were swamp lands, and the only matters thereafter to be considered were those of identification. Hannibal & St. J. Railroad Co. v. Smith, 76 U. S. 9 Wall. 95 [19:599]; French v. Fyan, 93 U. S. 169 [23: 812]; Martin v. Marks, 97 U. S. 345 [24:940]; Rice v. Sioux City & St. P. Railroad Company, 110 U. S. 695 [28:289]; Wright v. Roseberry, 121 U. S. 488 [30:1039]; Tubbs v. Wilhoit, 138 U. S. 134 [34:887]. But while the act operated as a grant in præsenti, the determination of what lands were swamp lands was intrusted to the Secretary of the Interior. Section 2 contains this provision:

"That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior, as soon as may be practicable after the passage of this act, to make out an accurate list and plats of the lands described as aforesaid, and transmit the same to the governor of the state of Arkansas, and, at the request of said governor, cause a patent to be issued to the state therefor; and on that patent the fee simple to said lands shall vest in said state of Arkansas, subject to the disposal of the legislature thereof."

592] *It may be remarked in passing that while the 1st and 2d sections refer specially to the state of Arkansas, § 4 of the act makes it applicable to all the states. It is true that in the 1st section Congress defines the lands granted as "swamp and overflowed lands, made unfit thereby for cultivation;" and § 3, referring to the lists and plats ordered by § 2 to be made out by the Secretary of the Interior, contains this further specification as to the character of the lands granted:

"That in making out a list and plats of the lands aforesaid, all legal subdivisions, the greater part of which is 'wet and unfit for cultivation,' shall be included in said lists and plats; but when a greater part of a subdivision is not of the character, the whole of it shall be excluded therefrom."

But while Congress thus defined what is intended to grant as swamp and overflowed lands it intrusted, as appears from § 2, the identification of those lands to the Secretary of the Interior.

It will be perceived that the act contemplated the issue of a patent as the means of transferring the legal title. In Rogers Locomotive Mach. Works v. American Emigrant Company, 164 U. S. 559, 574 [41: 552, 558], it was said, speaking in refereuce to this matter, and after a full review of the previous authorities: "When he [that is, the Secretary of the Interior] made such identificatiou, then, and not before, the state was entitled to a patent, and 'on such patent' the fee-simple title vested in the state. The state's title was at the outset an inchoate one, and did not become perfect, as the date of the act, until a patent was issued."

Generally speaking, while the legal title remains in the United States, the grant is in process of administration and the land is subject to the jurisdiction of the Land Department of the government. It is true a patent is not always necessary for the transfer of the legal title. Sometimes an act of Congress will pass the fee. Strother v. Lucas, 37 U. S. 12 Pet. 410, 454 [9:1137, 1154]; Grignon's Lessee v. Astor, 43 U. S. 2 How. 319 [11:285]; Chouteau v. Eckhart, 43 U. S. 2 How. 344–372 [11:293–304]; Glasgow v. Hortiz, 66 U. S. 1 Black, 595 [17:110]; Langdeau v. Hanes, 88 U. S. 21 Wall. 521 [22:606]; Ryan v. Carter, 93 U. S. 78 [23: 807]. Sometimes *a [593 certification of a list of lands to the grantee is declared to be operative to transfer such title (Rev. Stat. § 2449; Frasher v. O'Connor, 115 U. S. 102 [29: 311]), but wherever the granting act specifically provides for the issue of a patent, then the rule is that the legal title remains in the government until the issue of the patent (Bagnell v. Broderick, 38 U. S. 13 Pet. 426–450 [10:235–242]); and while so remaining the grant is in process of administration, and the jurisdiction of the Land Department is not lost.

It is, of course, not pretended that when an equitable title has passed the Land Department has power to arbitrarily destroy that equitable title. It has jurisdiction, however, after proper notice to the party claiming such equitable title, and upon a hearing, to determine the question whether or not such title has passed. Cornelius v. Kessel, 128 U. S. 456 [22: 482]; Orchard v. Alexander, 157 U. S. 372–383 [39: 737–741]; Parsons v. Venzke, 164 U. S. 89 [41:360]. In other words, the power of the department to inquire into the extent and validity of the rights claimed against the government does not cease until the legal title has passed. "A warrant and survey authorize the proprietor of them to demand the legal title, but do not, in themselves, constitute a legal title. Until the consummation of the title by a grant, the person who acquires an equity holds a right subject to examination." Miller v. Kerr, 20 U. S. 7 Wheat. 1, 6 [5: 381, 382]. After the issue of the patent the matter becomes subject to inquiry only in the courts and by judicial proceedings. Stone v. United States, 69 U. S. 2 Wall. 525, 535 [17: 765, 767]; Moore v. Robbins, 96 U. S. 530 [24: 848]; United States v. Schurz, 102 U. S. 378–396 [26: 167–172]; Bicknell v. Comstock, 113 U. S. 149, 151 [28: 962, 963]; Iron Silver Mining Co. v. Camp- bell, 135 U. S. 286 [34: 155]; Williams v. United States, 138 U. S. 514 [34: 1026]. This jurisdiction of the department has been maintained in cases of pre-emption where the entire purchase money has been paid and a receiver's final certificate issued. Orchard v. Alexander, 157 U. S. 372 [39: 737], and cases cited in the opinion; Parsons v. Venzke, 164 U. S. 89 [41: 360].

In Knight v. United States Land Association, 142 U. S. 161 [35: 974], is a full discussion by Mr. Justice Lamar of the power of the Secretary of the Interior over proceedings in respect to 594] the *disposition of public lands, and on page 178 [35: 980] it is said, as illustrative of the scope of that power: "For example, if, when a patent is about to issue, the secretary should discover a fatal defect in the proceedings, or that by reason of some newly ascertained fact the patent, if issued, would have to be annulled, and that it would be his duty to ask the Attorney General to institute proceedings for its annulment, it would hardly be seriously contended that the secretary might not interfere and prevent the execution of the patent. He could not be obliged to sit quietly and allow a proceeding to be consummated which it would be immediately his duty to ask the Attorney General to take measures to annul." And, again, on page 181 [35: 981] is this language: "The secretary is the guardian of the people of the United States over the public lands. The obligations of his oath of office oblige him to see that the law is carried out, and that none of the public domain is wasted or is disposed of to a party not entitled to it. He represents the government, which is a party in interest in every case involving the surveying and disposal of the public lands." See also Orchard v. Alexander, 157 U. S. 372, 381, 382 [39: 737, 741]; Warner Valley Stock Company v. Smith, 165 U. S. 28, 34 [41: 621, 624]. This jurisdiction extends to the ordering of new surveys whenever in the judgment of the department there has been error or fraud in those already made. Cragin v. Powell, 128 U. S. 691 [32: 566]. In Tubbs v. Wilhoit, 138 U. S. 134, 143 [34: 887, 890], the court quoted with approval this passage from a letter of the Secretary of the Interior: "There can be no doubt but that under the act of July 4, 1836, reorganizing the General Land Office, the commissioner has general supervision over all surveys, and that authority is exercised whenever error or fraud is alleged on the part of the surveyor general." And in New Orleans v. Paine, 147 U. S. 261 [37: 162], the question was presented as to the power of the department to order a new survey, and on page 266 [37: 163] the rule was thus stated: "If the department was not satisfied with this survey, there was no rule of law standing in the way of its ordering another. Until the matter is closed by final action, the proceedings of an officer of a department are as much open to review or reversal by 595] himself, *or his successor, as are the interlocutory decrees of a court open to review upon the final hearing." So, notwithstanding that a survey had been made and that such survey indicated that the land in controversy was swamp land, and, therefore, passing under the act of 1850 to the state of Michigan, it was within the power of the Land Department, at any time prior to the issue of a patent, of its own motion, to order a resurvey, and correct by that any mistakes in the prior survey.

But in this case it is not necessary to rely alone on the general power vested in the Land Department, for as early as 1842 the attention of the legislature of Michigan was called to the fact that there had been errors in the surveys of public lands within the state, and a resolution was passed by it in these words:

"Whereas, it has been satisfactorily made to appear to this legislature that large districts of lands lying within the limits of the state of Michigan have been returned by some of the deputy United States surveyors to the General Land Office as surveyed, where no surveys whatever have been made, or where the surveys have been so imperfectly done as to be utterly valueless; and whereas, the United States surveyor general of this land district has caused the lands so represented as surveyed to be offered for sale, to the very great injury of the state of Michigan and the citizens thereof; therefore,

"Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Michigan, That the President of the United States be requested to cause the subdivisions of the following townships of land, situate within the state of Michigan, and which have been represented to have been surveyed, but which have either not been surveyed or have been so imperfectly surveyed that said work is valueless, to be surveyed at as early a day as may be consistent, viz.:

"Resolved, That the governor be requested to transmit the foregoing preamble and resolution to the President of the United States." [Mich. Laws 1842, No. 8.]

A letter inclosing a copy of this resolution was forwarded to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and by him *referred [596 to the President, who indorsed it as follows: "Let the matter be referred to the surveyor general, with instructions as indicated, and let the governor of Michigan be informed of the measures to be adopted." Thereupon proceedings for new surveys were taken by the Land Department, of which fact the governor of the state was duly informed. It is true that in the resolutions of the Michigan legislature eighty-one townships were specifically named, and that the land in controversy was not included within those townships, but it appears that on the strength of the information thus furnished the Land Department proceeded to make new surveys of other lands than those specifically mentioned by the legislature, and the attention of Congress having been called to the matter, it, from 1845 to 1856 inclusive made appropriations for correcting surveys in the state of Michigan. 5 Stat. at L. 762; 9 Stat. at L. 95, 365, 530, 611, 612; 10 Stat. at L. 204, 565, 660; 11 Stat. at L. 86. The last three appropriations were made after the sending of the approved list for the Ionia land district to the governor on January 13, 1854.

It may be noticed here, in passing, that in the adjustment of the swamp land grant for the state of Michigan the Land Department did not include in one list all the swamp lands within the state, but made out several lists, apparently one at least for each land district.

Not only was there general knowledge on the part of the authorities of the state, as of those at Washington, of the existence of errors and mistakes in the original surveys of public lands in the state of Michigan, but also was there particular information as to supposed errors in the surveys of the land in controversy. After the passage of the act of 1850 the Commissioner of the General Land Office instructed the surveyor general of the 597] state of Michigan to examine the *field notes of the surveys on file in his office and report therefrom a list of the lands which were swamp or overflowed. From time to time the surveyor general forwarded to the Land Department lists in accordance with these instructions. On March 29, 1852, he forwarded a list containing the land in question, and in the letter accompanying is found this language: "The districts reported by Judge Burt and Hlram Burnham to be fraudulent are embraced in this list and marked 'F'," and in that list the district containing the land in controversy is marked with the letter "F," so that upon the records of the General Land Office was to be found information that the survey of this particular land was reported to be erroneous, and as such was likely to be included in resurveys then pending. The report of the commissioner of the state land office to the legislature of the state, for the year ending November 30, 1856, contains this statement: "Patents are now received for all these lands in the state except those situate in the Ionla land district, comprising about 1,200,000 acres, and for these we are assured the patents will soon be forwarded, the making of which have been delayed in consequence of extensive resurveys by the general government, which, in some instances, changes the amount and character of the land." And again, after speaking of the application for the purchase of particular tracts, he says they have been denied, because "no valid sale could be made until after a compliance with the law requiring advertisement of a public offering to be published in each county of the state; and such public sale or offering has not been deemed advisable until after the title of the state to the grant should be wholly confirmed by the issue of the patents, and the numerous corrections and restatements of the lists necessary to be previously made by the department at Washington." And still again: "It is well known that many tracts, and sometimes almost entire sections, are now considered as among the best of farming lands, or extensively covered with pine and other valuable timber."

Upon the resurveys the land in controversy was shown not to be swamp and overflowed land, and lists conforming to these new surveys were duly approved and certified by the 598] Secretary of the Interior and forwarded to the governor of the state of Michigan; the receipt of such lists was acknowledged and a request made for patents for the lands described therein, and patents were issued and accepted conveying such lands.

These facts indicate very clearly an adjustment of the grant upon the basis of the resurveys. Undoubtedly the beneficiary of such a grant is interested in its adjustment and may properly be heard before the officers of the grantor in determining what lands are embraced within it, and any assent by the grantee to a determination made by the officers of the grantor as to the lands passing within the grant would be binding upon it. In this case the grant was for the benefit of the state of Michigan, but in the act of 1850 making the grant, Congress, as it had a right to do, clearly indicated the officer of the state, to wit, the governor, whose action in the premises should be the action of the grantee. Under these circumstances, it being known that there were errors in the surveys, and the legislature of the state having requested action to be taken to correct these errors, and resurveys having been undertaken and while they were being prosecuted for the purpose of correcting such errors, a list of lands, which by the original surveys appeared to be swamp and overflowed, was made out and forwarded to the governor. Upon the records of the Land Department the original survey of the district containing the land in controversy was at that time challenged as fraudulent. After the list containing this land had been forwarded to the governor and his request for a patent returned to the Land Department, a patent was issued not including this land. Subsequently the resurveys were finished and according to them this land was excluded from the grant. Thereupon a new and corrected list containing the lands, which by the resurveys were shown to be swamp and overflowed, was made out, approved by the Secretary of the Interior, and forwarded to the governor. Upon its receipt the governor requested patents to be issued, and patents were issued conveying the lands specified therein. This clearly shows an acceptance by the officer of the state, charged under the act of Congress with the duty of so doing, of the resurveys as within the authority *of the Land Department, and makes the [599 adjustment of the grant upon the basis of such resurveys final and conclusive. The act of the state in accepting the new and corrected survey as the basis of adjustment is tantamount to a waiver of any claims under the prior and erroneous survey, for it cannot be that a grantee accepting a patent for lands which according to a final and correct survey are shown to be within the terms of the grant can thereafter be heard to say, Notwithstanding I have taken all the lands shown to belong to me by this correct survey, I also claim lands which by a prior and erroneous, if not fraudulent, survey, appeared to pass under the grant. He cannot in that way enlarge the scope of the grant, and after taking lands which are finally determined to pass under the grant say, I also insist upon lands which upon such final survey are shown not to be within the grant, simply because under a prior erroneous survey they appeared to be within its terms.

We come now to consider the effect of the act of March 3, 1857 (11 Stat. at L. 251, chap. 117), which provided:

"That the selection of swamp and overflowed lands granted to the several states by the act of Congress . . . heretofore made and reported to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, so far as the same shall remain vacant and unappropriated, and not interfered with by an actual settlement under any existing law of the United States, be and the same are hereby confirmed, and shall be approved and patented to the said several states, in conformity with the provisions of the act aforesaid, as soon as may be practicable after the passage of this law: Provided, however, That nothing in this act contained shall interfere with the provisions of the act of Congress entitled 'An Act for the Relief of Purchasers and Locators of Swamp and Overflowed Lands,' approved March 2, 1855, which shall be and is hereby continued in force, and extended to all entries and locations of lands claimed as swamp lands made since its passage."

It is contended by the plaintiff that the purpose and effect of this act were to confirm to the state of Michigan the title to all lands marked on the approved and certified list of 600] *January 13, 1854, as swamp and overflowed lands, and to direct the issue of a patent or patents therefor. Whatever question might have existed, were it not for this act, as to whether any of the lands marked on such lists were swamp and overflowed lands, and whatever authority there might otherwise be in the Land Department to make corrections, Congress, which had full power over the matter, by it in terms granted to the state these lands; such action by Congress was a finality; thereafter no inquiry could be made as to the character of the lands; no correction of the list; and the full equitable title passed to the state, beyond the possibility of challenge. It is insisted that Congress must have known of the alleged irregularities in the surveys; known of the approval by the Secretary of the Interior of this list; that it had been forwarded to the governor; that the governor had accepted and requested the issue of patents; and with this knowledge passed this act, intending thereby to remove all question as to the character of the lands, to put an end to the necessity for any further examination, and to make this list the single and absolute evidence of the lands it was granting to the state of Michigan. There would be force in this contention if the act of 1850 contained simply a grant to the state of Michigan, and there were but a single list of swamp lands in that state. It might then well be said that this act was passed with reference solely to the conditions existing in respect to this attempted selection of swamp and overflowed lands in that state, but the act of 1850 was a grant to all the states, and the act of 1857 must, therefore, be construed as applicable to the conditions existing in all of the states. It is contended by the defendants that it applies only to those states in which the state authorities had attempted to make selections of swamp and overflowed lands within their limits, and had communicated such selections to the Land Department, and that its purpose was simply to confirm to the states lists which constituted selections made by them, and with reference to which the Secretary of the Interior had delayed and neglected to act; and they refer to the opinion of this court in Tubbs v. Wilhoit, supra, in which (p. 137 [34: 888]) it is said:

601] *"In consequence of the delays in certifying the lists and the inconveniences which followed, the legislatures of several states, in which such lands existed, undertook to identify the lands and dispose of them, and for that purpose passed various acts for their survey and sale and the issue of patents to purchasers. The conflicts which thus arose between parties claiming under the state and parties claiming directly from the United States led to various acts of Congress for the relief of purchasers and locators of swamp and overflowed lands. Act of March 2, 1855 (10 Stat. at L. 634, chap. 147); Act of March 3, 1857 (11 Stat. at L. 251, chap. 117)."

This argument is entitled to consideration because the word "selection" applies more naturally to the action of the grantee in reporting to the Land Department the lands which it claims, than to the action of the land officers in identifying from the field notes what are and what are not swamp and overflowed lands. The term "selection" is not an apt word to describe the identification of certain lands according to evidence presented of their character. But we need not rest on this. Conceding that the statute applies, not merely to those cases in which affirmative action had been taken by the states, but also to those in which without any such action the only proceedings had been those in the Land Department of the United States, still we think that it cannot be held that this act is to be construed as expressing a purpose to make the list in this case, approved and certified to the state, a finality as to the lands passing under the grant and an absolute transfer of the equitable title.

In order to fully understand the matter attention must be called to the act of 1850. That granted, as has been seen, swamp and overflowed lands, and directed the Secretary of the Interior, as soon as practicable, to make an accurate list and plats of such lands and transmit the same to the governor, and thereafter, at his request, cause a patent to be issued. The manner in which the secretary should discharge this duty, the evidence that should be required by him as to the character of the lands, were not prescribed by the act; the matter was left to his discretion. The secretary sent out *instructions to the sur- 602 veyor general of the state of Michigan to make lists of the unsold swamp lands, as shown by the field notes on file in his office. From these instructions we quote this passage: "The only reliable data in your possession, from which these lists can be made out, are the field notes of the surveys on file in your office, and if the authorities of the state are willing to adopt these as the basis of those lists, you will so regard them; if not, and those authorities furnish you satisfactory evidence that any lands are of the character embraced by the grant, you will so report them." On receipt of a letter containing notice of this from the surveyor general the governor replied that he did not have authority to incur any expense in the matter, and afterwards referred it by message to the legislature, which body by act passed June 28, 1851 (Laws of Michigan 1851, p. 322), adopted the surveys on file in the surveyor general's office as the basis of adjustment. The effect of this legislative action was not to make an erroneous survey conclusive nor to preclude the Land Department from the exercise of its unquestioned jurisdiction to correct surveys, but simply to accept the field notes finally approved as the evidence of the lands passing under the grant, leaving to the Land Department to make any needed corrections in the surveys and field notes. In other states different action was taken by the state authorities, as appears from the opinion of this court in Tubbs v. Wilhoit, supra. Now, the obvious purpose of this act of 1857 was to ratify and confirm the various steps taken by the Secretary of the Interior in the selection of swamp and overflowed lands. It was general in its terms, reaching to all the states and the different modes by which identification of the swamp and overflowed lands had been attempted to be accomplished. It cannot fairly be construed as intending to put an end to all further inquiry in the Land Department, nor to oust that department of jurisdiction to inquire into and correct any frauds or mistakes, but was a general ratification and confirmation of the methods pursued. It cannot be supposed that Congress intended by this act to condone all frauds, to prevent the correction of errors or mistakes, to take every-603] *thing as it then appeared on the records of the Land Department, and, forbidding any further inquiry, declare that lands which by such records, through error or fraud, appeared to be swamp and overflowed, should be granted to the state. It was not an act to enlarge the grant of 1850. It was not an act to oust the Land Department of its ordinary jurisdiction to inquire into and ascertain what were swamp and overflowed lands, but was an act confirming and ratifying the methods thus far pursued. Congress must have been aware of the fact that there were charges of fraud or mistake in reference to the surveys in the state of Michigan. It had appropriated large sums for resurveys. They had partially been made, and mistakes, if not frauds, had been found. It does not appear that such charges existed in reference to the surveys in other states; at any rate, it is not to be presumed that all surveys in all the states were fraudulent or erroneous, and it would require very clear and direct language before the intent could be imputed to Congress to ignore the existence of alleged frauds and errors in the one state and to confirm titles to lands in that state based upon such fraudulent or erroneous surveys, and thereby enlarge, perhaps, very materially, the amount of the grant to such state. The language of the act does not compel any such conclusion as to the intent of Congress.

The decision in Martin v. Marks, 97 U. S. 345 [24: 940], does not conflict with this construction of the act of 1857. It is true this language is found in the opinion: "After the passage of that act the Land Department had no right to set aside the selections." But in that case there was no question of the power of the Land Department to correct errors or mistakes. The plaintiff relied on a list made by the surveyor general of Louisiana of swamp and overflowed lands, which list, containing the land in dispute, had been forwarded to the General Land Office, and there filed. It did not appear that this list had been formally approved by the Secretary of the Interior, as contemplated by the act of 1850. The defendant relied on a patent from the United States, issued long thereafter. It was held that the act of 1857 dispensed with the formal approval by the Secretary of the Interior, and confirmed the list made *and filed with the Com- [604 missioner of the General Land Office. And in view of that fact, and as no question had been made in the Land Department of the correctness of the survey, it was adjudged that the equitable title of the state to the land was perfect. So, in this case, if there had been no challenge of the original surveys, no attempt at a resurvey or to correct errors or mistakes, and there had been simply a lack of the formal approval of the list by the Secretary of the Interior, that case would have compelled an adjudication that the full equitable title had passed to the state of Michigan, and would have invalidated the patent subsequently issued by the United States directly to the parties under whom the defendants claim. But that is far from deciding that all power in the Land Department to inquire into frauds or errors in the surveys was taken away and all frauds upon the government in such surveys condoned. It was merely a decision that as the identification by the surveyor general of the land as swamp land had not been challenged for fraud or mistake, it was binding on the question of title, and the approval by the Secretary of the Interior and the issue of the patent were simply ministerial acts. We see no error in the judgment of the Court of Appeals, and it is therefore affirmed.

Decided December 20, 1897.

APPEAL from a decree of the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit affirming the decree of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Western District of Wisconsin dismissing a suit in equity brought by the Northern Pacific Railroad Company against the Musser Sauntry Land, Logging, & Manufacturing Company, to restrain the issue of patents of certain lands to the defendants and to quiet plaintiff's title thereto. Affirmed.

See same case below, 34 U. S. App. 66.

Statement by Mr. Justice Brewer:

The facts in this case are as follows: On June 3, 1856, Congress made a grant to the state of Wisconsin to aid in the construction of a railroad of every alternate section of land designated by odd numbers, for six sections in width, on each side of the line, with the right to select indemnity within 15 mile limits. 11 Stat. at. L. 20, chap. 43. The line of this road was definitely fixed September 20, 1858. This grant was enlarged by the act of May 5, 1864 (13 Stat. at L. 66, chap. 80), to one of ten alternate sections on each side per mile with indemnity limits extended to 20 miles from the line of the road. The Chicago, St. Paul, Minneapolis, & Omaha Railway Company, one of the defendants herein, became the beneficiary of this grant. The road was afterwards constructed, and the lands in controversy are more than 15 but less than 20 miles from the line of definite location and construction. In March, 1866, the lands within the indemnity limits named in the act of 1864 were by the Secretary of the Interior withdrawn from sale and notice thereof given to the local land officers. This withdrawal remained unrescinded and unaltered until 1889. In 1883 the defendant railway company selected the lands in controversy in lieu of lands lost in its place limits. These selections were approved by the local land officers and transmitted to the Commissioner of the General Land Office for his approval. In the same year the state of Wisconsin issued patents for the lands to that company, which thereafter sold and conveyed them to the grantor of its codefendant, the land, logging, and manufacturing company. On a readjust-

606] ment *of the land grant the railway company's title failed and thereafter the grantee of the railway company purchased them, pursuant to the act of March 3, 1887 (24 Stat. at L. 557, chap. 376).

On the other hand, the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, plaintiff and appellant, on July 2, 1864 (13 Stat. at L. 365, 367, chap. 217), received a grant from Congress. The 3d section of the act making this grant contains this description of the lands granted:

"Every alternate section of public land to the amount of twenty alternate sections per mile, on each side of said railroad line, as said company may adopt, through the territories of the United States, and ten alternate sections of land per mile on each side of said railroad whenever it passes through any state, and whenever on the line thereof, the United States have full title, not reserved, sold, granted, or otherwise appropriated, and free from pre emption or other claims of rights, at the time the line of said road is definitely fixed, and a plat thereof filed in the office of the Commissioner of the General Land Office; and whenever, prior to said time, any of said sections or parts of sections shall have been granted, sold, reserved, occupied by homestead settlers, or pre-empted, or otherwise disposed of, other lands shall be selected by said company in lieu thereof."

On July 30, 1870, plaintiff fixed the general route of its road and filed plats thereof with the Secretary of the Interior. On August 18, 1870, a withdrawal of the lands within 20 miles of this route was ordered in aid of the grant. On July 6, 1882, plaintiff definitely fixed that portion of its line opposite these lands. They are within the limits of the above-mentioned withdrawal, and also within the place limits of plaintiff's grant, as those limits were adjusted and fixed according to the map of definite location. Relying upon the title acquired by this grant, and the proceedings had thereunder, as above described, the plaintiff filed its bill on May 3, 1893, in the circuit court of the United States for the western district of Wisconsin, to restrain the issue of patents to the manufacturing company, and to quiet its own title. A demurrer to this bill was in May, 1894, sustained, and a decree entered *dismissing the bill. On appeal to the [607 court of appeals for the seventh circuit this decree was affirmed (34 U. S. App. 66), and thereupon the plaintiff brought the case to this court for review.

Mr. C. W. Bunn for appellants.
Mr. Thomas Wilson for appellees.

Mr. Justice Brewer delivered the opinion of the court:

But a single question is presented in this case, and that is whether the withdrawal from sale by the Land Department in March, 1866, of lands within the indemnity limits of the grant of 1856 and 1864 exempted such lands from the operation of the grant to the plaintiff. It will be perceived that the grant in aid of the defendant railway company was prior in date to that to the plaintiff, and that before the time of the filing of plaintiff's maps of general route and definite location the lands were withdrawn for the benefit of the defendant. The grant to the plaintiff was only of lands to which the United States had "full title, not reserved, sold, granted, or otherwise appropriated, and free from pre-emption, or other claims or rights, at the time the line of said road is definitely fixed."

The withdrawal by the secretary in aid of the grant to the state of Wisconsin was valid, and operated to withdraw the odd-numbered sections within its limits from disposal by the land officers of the government under the general land laws. The act of the secretary was in effect a reservation. Wolcott v. Des Moines Nav. & R. Co. 72 U. S. 5 Wall. 681, [18: 689]; Wolsey v. Chapman, 101 U. S. 755 [25: 915], and cases cited in the opinion; Hamblin v. Western Land Company, 147 U. S. 531 [37: 267], and cases cited in the opinion. It has also been held that such a withdrawal is effective against claims arising under subsequent railroad land grants. St. Paul & Pacific Railroad Company v. Northern Pacific Railroad Company, 139 U. S. 1, 17, 18 [35: 77, 84]; Wisconsin Central Railroad Company v. Forsythe, 159 U. S. 46, 54 [40: 71, 74]; Spencer v. McDougal, 159 U. S. 62 [40: 76].

608] *While it is true that the intent of Congress in respect to a land grant is to be determined by a consideration of all the provisions of the statute, and that the word "reserved" may not always be held to include lands withdrawn for the purpose of supplying possible deficiencies in some prior land grant, yet, as that is the ordinary scope of the word, if any narrower or different meaning is to be attributed to it in this grant the reasons therefor must be clear. The use of a word which has generally received a certain construction raises a presumption that Congress used it in this grant with that meaning, and it devolves on the one claiming any other construction to show sufficient reasons for ascribing to Congress an intent to use it in such sense. It is said that the phraseology of the various congressional grants is different, and therefore each one must be considered by itself. This, in a general way, may be admitted, but at the same time the frequent use of a certain word in a particular sense is, to say the least, very persuasive that it was used in a like sense in this grant.

But beyond the significance of the word "reserved," alone, there are other words in the act which, taken in connection with it, make it clear that these lands do not fall within the grant. "Otherwise appropriated" is one term of description, and evidently when the withdrawal was made in 1866 it was an appropriation of these lands so far as might be necessary for satisfying that particular grant. It is true it was not a final appropriation or an absolute passage of title to the state or the railway company, for that was contingent upon things thereafter to happen, first, the construction of the road, and, second, the necessity of resorting to those lands for supplying deficiencies in the lands in place; still it was an appropriation for the purpose of supplying any such deficiencies. Again, in the description, are the words, "free from preemption or other claims or rights." Certainly, after this withdrawal, the Wisconsin Company had the right, if its necessities required by reason of a failure of lands in place, to come into the indemnity limits and select these lands. Can it be said that they were free from such right when the very purpose of the withdrawal 609]*was to make possible the exercise of the right? But the language is not simply "free from rights," but "free from claims," and surely the defendant railway company had an existing claim. No one can read this entire description without being impressed with the fact that Congress meant that only such lands should pass to the Northern Pacific as were public lands in the fullest sense of the term, and free from all reservations and appropriations and all rights or claims in behalf of any individual or corporation at the time of the definite location of its road. Northern Pacific Railroad Company v. Sanders, 166 U. S. 620 [41: 1139]. And such is the general rule in respect to railroad land grants.

Leavenworth, L. & G. Railroad Company v. United States, 92 U. S. 733 [23: 634], furnishes an apt illustration. In that case the granting act contained this provision: "That any and all lands heretofore reserved to the United States, by any act of Congress, or in any other manner by competent authority, for the purpose of aiding in any object of internal improvement, or for any other purpose whatsoever, be, and the same are hereby, reserved to the United States from the operation of this act." And it was contended that an Indian reservation was not excepted from the grant because the lands were not reserved to the United States. Upon this the court said (pp. 741–746 [23:637–639]): "Congress cannot be supposed to have thereby intended to include land previously appropriated to another purpose, unless there be an express declaration to that effect. A special exception of it was not necessary, because the policy which dictated them confined them to land which Congress could rightfully bestow, without disturbing existing relations and producing vexatious conflicts. . . . Every tract set apart for special uses is reserved to the government, to enable it to enforce them. There is no difference, in this respect, whether it be appropriated for Indian or for other purposes." See also Newhall v. Sanger, 92 U. S. 761 [23:769], in which it was provided that the grant "shall not defeat or impair any preemption, homestead, swamp land, or other lawful claim, nor include any government reservation or mineral lands, or the improvements of any bona fide settler;" and it was held that the lands within the boundary of an alleged Mexican or Spanish *grant which was [610 sub judice at the time the Secretary of the Interior ordered a withdrawal of lands were not within the grant to the company. In United States v. Southern Pacific Railroad Company, 146 U. S. 570, 606 [36:1091, 1101], it was said: "Indeed, the intent of Congress in all railroad land grants, as has been understood and declared by this court again and again, is that such grant shall operate at a fixed time, and shall take only such lands as at that time are public lands.

There is no force in the contention that this construction might operate to defeat the entire grant to the plaintiff. At the time of the passage of the act of 1864 only in the vicinity of the proposed eastern and western termini were there any settlements. The great bulk of the territory through which the road was to pass was almost entirely unoccupied. Congress, fixing the time for commencing and for finishing the work within two and twelve years, respectively (§ 8), contemplated promptness in the construction of the road, intending thereby to open this large unoccupied territory to settlement. In view of the road's traversing a comparative wilderness it made a grant of enormous extent. Within the unoccupied territory thus to be traversed there were few settlers and few, if any, land grants. It knew, therefore, that if the company proceeded promptly, as required, it would find within its place limits nearly the full amount of its grant. It must be presumed that Congress acted and would act in good faith, and, of course, there could be no intent to deplete this grant to plaintiff by subsequent legislation in respect to land grants. On the other hand, it must be noticed that the grant to the state of Wisconsin to aid in the construction of the road of the defendant railway company was prior to that to the plaintiff, and also that prior thereto the defendant had filed its map of definite location. In passing the act of July 2, 1894, it is therefore reasonable to suppose that Congress had in mind its earlier grant, and did not intend that it should be diminished in any manner thereby, but meant that the defendant railway company should receive either within its place or indemnity limits the full amount of its lands. This, doubtless, was one of the considerations which made the grant to the Northern Pacific of so large an extent.

611] *It may be well in concluding this opinion to again note the fact, already mentioned, that the withdrawal here considered was one in favor of an earlier grant. It may be that a different rule would obtain in case it was in favor of a later grant. As to place lands, it is settled that, in case of conflict, the title depends on the dates of the grants, and not on the times of the filing of the maps of definite location. In other words, the earlier grant has the higher right. No scramble as to the matter of location avails either road, and it may be that the same thought would operate to uphold the title to the place lands of an earlier as against a withdrawal in favor of a later grant. Neither is it intended to question the rule that the title to indemnity lands dates from selection and not from the grant. All that we here hold is, that when a withdrawal of lands within indemnity limits is made in aid of an earlier land grant and made prior to the filing of the map of definite location by a company having a later grant,—the latter having such words of exception and limitation as are found in the grant to the plaintiff—it operates to except the withdrawn lands from the scope of such later grant.

We see no error in the record, and the decree of the Court of Appeals is affirmed.

JOHN M. WILSON and Others, the Commission to Select the Land for Rock Creek Park, Appts.,

v.

AVARILLA LAMBERT and Others.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 611-618.)

Injunction against assessment—public park—special benefits—Rock Creek Park act—injunction against another court.

1. An injunction against a special assessment under an unconstitutional statute may be granted to a property owner, as the remedy at law is not plain and adequate.
2. Special assessments on property in the District of Columbia for a public park in that District, for the benefit and enjoyment of the people of the United States, are not unconstitutional as a deprivation of property without due process of law, or because the expense should be defrayed out of the funds of the entire nation.
3. There is no solid ground of distinction between a public park and highways or other works of public improvement, as proper subjects for the application of the rule of assessment for special benefits.
4. The Rock Creek Park act, authorizing the establishment of a public park in the District of Columbia, is not invalid for want of conformity to constitutional principles.
5. An injunction against proceedings under a constitutional statute in another court competent to construe the statute and decide every question that may arise will not be granted.

Argued December 13, 14, 1897. Decided January 3, 1898.

APPEAL from a decree of the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia affirming the decree of the Supreme Court of that District in favor of Avarilla Lambert et al., plaintiffs, against William P. Craighill et al., the commission under the Rock Creek Park act, restraining the said commission from assessing lands of the plaintiffs for the cost and expenses of locating and improving the Rock Creek Park. Reversed, and cause remanded with directions to reverse the decree of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia and to remand the cause to that court with directions to dismiss the complaint.

See same case below, 8 App. D. C. 185.

Statement by Mr. Justice Shiras:

In January, 1895, Mary Van Riswick, widow, and Avarilla Lambert, and Martina Carr, children and heirs of John Van Riswick, deceased, filed a bill of complaint in the supreme court of the District of Columbia against the commission under the Rock Creek Park act of September 27, 1890 (26 Stat. at L. 492, chap. 1001), seeking to restrain the said commission from assessing lands of the complainants for any portion of the cost and expenses of locating and improving the Rock Creek Park, for the alleged reason that the 6th section of the said act, under which the commission was acting in proposing to make such assessment, was unconstitutional and void.

The cause was so proceeded in that, on September 30, 1895, the supreme court of the District rendered a final decree as prayed for in the bill. From that decree an appeal was taken to the court of appeals of the District of Columbia, and by that court, on March 17, 1896, the decree of the supreme court of the District was affirmed. The cause was then brought to this court on appeal.

Mr. John K. Richards, Solicitor General, for appellants.

†The record title of this case is Craighill et al., v. Lambert et al.

NOTE.—As to injunction to restrain collection of illegal taxes; general doctrine against; foundation of jurisdiction; practical operation of principles: (a) recognized heads; (b) mere illegality; irregularity, etc.;

Messrs. Tallmadge A. Lambert and John B. Henderson for appellees.

Mr. Justice Shiras delivered the opinion of the court:

Courts of equity undoubtedly have jurisdiction to hear the complaints of those who assert that their lands are about to be assessed and subjected to liens by a board or commission acting in pursuance of the provisions of a statute which has been enacted under the forms of law, but which is unconstitutional, and therefore does not avail to confer the powers [613] sought to be exercised. Dows* v. Chicago, 78 U. S. 11 Wall. 108 [20: 65]; Union Pac. Railway v. Cheyenne, 113 U. S. 513 [28: 1098]; Ogden City v. Armstrong, 168 U. S. 224, [ante, 444]; 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. 4th ed. § 922.

Accordingly if, in the present case, the 6th section of the act of September 27, 1890, entitled "An Act Authorizing the Establishment of a Public Park in the District of Columbia," and upon which the defendants rely for their authority to act, is, indeed, unconstitutional and void, for all or any of the reasons urged against it, we think that the complainants are entitled to a remedy by a direct proceeding in a court of equity. For the reasons mentioned in the cases above cited and in numerous others, the remedy at law could not be regarded as plain and adequate.

The validity of the section in question has been heretofore considered and determined by this court in the case of Shoemaker v. United States, 147 U. S. 282 [37: 170]. The objections which in that case were ably but ineffectually urged were, in the main, those of which we now hear. It is true, however, that the question there arose incidentally and by way of argument. Persons whose property was made liable to assessment for special benefits were not ostensible parties to the cause; nor was the question raised by any special assignment. Hence this court, though undoubtedly called upon to consider the validity of the act as a whole, and in all its parts and sections, did not deem it necessary to discuss the validity of the 6th section at any length. In view, however, of the fact that we are now confronted with a specific arraignment of the 6th section, and of the further fact that the courts below, in able opinions, have held that the section is fatally defective in form and substance, we have felt constrained to carefully reconsider the question.

It is obvious, and we understand it to be conceded, that neither the act, nor this particular part of it, can be assailed because the subject-matter is outside of the power of Congress. But, while the general power to legislate exclusively for the District of Columbia is not disputed, nor the competency of Congress, in the exercise of that power, to establish a public park, it is contended that, under the limitation upon that *power contained [614] in the 5th Amendment, protecting the citizen from being deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, Congress, when erecting a work which is expressly declared to be perpetually dedicated to the use and enjoyment of the people of the United States, should defray the cost thereof out of the funds of the entire nation. It is further contended in the brief of the appellees that a tax for raising a fund for such a purpose to be valid ought to be levied and apportioned as a direct tax among the several states, according to their respective numbers. This latter proposition, however, was not approved by the courts below, and we need not discuss it. 8 App. D. C. 185.

The reasoning upon which those courts proceeded seems to have been that, upon general principles of constitutional law, when the works, whose cost is to be defrayed by taxation, are public, the public alone should pay for them, and the present case is compared to one where, upon the erection of a courthouse or postoffice, the private property of individuals adjacent to such structure should be specially taxed for the supposed greater convenience enjoyed of access thereto.

Upon a final analysis this proposition will be found to resolve itself into a denial of the validity of special assessments in any case where the work in question is undertaken by the public authorities, without the express assent or desire of the property holders. The effort made to distinguish between streets and highways as constituting proper subjects of taxation for special benefits, and public parks as matters of such a general nature as not to justify special assessment, does not appear to us to be successful. Legislation of this character, both in respect to its justice and its constitutional validity, has been thoroughly discussed by the judicial tribunals of nearly every state in the Union. We shall briefly notice a few of the leading cases.

By a statute of 1875 a board of park commissioners were authorized to locate and lay out within the city of Boston a public park, to take such lands as the board should deem desirable therefor, and to assess upon any real estate in Boston *which, in the opinion of the [615] board, should receive any benefit or advantage from such locating and laying out, beyond the general advantages to all real estate in the city, "a proportional share of the expense of such location and laying out." The board purchased a large tract of flats, over part of which the tide flowed, the rest being marsh, and proceeded to lay out avenues and to fill them with gravel; and when but a small part of the area was filled, and none of the avenues were completed, passed an order declaring that they had taken, and did thereby take and create, a public park, certain land, being in fact that already purchased, and also passed a further order reciting that, whereas by the previous order a park was located and laid out, they laid an assessment upon certain lands benefited thereby. It was held by the supreme judicial court of Massachusetts, on a petition for a writ of certiorari, by the owners of estates so assessed, to quash the assessment, that the park was laid out within the statute, and that the court could not say, as matter of law, that the estates of the petitioners had not been benefited by what had been done at the time the assessment was made Dwight Foster and Others v. Board of Park Commissioners of the City of Boston, 133 Mass. 321; Holt v. City of Somerville, 127 Mass. 408.

In 1834, in pursuance of authority given by statute, the common council of the city of Albany directed the opening of a public square in that city. It was held by the supreme court of the state of New York that the taking the grounds of individuals in a city, to convert into a public square, is taking property for public use as much so as if such grounds were converted into a street; and the fact of the damages being assessed upon the owners of adjoining property, instead of being levied as a general tax upon the city, is no evidence that the property is not taken for public use. In the opinion it was said by Chief Justice Savage:

"The second reason assigned against the constitutionality of these proceedings is, that the purposes for which the property is thus taken are not public, because the benefit is limited to and the expense assessed upon a few individuals. Private property is taken for public use when it is appropriated to the common [616] *use of the public at large. A stronger instance cannot be given than that of a lot of an individual in a city converted into a street; the former owner has no longer any interest in or control over the property, but it becomes the property of the public at large, and under the control of the public authorities. A public square depends on the same principle; it is for public use, whether it is intended to be traveled upon or not. The mode of compensation for such property is not important; it was formerly out of the public purse; but there is no injustice in requiring those individuals to make the compensation who receive from the improvement an equivalent and more, in the enhanced value of their own adjacent property; and whether the number is large or small does not affect the question." [Owners of Ground v. Albany] 15 Wend. 374.

So, in 1871 it was held by the court of appeals of New York, in the case of the erection of a public park in the city of Brooklyn, that lands taken for such a purpose are taken for a public use, and the right to assess benefits upon adjacent property was assumed as unquestionable. The Brooklyn Park Comrs. v. Armstrong, 45 N. Y. 234 [6 Am. Rep. 70]; Re Central Park Comrs. 63 Barb. 282; [Re New York] 99 N. Y. 569. The validity of laws authorizing the condemnation of lands for the purpose of public parks has been affirmed by the supreme court of Illinois (The People v. Williams, 51 Ill. 63; Cook v. South Park Comrs. 61 Ill. 115; West Chicago Park Comrs. v. Western Union Tel. Co. 103 Ill. 33); and by the supreme court of Pennsylvania (Mercer v. Pittsburgh, Ft. W. & C. R. R. Co. 36 Pa. 99); and by the supreme court of Missouri (County Court of St. Louis County v. Griswold, 58 Mo. 175). Numerous other cases to the same effect will be found collected in 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. 4th ed. § 643.

That the act dedicates and sets apart this park "for the benefit and enjoyment of the people of the United States" does not, as we think, make it so far a work sui generis as to take it out of the range of the principles of the foregoing cases. The residents and property holders of the District of Columbia must be regarded as coming within the class of beneficiaries; *and, so far from being injured [617] by the declaration that the park shall also have a national character, it is apparent that thereby the welfare of the inhabitants of the District will be promoted. Whatever tends to increase the attractiveness of the city of Washington, as a place of permanent or temporary residence, will operate to enhance the value of the private property situated therein or adjacent thereto.

If, then, there be no solid ground of distinction between other works of public improvement and the public park designed by this legislation, as proper subjects for the application of the rule of assessment for special benefits, it will not be necessary for us to enter at large upon the subject apart from that supposed distinction. That has been so recently and so fully discussed by this court in the case of Bauman v. Ross, 167 U. S. 548 [42: 270], that nothing remains to be added. It may be proper to observe that the decision in that case was not announced till after the judgment in the courts below in the present case had been entered.

Having reached the conclusion, then, that the 6th section of the Rock Creek Park act is not invalid for want of conformity to constitutional principles, we think it follows that the decrees of the courts below should be reversed, and the bill of complaint be dismissed.

The other objections, so forcibly dwelt on, are all questions of construction and administration, and should be permitted to arise and be determined in the regular procedure of the court to which Congress has assigned the duty of carrying the provisions of the act into effect. It may turn out that the practical difficulties anticipated may disappear when dealt with by that court, to which power is given to "hear and determine all matters connected with said assessment, and to revise, correct, amend, and conform said assessment, in whole or in part, or order a new assessment." It does not yet appear that these appellees will, when final action shall have been taken, have any substantial grounds of complaint. The difficulties of construing the act are not necessarily in the act itself, but in its application to the subject-matter. Its provisions are somewhat vague and obscure; and it is possible that further legislation *may be found requisite to carry out [618] the intentions of Congress. But such questions are not now before us for determination. Should errors supervene in the administration of the act, parties affected will have redress by appeal.

We adopt the observation made in the dissenting opinion in the court of appeals: "There can be no reason or propriety in appealing to a court of equity to restain proceedings that are being regularly conducted in other courts, competent to construe the statutes under which they act, and to decide every question that may arise in the course of the proceeding. To allow litigations to be thus diverted tends to the multiplication of litigation and the production of unnecessary delay and expense, to say nothing of the unnecessary vexation to parties."

The decree of the Court of Appeals is reversed; and the cause is remanded with directions to said court to reverse the decree of the supreme court of the District of Columbia and to remand the cause to that court with directions to dismiss the bill of complaint.

FRANK ADAMS, Receiver of the Commercial Bank of Denver.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 618-627.)

Jurisdiction by service of process—rule of Federal court need not strictly conform to state practice.

1. A question whether or not jurisdiction has been acquired by a proper service of process is one which involves the jurisdiction of the court, within the meaning of the act of Congress of March 3, 1891, § 5, providing for an appeal from the district court directly to the Supreme Court of the United States when the jurisdiction of the former court is involved.

2. A rule of the district court of the United States for the service of process need not strictly conform to state statutes on the subject, but the court may legitimately exercise a discretion as to the conformity; nor need such rule be altered in strict subserviency to changes in the state statute.

IN ERROR to the District Court of the United States for the District of Colorado to review a judgment of that court in favor of the plaintiff Frank Adams, receiver, etc., against the defendant J. B. Shepard for the amount of a promissory note. Affirmed.

Statement by Mr. Justice Shiras:

This was an action brought in the district court of the United States for the district of Colorado, by Frank Adams, receiver of the Commercial National Bank of Denver, against J. B. Shepard on a promissory note, dated June 7, 1893, wherein said Shepard promised to pay to the said bank, thirty days after date, the sum of $20,000.

A writ of summons, in the form prescribed by the rule of that court, was sued out against the said defendant on the 24th day of August, 1895, whereby he was required to appear and demur or answer to the complaint filed in said action in said court within ten days (exclusive of the day of service), after the summons should be served on him, if such summons should be made within the county of Arapahoe, otherwise within forty days from the day of service.

On August 27, 1895, the deputy marshal made return of said writ as served that day on the defendant at Denver, county of Arapahoe.

Within ten days after the service of said summons, to wit, on the 4th day of September, 1895, the defendant, by his attorneys, specially appeared and moved the court to quash the summons for the following reasons:

"First. Said summons is not such a summons as is provided for by the statutes of Colorado. The said summons is made returnable and requires the defendant to appear and answer in this action in this court within ten days from the day of the service of said summons, instead of thirty days, as provided by the statutes of Colorado.

"Second. The copy of said summons served upon said *defendant is not certified to as a [620 true copy by the clerk of this honorable court."

Thereafter, to wit, on the 4th day of January, 1896, the court after hearing argument of counsel, overruled said motion, and the defendant electing to stand by said motion, rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendant, according to the prayer of the complaint.

A bill of exceptions was signed and a writ of error allowed to the Supreme Court of the United States.

It appears by the bill of exceptions, that, on March 17, 1877 (Code 1877, chap. 3), the general assembly of the state of Colorado passed an act entitled "An Act Providing a System of Procedure in Civil Actions in the Courts of Justice of the State of Colorado," which act contained the following provisions:

"Civil actions in the district courts and county courts shall be commenced by the filing of a complaint with the clerk of the court in which the action is brought and the issuing of a summons therein; provided, that after the filing of the complaint a defendant in the action may enter his appearance therein, personally or by attorney, which appearance shall be equivalent to personal service of the summons upon him."

"The time in which the summons shall require the defendant to answer the complaint shall be as follows: 1st. If the defendant is served within the county in which the action is brought, ten days. 2d. If the defendant is served out of the county, but in the district in which the action is brought, twenty days. 3d. For all other cases, forty days."

The summons in this cause was issued and made returnable under and in pursuance of a general rule of the district court of the United States for the district of Colorado, adopted on October 10, 1877, which is in the following terms:

"Actions at law shall be commenced by filing a complaint with the clerk, upon which a summons shall be issued, directed to the defendant, requiring him to appear and demur or answer to the complaint within ten days from the day of service, if such service shall be made within the county from which the summons was issued, and within forty days from the day of service if such service shall be made 621]elsewhere in the district. *Except as provided in these rules and in the laws of the United States, the summons and the pleadings, and proceedings in the action shall be as prescribed in the laws of the state."

It further appears that the general assembly of the state of Colorado passed an act on April 7, 1887, repealing the above provisions in the act of 1877, and enacting as follows:

"Civil actions shall be commenced by the filing of a complaint with the clerk of the court in which the action is brought, or by the service of a summons.

"The complaint must be filed within ten days after the summons is issued, or the action may be dismissed without notice, and in such case the court may, in its discretion, if it shall be of the opinion that the action was vexatiously commenced, tax a reasonable attorney's fee as costs in favor of defendant, to be recovered of plaintiff or his attorneys."

It also appears that the said general assembly, on April 19, 1889, passed an act, since then and now in force, containing the following provision:

"Section 84 of an act entitled 'An Act to Provide a Code of Procedure in Civil Actions for Courts of Record in the State of Colorado, and to Repeal all Acts Inconsistent Therewith,' approved April 7, 1887, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"The summons shall state the parties to the action, the state, county, and court in which it is brought, and require the defendant to appear and answer the complaint within twenty days after the service of the summons, if served in the county in which the action is brought; or if served out of such county or by publication, within thirty days after the service of the summons, exclusive of the day of service, or that judgment by default will be taken against him according to the prayer of the complaint, and shall briefly state the sum of money or other relief demanded in the action; but the summons shall not be considered void or erroneous on account of an insufficient statement of the relief demanded, unless the same is manifestly misleading. If a copy of the complaint be not served with the summons, or if the service be made out of the state, ten 622]*days additional to the time specified in the summons shall be allowed for appearance and answer, but the form of the summons shall be the same in all cases."

Mr. Justice Shiras delivered the opinion of the court:

This case is brought here, under § 5 of the act of March 3, 1891, as one involving a question of the jurisdiction of the district court of the United States for the district of Colorado; and the first contention we have to meet is that of the defendant in error, that the case is not really within the meaning of that section of said act, but presents only the case of an alleged error in the judgment of the district court, redress for which should have been sought in the circuit court of appeals. It is said that the question of whether or not the district court acquired jurisdiction by a proper service of process is not one which involves the jurisdiction of the court, within the meaning of that term as used in the act; and the case of Smith v. McKay, 161 U. S. 355 [40: 731], is cited as sustaining such a view.

In the case referred to, the respective parties were duly in court and the subject-matter of the controversy was within the jurisdiction of the court; but it was claimed by the defendant that the plaintiff, instead of asserting his right by a bill in equity, should have proceeded by an action at law, which afforded an adequate remedy. The court below was of opinion that the plaintiff was not wrong in seeking his remedy in equity. Thereupon the defendant brought the case here directly, contending that the case involved the question of the jurisdiction of the circuit court, within the meaning of § 5 of the act of March 3, 1891. But it was held here that the court, in deciding that the plaintiff's remedy was in equity and not at law, was in the lawful exercise of its jurisdiction, and that, if the court was wrong *in so deciding, it was an error for [ 623 which the defendant should have sought his remedy in the circuit court of appeals.

The present case differs from Smith v. McKay in the essential feature that the contention is that the court below never acquired jurisdiction at all over the defendant by a valid service of process. In such a case there would be an entire want of jurisdiction, and a judgment rendered without jurisdiction can be reviewed on a writ of error directly sued out to this court.

The case, then, being properly before us, we must next consider whether the court below erred in assuming and exercising jurisdiction in the cause by rendering a final judgment against the defendant.

It is contended that the defendant had not been brought within the jurisdiction of the court by a proper writ of summons, and that the defendant, having duly asserted an objection, the judgment entered is void.

It is not denied that the writ in question was in conformity with the existing rule of the district court of the United States, regulating the service of process, but it is claimed that the rule and proceedings thereunder are invalid because they did not conform to the provisions of the act of the general assembly of Colorado, providing a system of procedure in civil actions in the courts of justice of that state.

The proposition is based on the supposed meaning and effect of the act of Congress of June 1, 1872, as found in § 914 of the Revised Statutes, in the following terms: "The practice, pleadings, and forms and modes of proceeding in civil causes, other than equity and admiralty causes, in the circuit and district courts, shall conform, as near as may be, to the practice, pleadings, and forms and modes of proceeding existing at the time in like causes in the courts of record of the state within which such circuit or district courts are held, any rule of court to the contrary notwithstanding."

This section is construed by the plaintiff in error as constituting a peremptory order or direction to the district and circuit courts to make their rules regulating the terms and service [624] of their writs to strictly conform to the provisions of the state statutes regulating such matters.

Waiving any inquiry whether it is competent for a private party, duly served with process in pursuance of the directions of an existing general rule of a court of the United States, to bring into question the validity of such a rule, we think that upon a reasonable construction of § 914 and of cognate sections, presently to be mentioned, the validity of the summons and judgment in the present case can be sustained. It is obvious that a strict and literal conformity by the United States courts to the state provisions regulating procedure is practically impossible, or, at least, not without overturning and disarranging the settled practice in the Federal courts.

The state Code of Colorado provides that civil actions shall be commenced by the issuing of a summons or the filing of a complaint; that the summons may be issued by the clerk of the court or by the plaintiff's attorney; it may be signed by the plaintiff's attorney; it may be served by a private person not a party to the suit. All writs and process issuing from a Federal court must be under the seal of the court and signed by the clerk, and bear teste of the judge of the court from which they issue. § 911, Rev. Stat. The process and writs must be served by the marshal or by his regularly appointed deputies. §§ 787, 788, Rev. Stat.

The very section (914) relied on by the plaintiff in error takes notice of the impossibility of an entire adoption of state modes of proceeding, by providing that conformity is only required "as near as may be."

Section 915, Revised Statutes, provides that in common-law cases in the circuit and district courts the plaintiff shall be entitled to similar remedies, by attachment or other process, against the property of the defendant, which are provided by the laws of the state in which such court is held; and that such circuit or district courts may, from time to time, by general rules, adopt such state laws as may be in force in the states where they are held in relation to attachments and other process.

Section 916, Revised Statutes, provides that [625] the party recovering a judgment in any common-law cause, in any district or circuit court, shall be entitled to similar remedies upon the same, by execution or otherwise, to reach the property of the judgment debtor, as are now provided by laws of the state in which the court is held, or by any such laws hereafter enacted, which may be adopted by general rules of such circuit or district court; and that such courts may, from time to time by general rules, adopt such state laws as may hereafter be in force in each state in relation to remedies upon judgments, as aforesaid, by execution or otherwise.

Section 918, Revised Statutes, provides that "the several circuit and district courts may, from time to time, and in any manner not inconsistent with any law of the United States or with any rule prescribed by the Supreme Court under the preceding section, make rules and orders directing the returning of writs and processes, the filing of pleadings, the taking of rules, the entering and making up of judgments by default, and other matters in vacation, and otherwise regulate their own practice as may be necessary or convenient for the advancement of justice and the prevention of delays in proceedings."

We think it is sufficiently made to appear, by these citations from the statutes, that while it was the purpose of Congress to bring about a general uniformity in Federal and state proceedings in civil cases, and to confer upon suitors in courts of the United States the advantage of remedies provided by state legislation, yet that it was also the intention to reach such uniformity often largely through the discretion of the Federal courts, exercised in the form of general rules, adopted from time to time, and so regulating their own practice as may be necessary or convenient for the advancement of justice and the prevention of delays in proceedings.

In Nudd v. Burrows, Assignee, 91 U. S. 426, [23: 286], it was sought to interpret the act of June 1, 1872 (§ 914, Revised Statutes), as bringing the Federal judges, when charging a jury in Illinois within the practice act of that state, directing that the court, in charging the jury, shall instruct them only as to the law of the case, and give no instructions unless reduced to writing. But this court held that the statute was not intended to have such an appli- [626] cation, and that the course of the court, in charging juries, was not within the act.

In Indianapolis & St. L. R. R. Co. v. Horst, 93 U. S. 291 [23: 898], a similar view was taken, and it was held that, in respect to submitting interrogatories to the jury and to entertaining motions for a new trial, the circuit court of the United States was not, by reason of the provisions of the act of June 1, 1872, constrained to follow a state law regulating those matters; and it was said: "The conformity is required to be 'as near as may be'—not as near as may be possible, or as near as may be practicable. This indefiniteness may have been suggested by a purpose; it devolved upon the judges to be affected the duty of construing and deciding, and gave them the power to reject, as Congress doubtless expected they would do, any subordinate provision in such state statutes, which, in their judgment, would unwisely encumber the administration of the law, or tend to defeat the ends of justice, in their tribunals."

To the same effect is Re Chateaugay Ore & Iron Co. 128 U. S. 544 [32: 508], where it was held that the practice and rules of the state court do not apply to proceedings taken in a circuit court of the United States for the purpose of reviewing in this court a judgment of such circuit court; and that such rules and practice, embracing the preparation, perfection, settling and signing, of a bill of exceptions, are not within the "practice, pleadings, and forms and modes of proceeding" which are required by § 914 of the Revised Statutes to conform "as near as may be" to those existing at the time in like causes in the courts of record of the state.

In Southern Pacific Company v. Denton, 146 U. S. 202 [36: 942], the subject and the cases were reviewed at some length, and it was held that a statute of a state which makes an appearance in behalf of a defendant, although in terms limited to the purpose of objecting to the jurisdiction of the court, a waiver of immunity from jurisdiction by reason of nonresidence, is not applicable to actions in a circuit court of the United States held within the state, under Revised Statutes, § 914. Luxton v. North River Bridge Co. 147 U. S. 337 [37: 194]; Lincoln v. Power, 151 U. S. 436 [38: 224].

627] *The general rule, under which was issued the summons by which the plaintiff in error was brought into court, was adopted by the district court of the United States for the district of Colorado on October 10, 1877, and it was in substantial conformity with the statute of Colorado then in force. Several changes in the laws of Colorado, regulating forms of procedure and the times given for defendants to appear to writs of summons, have been since enacted, but the district court has not seen fit to alter its rules, from time to time, in subserviency to such changes. We have a right to presume that the discretion of the district court was legitimately exercised in both adopting and maintaining the rule in question; and its judgment is accordingly affirmed.

HIGHLAND AVENUE & BELT RAILROAD COMPANY, Appt.,
v.
COLUMBIAN EQUIPMENT COMPANY.

Order appointing receiver, when not appealable.

An interlocutory order appointing a receiver is not appealable as an order granting an injunction, merely because it contains a direction of a mandatory character to the receiver to take, and to the defendant, its officers, directors, agents, and employees to surrender possession of and deliver, the property in their hands to the receiver.

Submitted November 29, 1897. Decided January 3, 1898.

ON A CERTIFICATE from the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit certifying to this court a question upon which instructions are asked in an action by the Columbian Equipment Company, plaintiff, against the Highland Avenue & Belt Railroad Company as to the appealability of an order granted in such action. Question answered in the negative.

See same case below, 74 Fed. Rep. 920.

Statement by Mr. Justice Brewer:

The facts in this case are as follows: On April 5, 1897, upon a bill duly filed by the Columbian Equipment Company, an interlocutory order was entered in the circuit court of the United States for the northern district of Alabama, appointing Phillip Campbell receiver of the property of the Highland Avenue & Belt Railroad Company. Such order, besides the *mere matter of appointment and a [628 description of the property, contained the following provisions:

"The said receiver is hereby authorized and directed to take immediate possession of all and singular the property above-described, wherever situated or found, and to continue systematically, in the same manner as at present, the business and occupation of carrying passengers and freight and the discharge of all the duties obligatory upon the said company.

"And the said Highland Avenue & Belt Railroad Company and each and every of its officers, directors, agents, and employees are hereby required and commanded forthwith to turn over and deliver to such receiver, or his duly constituted representative, any and all notes, accounts, money, or other property in his or their hands, or under his or their control.

"Said receiver is hereby fully authorized to continue the business and operate the railway of said company and manage all its property at his discretion in such manner as will, in his judgment, produce the most satisfactory results consistent with the discharge of the public duties imposed on said company, and to collect and receive all income therefrom and all debts due said company of every kind, and for such purpose he is hereby invested with full power at his discretion to employ and discharge and fix the compensation of all such officers, counsel, managers, agents, and employees as may be required for the proper discharge of the duties of his trust.

"Said receiver is hereby fully authorized and empowered to institute and prosecute all such suits as may be necessary in his judgment to the proper protection of the property and trusts vested in him, and likewise defend all actions instituted against him as receiver, and also to appear in and conduct the prosecution or defense of any and all suits or proceedings now pending in any court against said company, the prosecution or defense of which will, in the judgment of said receiver, be necessary and proper for the protection of the property and rights placed in his charge, and for the interests of the creditors and stockholders of said company.

"Said receiver is hereby required to give bonds in the sum of $10,000, with personal se-

"And the court reserves the right, by orders hereinafter to be made, to direct and control the payments of all supplies, materials, and other claims, and in all respects to regulate and control the conduct of said receiver."

The railroad company appealed from this order to the circuit court of appeals for the fifth circuit, which court, on June 16, 1897, certified to this court the following question: "The question upon which instructions are desired and respectfully asked is, Was the decree appointing Campbell receiver, above referred to, susceptible of being appealed from on the ground that the said order embraced within its terms an injunction or the necessary equivalent of an injunction?"

Messrs. Alexander T. London and Samuel A. Putman for appellant.

Messrs. John F. Martin and Henry D. Hotchkiss for appellee.

Mr. Justice Brewer delivered the opinion of the court:

Is an interlocutory order appointing a receiver appealable from the circuit court to the circuit court of appeals? And if such an order, standing alone, be not appealable, does it become so by the incorporation into it of a direction to the defendant, its officers, directors, agents, and employees, to turn over and deliver to the receiver the property in their hands? These questions must be determined by a consideration of § 7 of the act of March 3, 1891, creating circuit courts of appeal (26 Stat. at L. 826, chap. 517), as amended February 18, 1895 (28 Stat. at L. 666, chap. 96). That section provides:

"That where, upon a hearing in equity in a district court, or a circuit court, an injunction 630]shall be granted, continued, *refused, or dissolved by an interlocutory order or decree, or an application to dissolve an injunction shall be refused in a case in which an appeal from a final decree may be taken under the provisions of this act to the circuit court of appeals, an appeal may be taken from such interlocutory order or decree granting, continuing, refusing, dissolving, or refusing to dissolve an injunction to the circuit court of appeals: Provided, That the appeal must be taken within thirty days from the entry of such order or decree, and it shall take precedence in the appellate court; and the proceedings in other respects in the court below shall not be stayed unless otherwise ordered by that court during the pendency of such appeal: And provided further, That the court below may in its discretion require, as a condition of the appeal, an additional injunction bond."

Under this section it has been decided that when an appeal is taken from an interlocutory order or decree granting or dissolving an injunction the whole of such interlocutory order or decree is before the court of appeals for review, and not simply that part which grants or dissolves the injunction, and that on the hearing in the court of appeals that court may consider and decide the case upon its merits. Smith v. Vulcan Iron Works, 165 U. S. 518 [41: 810]; Re The Tampa Suburban Railroad Company, 168 U. S. 583 [ante, 589]. But each of those cases proceeded upon the fact that there was a distinct order granting, continuing, or dissolving an injunction. In the case at bar there is no such order. It is true, following the order of appointment, there is a direction to the defendant, it officers, directors, and agents, to turn over to Campbell the property of which he is appointed receiver, but that is only incidental and ancillary to the receivership. This is obvious, for if the court subsequently entered an order, in terms setting aside only the appointment of the receiver, all the other parts of the original order would immediately and without specific mention disappear and cease to have any force. Indeed, the mere appointment of a receiver carries with it the duty on his part of taking possession, and the further duty of those in possession of yielding such possession. So that while as a part of an *order appointing a receiver [631] there is something in the nature of a mandatory injunction, that is, a command to the receiver to take and to the defendant to surrender possession, yet such command is not technically and strictly an order of injunction.

The last proviso in the section emphasizes this distinction: "The court below may in its discretion require, as a condition of the appeal, an additional injunction bond." The bond is described. It is not a bond to secure against injuries which may result if a receiver is wrongfully appointed or discharged, but is technically an injunction bond; that is, a bond to answer for damages in case of a wrongful order either granting, continuing, or vacating an injunction. Receivership implies possession, and if no bond can be required to guard against loss from taking or surrendering possession it is difficult to perceive the significance of an additional injunction bond in a receivership case. The question is not, whether, included in an order appointing a receiver, there may not be, either express or implied, some directions of a mandatory character, something in the nature of an injunction, but whether Congress in this legislation provided for appeals in cases other than those in which an injunction, technically speaking, is either the sole or a principal part of the order or decree. Orders granting injunctions and orders appointing receivers are, in the common understanding of the profession, entirely independent. The distinction between the two is clearly recognized in the text-books and in the reports. We have separate treatises on injunctions and on receivers. The separation between them is one which runs through the law, and while it is true that the mandatory features, which, either expressly or by implication, attend orders appointing receivers, are sometimes made the matter of discussion in treatises on receivers, or the subject of comment in decisions concerning receivers, yet the distinction is never forgotten. Familiar as it must be assumed to have been with this generally recognized distinction, Congress, if it had intended that appeals should be allowed from orders appointing receivers as from orders in respect to injunctions, would doubtless have expressly named such orders. Its omission [632] of the one and the mention *of the other is a clear declaration that only one should be the subject of appeal and the other not. And it would savor of judicial legislation to hold that, although Congress has not authorized appeals from orders appointing receivers, the mere fact that in such an order there is a direction of a mandatory character, either express or implied, in respect to taking possession, makes it appealable, as an order granting an injunction.

For these reasons we are of opinion that the question should be answered in the negative, and it will be so certified to the court of appeals.

Stealing by a postal employee—immaterial averment.

1. The stealing by a postal employee of the contents of a test or decoy letter in the lawful possession of the postoffice department is a violation of the latter part of U. S. Rev. Stat. § 5467, whether or not the letter was intended to be conveyed by mail or delivered by a letter carrier.
2. An immaterial averment that the letter was intended to be delivered by a letter carrier, in an indictment which contains in addition all necessary allegations to charge an offense under the latter part of U. S. Rev. Stat. § 5467, need not be proved in order to sustain a conviction.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York to review a judgment convicting William R. Hall of the offense of embezzling and stealing a letter and its contents from the postoffice department. Affirmed.

See same case below, 76 Fed. Rep. 566.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Arthur C. Butts for plaintiff in error.

Mr. James E. Boyd, Assistant Attorney General, for defendant in error.

Mr. Justice Peckham delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant was indicted in the circuit court of the United States for the southern district of New York in October, 1896, for embezzling and stealing a certain letter and its contents, described in the indictment, containing money. The indictment was under § 5467, Revised Statutes, which is set out in the margin.† The defendant was employed in a department of the postal service as a clerk at *station F, a branch postoffice of the [634 United States in the city of New York.

The indictment contained three counts. The first and second counts charged that the defendant wilfully embezzled, etc., the letter, which was intended to be delivered by a letter carrier. These counts were drawn with reference to the first clause in the statute above referred to. The third count is under the second clause of the statute, and alleged that the defendant, "being then and there employed in a department of the postal service of the United States, to wit, as clerk at station F, a branch postoffice of the United States, in the said city of New York, did unlawfully, wilfully, and feloniously steal, take, and carry away a certain United States treasury note of the denomination and value of $1, and three silver certificates of the United States, each of the denomination and value of $1, the said treasury note and the said silver certificates then and there being the money and property of one Joseph E. Jacobs, and the same treasury note and the same silver certificates were then and there feloniously stolen and taken, as aforesaid, by the said William R. Hall from and out of a certain letter which then and there had come into his possession in his capacity as such clerk, as aforesaid, and by virtue of his said office and employment, and the said letter was directed in the tenor following—that is to say: 'Mrs. Susan Metcalf, No. 346 E. 24th St., New York City, N. Y.,' and the same was then intended to be delivered by a letter carrier, and had not then been delivered to the party to whom the same was directed," against, etc.

† Sec. 5467. Any person employed in any department of the postal service who shall secrete, embezzle, or destroy any letter, packet, bag, or mail of letters intrusted to him or which shall come into his possession, and which was intended to be conveyed by mail, or carried or delivered by any mail carrier, mail messenger, route agent, letter carrier, or other person employed in any department of the postal service, or forwarded through or delivered from any postoffice or branch postoffice established by authority of the Postmaster General, and which shall contain any note, bond, draft, check, warrant, revenue stamp, postage stamp, stamped envelope, postal card, money order, certificate of stock, or other pecuniary obligation or security of the government, or of any officer or fiscal agent thereof, of any description whatever; any bank note, bank post bill, bill of exchange, or note of assignment of stock in the funds; any letter of attorney for receiving annuities or dividends, selling stock in the funds, or collecting the interest thereof; any letter of credit, note, bond, warrant, draft, bill, promissory note, covenant, contract, or agreement whatsoever, for or relating to the payment of money, or the delivery of any article of value, or the performance of any act, matter, or thing; any receipt, release, acquittance, or discharge of or from any debt, covenant, or demand, or any part thereof; any copy of the record of any judgment or decree in any court of law or chancery or any execution which may have issued thereon; any copy of any other record, or any other article of value, or writing representing the same; any such person who shall steal or take any of the things aforesaid out of any letter, packet, bag, or mail of letters which shall have come into his possession, either in the regular course of his official duties or in any other manner whatever, and provided the same shall not have been delivered to the party to whom it is directed, shall be punishable by imprisonment at hard labor for not less than one year nor more than five years.

The defendant was arraigned, pleaded not guilty, and was subsequently tried at a term of the United States circuit court for the southern district of New York, and convicted and sentenced to imprisonment at hard labor in the King's county penitentiary for the term of two years.

635] *Upon the trial, after the evidence had been given on the part of the prosecution and the government had rested its case, the counsel for the defendant asked the court to direct the jury to acquit the defendant upon several grounds: (1) That the evidence failed to prove the crime charged in the indictment; (2) that a material allegation to be proved by the government was the fact that the letter, described in the indictment and alleged to have been secreted, destroyed, and embezzled and its contents stolen by the defendant, was intended to be delivered by a letter carrier, while the uncontradicted evidence showed that such letter was not intended to be delivered by a letter carrier, and therefore a material allegation in the indictment was not only not proved but was absolutely disproved; (3) that there was a fatal variance between the indictment and the proofs offered to sustain it by the government, and the defendant should therefore be acquitted.

The motion to direct an acquittal was denied by the court and the defendant duly excepted. The defendant sued out a writ of error from this court to review the judgment of conviction, and the validity of the exception to the refusal of the court to direct the jury to acquit is the sole question now before us.

After his conviction the defendant moved in arrest of judgment and for a new trial. The judgment was arrested on the first two counts, and the motion for a new trial was denied. We take a statement of the facts proved upon the trial, from the opinion delivered by the learned judge in denying that motion, as we think the statement contains all that is material for the consideration of the case, and that it is a correct summary of the evidence in the particulars mentioned. It is as follows:

"The evidence showed that the government detectives prepared a special delivery letter designed as a test or decoy letter, containing marked bills, and delivered it bearing a special delivery stamp to the night clerk in charge of branch station F of the postoffice in this city. The defendant was not a letter carrier, but a clerk employed at that office, whose duty it was to take charge of special delivery letters, enter them 636] *in a book kept for that purpose, and then place them in course of transmission. The letter in question was addressed to Mrs. Susan Metcalf, a fictitious person, 346 E. 24th street, New York city, a fictitious number. The letter was placed by the night clerk with other letters upon the table where such letters were usually placed, and the defendant entering the office not long after, took this letter, along with the others on the same table, removed them to his desk, and properly entered the other letters, but did not enter this letter. On leaving the office not long after, the omission to enter the letter having been observed, he was arrested, and the money contents of the letter, marked and identified by the officers, were found upon his person. The officers testified upon cross-examination that the address was a fictitious one; that the letter was designed as a test letter, and that they 'did not intend that the letter should be delivered to Mrs. Susan Metcalf, or to that address,' and that 'it could not be delivered to that person at that address.'"

The question now before us is whether the evidence is sufficient to sustain this conviction under the third count of the indictment. We think it is. Section 5467, Revised Statutes, describes two distinct offenses; the first clause of the section is directed against any person employed in any department of the postal service who secretes, embezzles, etc., any letter intrusted to him or which shall come into his possession, and which was intended to be conveyed by mail or carried or delivered by any mail carrier, mail messenger, route agent, letter carrier, or other person employed in any department of the postal service, or forwarded through or delivered from any postoffice or branch postoffice established by the authority of the Postmaster General, and which shall contain any note, etc. This is one of the offenses set forth in that section. The other offense set forth in the same section does not in terms provide that the letter must have been intended to have been conveyed by mail or carried or delivered by any mail carrier, letter carrier, etc., but it provides that "any such person" (meaning thereby any person employed in any department of the postal service as described in the first part of the section) "who *shall steal or take any of the things afore [637 said out of any letter, packet, bag, or mail of letters which shall have come into his possession, either in the regular course of his official duties or in any other manner whatever, and provided the same shall not have been delivered to the party to whom it is directed, shall be punishable by imprisonment at hard labor for not less than one year nor more than five years."

A test or "decoy" letter comes within the statute. Goode v. United States, 159 U. S. 663 [40: 297]; Montgomery v. United States, 162 U. S. 410 [40: 1020].

Although the section provides the same punishment for all the various acts set forth therein, yet the section itself clearly describes two different classes of offenses. United States v. Wight, 38 Fed. Rep. 106. The proof would not show a violation of the first part of the section unless it appeared that the letter intrusted to the person employed in the postal service, or which came into his possession, was one which was intended to be conveyed by mail or carried or delivered by a mail carrier, mail messenger, route agent, letter carrier, or other person employed in any department of the postal service, or that it was forwarded through or delivered as stated in the section. Whether the proof here does not show that the letter in question was such a letter, it is not now necessary to say, because the judgment was arrested upon the first two counts covering that clause of the section. Although a motion in arrest of judgment cannot properly be made upon the ground that the evidence is insufficient to prove the case under the indictment, or under any particular count thereof, because such motion is confined to matters appearing upon the face of the record itself (1 Archb. Crim. Pl. & Pr. 7th Am. ed. 671, and notes), yet, as the motion was entertained and judgment was actually arrested upon the first two counts, those counts are not now in question.

The other clause of the section provides for a distinct offense, and under that it is not necessary to aver that the letter was intended to be conveyed by mail or delivered by a letter carrier, etc., as provided in the first clause, and it covers the case of any person employed in [638] any department of the postal service* who steals or takes any of the things, already described in the section, out of any letter, etc., which shall have come into his possession either in the regular course of his official duties or in any other manner whatever, provided the same shall not have been delivered to the party to whom it is directed. We think this is entirely plain. United States v. Wight, 38 Fed. Rep. 106.

We think the indictment must show under this clause—and this third count does show—that the letter, the contents of which were stolen by the person employed in the postal service, was one which had come in some way or manner under the jurisdiction and into the possession of the postoffice department; for the statute does not refer to letters in regard to which that department has not and was not intended to have any concern or any duty to perform, such as letters which have not been deposited or left in any manner in any postoffice or street letter box, or given to a carrier or other agent of the department, and which remain entirely outside of that department, and where the stealing of such letters or their contents at that time is not of Federal cognizance. The evidence shows that this letter was within the possession and jurisdiction of the department, in the branch postoffice in New York, and that while undelivered to the party to whom it was addressed, its contents were stolen by defendant, who was a person in the postal service. Such stealing comes within the statute. That it was a test or decoy letter is immaterial, as already shown. If the letter be within the lawful possession of the postoffice department, the stealing of the contents of such letter by a postal employee is a violation of the latter part of the section of the statute. This letter was thus within the jurisdiction and possession of the department, and the defendant then stole its contents.

It is urged, however, that the conviction cannot be sustained under this third count because it contains, in addition to the particular allegations necessary to bring the act within the latter part of the section, an allegation that the letter, the contents of which were stolen, was intended to be delivered by a letter carrier. This fact forms no part of the offense mentioned* in the second clause of the section [639] in question, and it was therefore unnecessary to allege it. As the third count does contain such an averment, the counsel for the defendant argues that it became necessary to prove the fact thus averred, and, as it was (he argues) unproved, the defendant should have been acquitted by direction of the court. The result of such a holding would be to say that where an indictment contained all the necessary averments to constitute an offense created by the statute, if an averment wholly unnecessary and entirely immaterial be added, the prosecution must fail unless it prove such unnecessary averment, although proving every fact constituting the offense provided by the statute. We are of opinion that it was not incumbent upon the prosecution to prove this averment in order to sustain a conviction under this count.

Without this averment the third count contains every fact necessary to be proved in order to constitute an offense under the second clause of the statute, and the evidence in the case is sufficient to authorize the defendant's conviction upon that count. The character of the offense, as provided by statute, is not changed by this unnecessary averment, nor is the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain a conviction under the third count at all impaired if it be assumed that it did not show that the letter was intended to be delivered by a letter carrier. This is unlike a case where an unnecessary amount of description of an article to be identified by the description is contained in the indictment. Under those circumstances, it has been sometimes held that the description must be proved as laid, because it went to the identification of the article described. Nor is it like the case of an indictment for perjury or one for a libel where the sworn statement alleged to be false or the article alleged to be libelous must be proved substantially as averred in the indictment. In such cases the matter set forth constitutes the offense and must be proved accordingly. But here every necessary fact is averred and proof sufficient to sustain a conviction has been given in regard to each fact. Because the pleader unnecessarily made an averment of a totally immaterial fact, the government was not therefore* bound [640] to prove it in order to sustain a conviction. For this reason there was no fatal variance between the offense set forth in the indictment and the proof. Montgomery v. United States, and Goode v. United States, supra.

The judgment of conviction must be affirmed.

v.

STATE OF CALIFORNIA and Charles Aull, Warden of the State Prison of the State of California.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 640 642).

Error in murder trial—jurisdiction of state court.

1. Error in submitting to the jury only the question of murder in the first degree, while the evidence is sufficient at the most to convict of murder in the second degree, does not constitute such a jurisdictional defect in a conviction for murder in the first degree as to sustain the issuing a writ of habeas corpus by the United States circuit court.

2. Jurisdiction of a state court of a prosecution for the murder of an engineer, committed by derailing a railroad train, is not precluded by the fact that the train was exclusively engaged in transporting the mail of the United States, and that the derailment was an obstruction of the mail and a restraint of interstate commerce.

Submitted December 14, 1897. Decided January 3, 1898.

APPEAL from an order of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of California denying an application for a writ of habeas corpus in a criminal case in which Salter D. Worden was convicted of the crime of murder in the first degree in the Superior Court of the County of Yolo, in the State of California. Order affirmed.

See same case below, People v. Worden, 113 Cal. 569.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

No brief filed by counsel for appellants.

Messrs. W. F. Fitzgerald, Attorney General of California, and W. H. Anderson, Assistant Attorney General of California, for appellees.

Mr. Chief Justice Fuller delivered the opinion of the court:

Worden was convicted in the superior court of the county of Yolo, California, of the crime of murder in the first degree, and sentenced to be hanged. The supreme court of Califor-641] nia *affirmed the judgment. People v. Worden, 113 Cal. 569.

Being in custody, awaiting execution, an application for the writ of habeas corpus was made on behalf of Worden to the circuit court of the United States for the northern district of California, the application denied, and the petition dismissed. The case was then brought to this court.

Two grounds were relied on as justifying the issue of the writ:

First. That there was no evidence that Worden was guilty of murder in the first degree; that the evidence showed, or tended to show, that he was guilty, at most, of murder in the second degree; and that the trial court only submitted to the jury the question as to whether or not he was guilty of murder in the first degree. This was matter of error, and with its disposition by the highest tribunal of the state, it was not within the province of the circuit court to interfere. Nor can the writ of habeas corpus be made use of as a writ of error.

Second. That the state courts had no jurisdiction because Worden was convicted of the murder of one Clark, committed by derailing a train of which Clark was the engineer; that this was a special train "exclusively engaged in the carrying or transportation of the mail of the United States;" that the effect of the derailment "constituted an obstruction or stopping of the transmission of the United States mail, and was a restraint and retarding of the interstate commerce of the United States;" that he therefore was guilty, if at all, of offenses against the laws of the United States (§§ 5440, 3995, Revised Statutes; act July 2, 1890, 26 Stat. at L. 209, chap 647); and that any offense committed by him was solely cognizable in the courts of the United States.

But it is settled law that the same act may constitute an offense against the United States and against a state, subjecting the guilty party to punishment under the laws of each government; and may embrace two or more offenses Cross v. North Carolina, 132 U. S. 131 [33: 287], and cases cited. And see Teal v. Felton, 37 U. S. 12 How. 284, 292 [9: 990, 993].

*There is no statute of the United States [642 under which Worden could, on the alleged facts, have been prosecuted for murder in the courts of the United States. He was convicted of that crime in the administration of the laws of California (Penal Code, Cal., §§ 187, 188, 189; §§ 17, 587); and the conviction has been sustained by the highest court of the state

As indicating that the prosecution was in the ordinary course, the language of that court in the opinion delivered on affirming the judgment may not improperly be quoted. Among other things the court said: "The charge fully informed the jury that an intent to take human life is a necessary element of murder in the first degree. They were told that in order to convict the appellant of murder in the first degree they must be convinced beyond a reasonable doubt that the appellant, either personally or in concert with others, killed the deceased with malice aforethought by some kind of wilful, deliberate, and premeditated killing, and that 'in order to constitute murder in the first degree, the intent to kill must be the result of deliberate premeditation.' This principle was given to the jury in various forms; and it is beyond question that the evidence abundantly warranted the jury in finding the appellant guilty of murder in the first degree—murder of a most

Federal question.

A decision of a state court that an assignment of a portion of a claim against the United States, to secure the cost of material furnished to a government contractor, amounts merely to security, and that it creates equities which are superior to those of other transferees in the fund, after the United States has paid it over and has no further concern in the matter, does not present a Federal question.

See same case below, 147 N. Y. 486.

Statement by Mr. Chief Justice Fuller:

In September, 1889, Witherby and Gaffney entered into a contract with the government of the United States to construct certain buildings at Sackett's Harbor, New York. Thereafter they purchased from York and Starkweather lumber and materials, which were used in the construction of the buildings, and on March 27, 1890, were indebted on account of these materials in the sum of more than $3,000. Being so indebted, Witherby and Gaffney on that date executed and delivered to York and Starkweather an instrument in writing, as follows:

"Whereas we have a contract with the United States government for the construction of buildings and officers' quarters at Madison Barracks, Sackett's Harbor, Jefferson County, New York.

"And whereas we are indebted to York & Starkweather, of Watertown, New York, in the sum of $3,000 and more on account of materials furnished us by them that were used in said buildings and quarters.

"And whereas there will be due and payable to us on account of our work, etc., from the government considerable sums of money before and on the completion of our said work.

"Now, therefore, of the moneys due and to become due us from the said government, we do hereby for value received assign and transfer to said York & Starkweather the sum of $3,000, and do hereby authorize, empower, request, and direct Lieutenant J. E. Macklin, R. Q. M. Eleventh Infantry, U. S. A., through whom payments are made for such construction, to pay to said York & Starkweather on our account for such construction the full sum of $3,000, as follows: First, $500 from the next estimate and payment due or to become due us, and the sum of $2,500 on the completion of said work by us, and when the balance *of our contract with the government [644 becomes due and payable to us."

On the 7th of April, Witherby and Gaffney paid York and Starkweather $500, but no further payment was made by them. On May 15, 1890, Lieutenant Macklin, the disbursing agent of the United States government at Sackett's Harbor, gave a draft on the treasury to the amount of $4,400 to Witherby and Gaffney, which was turned over by them on that day to Conde and Streeter. Before Conde and Streeter received this draft, they had been fully notified of the paper delivered to York and Starkweather, and while the draft was in their hands, York and Starkweather demanded $2,500 thereof from them, which they refused to pay, or any part thereof. Conde and Streeter asserted a prior right to the draft and moneys in question by virtue of an alleged oral agreement with Witherby and Gaffney to secure the payment of certain notes upon which they were liable as indorsers and for individual claims they held against them. Conde was one of the sureties on Witherby and Gaffney's bond to the government, and it seems to be conceded that Witherby and Gaffney obtained the money on Conde and Streeter's accommodation indorsements for the purpose of enabling them to carry on the work under the contract. Conde and Streeter applied the money to pay notes to the amount of $3,200 which they had indorsed, and individual claims to the amount of $600, and about $600 was returned to Witherby and Gaffney.

April 16, 1890, Witherby and Gaffney executed to Conde and Streeter an agreement by which they promised to pay off and discharge from the money to be received by them from the government certain notes indorsed by Conde and Streeter and certain individual indebtedness held by them against Witherby and Gaffney. On April 18th Witherby and Gaffney made a written assignment to Conde and Streeter of sufficient of the money in question to pay the notes and claims mentioned, in these words:

"That there may be no misunderstanding about the intention of the foregoing agreement, we hereby assign for value *received to [645 John C. Streeter and Wm. W. Conde sufficient of the moneys coming to us from Lieut. Macklin, R. Q. M., to pay the claims as specified in the aforegoing agreement."

York and Starkweather brought suit against Conde and Streeter in the supreme court of New York for the county of Jefferson. Two defenses were set up by Conde and Streeter, the second of which was "that the money, claim, and property, claimed by the plaintiffs in this action to have been assigned to them by Witherby & Gaffney at the time of the pretended assignment thereof, constituted and was a claim against the United States government which had not been allowed, or the amount due thereon ascertained, or the warrant issued for the payment thereof, and that the pretended assignment thereof does not recite the warrant for payment issued by the United States, and is not acknowledged by the person making the same before an officer having authority to take acknowledgments of deeds, and is not certified by such officer; and that said pretended assignment is in violation of the laws of the United States and of the state of New York, and that the plaintiffs never derived any interest in the said contract with the United States by virtue of the said pretended assignment or otherwise, and are not the real parties in interest in this action, and ought not therefore to maintain the same: that said Witherby & Gaffney never transferred any interest in the said contract to the said plaintiffs."

The trial resulted in a verdict in favor of York and Starkweather, upon which judgment was entered, which was affirmed by the general term, and that judgment affirmed by the court of appeals. York v. Conde, 147 N. Y. 486. A writ of error was then allowed from this court.

Mr. Elon R. Brown for plaintiffs in error.
Mr. Henry Purcell for defendants in error.

Mr. Chief Justice Fuller delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiffs in error contended in the courts below that they were entitled to the fund in ques-646] tion by virtue of an oral *transfer prior to the assignment to defendants in error, and of the writings executed subsequently thereto; and that defendants in error acquired no right to the fund by their assignment because such assignment was in violation of § 3477 of the Revised Statutes of the United States. But they did not claim that they acquired any right or title to the fund by reason of that section, nor was its validity questioned in any way.

In delivering the opinion of the court of appeals of New York, its able and experienced chief judge said:

"The claim set up by the defendants in their answer, that prior to the assignment to the plaintiffs Witherby & Gaffney had verbally assigned to them the money to become due on the contract, as security for their indorsements, was tried before the jury and found against them and need not be further considered. There can be no doubt that under the general rule of law prevailing in this state the plaintiffs, under the assignment of March 27, 1890, acquired an equitable, if not a legal, title to the money payable on the contract of Witherby & Gaffney with the government to the extent of $3,000, and that the defendants, having acquired possession of the draft for the final payment on the contract, by delivery from Witherby & Gaffney, to secure an antecedent liability, on being notified of the claim of the plaintiffs, held the draft and the fund it represented as trustee of the plaintiffs, to the extent of their claim. Field v. Mayor, etc., of New York, 6 N. Y. 179 [57 Am. Dec. 435]; Devlin v. Mayor, etc., of New York, 63 N. Y. 8. "But the contention is that the plaintiffs took nothing under the assignment to them, because, as is claimed, the transaction was void under § 3477 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, to which reference has been made. That section is as follows: 'All transfers and assignments made of any claim upon the United States, or of any part or share thereof, or interest therein, whether absolute or conditional, and whatever may be the consideration therefor, and all powers of attorney, orders, or other authorities for receiving payment of any such claim, or of any part or share thereof, shall be absolutely null and void, unless they are freely made and executed *in the presence of at least [647 two attesting witnesses, after the allowance of such a claim, the ascertainment of the amount due, and the issuing of a warrant for the payment thereof. Such transfers, assignments, and powers of attorney must recite the warrant for payment, and must be acknowledged by the person making them, before an officer having authority to take acknowledgments of deeds, and shall be certified by the officer; and it must appear by the certificate that the officer, at the time of the acknowledgment, read and fully explained the transfer, assignment, or warrant of attorney to the person acknowledging the same.' This section has been considered in several cases by the Supreme Court of the United States. If that court has construed the section so as to determine the point involved in this case we should deem it our duty to follow its decision. The judgment we shall render will not, we suppose, be subject to review by the Supreme Court. We do not question the validity of the section in question, nor will our decision affect any right of the defendants based thereon. Their right, if any, rests upon the transfer of the draft after it came to the hands of Witherby & Gaffney. They seek to defeat the right of the plaintiffs under their prior assignment of a portion of the fund, and invoke § 3477 to establish that the assignment was void and conferred no right. But on a question of statutory construction of an act of Congress which has been determined by the Supreme Court of the United States, subsequently arising in this court, we should feel bound to adopt and follow the construction of that tribunal on the prineiple of comity, although in a case where the ultimate jurisdiction is vested in this court."

Many decisions of this court in respect of § 3477 were then considered, and the conclusion reached that the section had been so construed as to permit transfers made in the legitimate course of business, in good faith, to secure an honest debt, while they might be disregarded by the government, to be sustained as between the parties so far as to enable the transferees, after the government had paid over the money to its contractors, to enforce 648]them against the latter, or those *taking with notice. The court held, in effect, that such was the transaction in the case at har, and that the transfer to York and Starkweather was simply to secure them for material actually used by the contractors in performing their contract with the government, and amounted to nothing more than the giving of security, and not to the assignment of a claim to be enforced against the government. The United States had, in due course, paid over the money to the contractors, and between them there was no dispute; nor had the United States any concern in the question as to which of the rival claimants was entitled to the fund, the proper distribution of which depended on the equities between them. What the New York courts determined was that the equities of York and Starkweather were superior to those of Conde and Streeter, and judgment went accordingly.

In order to give this court jurisdiction to review the judgment of a state court against a title or right set up or claimed under a statute of, or an authority exercised under, the United States, that title or right must be a title or right of the plaintiff in error, and not of a third person only; and the statute or authority must be directly in issue. In this case the controversy was merely as to which of the claimants had the superior equity in the fund; the statute was only collaterally involved; and plaintiffs in error asserted no right to the money based upon it.

In Aldrich v. Ætna Ins. Company, 75 U. S. 8 Wall. 491 [19: 473], the question was whether the mortgage of a vessel, properly recorded under an act of Congress, gave a better lien than an attachment issued under a state statute, and the decision by the state court was that it did not. The construction of the act of Congress and its force and effect as it respected the mortgage security under which defendants claimed a right or title paramount to that of the attachment creditor was necessarily directly involved, and a proper case for review existed.

In Railroads v. Richmond [Dubuque & S. C. R. Co. v. Richmond] 82 U. S. 15 Wall. 3 [21: 118], in a suit on a contract defendants set up that the contract had been rendered void and of no force and effect by provisions of the Constitution of the United States and of 649] certain acts of Congress, and *the decision of the supreme court of Iowa was adverse to that defense. The case being brought here, a motion to dismiss the writ of error was denied.

In each of these cases the defense was rested upon a title or right of defendants specially claimed under the Constitution or laws of the United States and, being adversely disposed of, jurisdiction obtained.

Here no such contention was put forward. The materials of plaintiffs below had gone into the buildings, while, on the credit of defendants, money had been raised for their construction. Both held written agreements, from the same source, for the money when paid over, but that of defendants below was subsequent in date to the other. Neither asserted any right under § 3477.

In Walworth v. Kneeland, 56 U. S. 15 How. 348 [14: 724], it was ruled, where a case was decided in a state court against a party who was ordered to convey certain land, and he brought the case up to this court on the ground that the contract for the conveyance of the land was contrary to the laws of the United States, that this was not enough to give jurisdiction to this court under the 25th section of the judiciary act. The state court decided against him on the ground that the opposite party was innocent of all design to contravene the laws of the United States. Mr. Chief Justice Taney, however, said: "But if it had been otherwise, and the state court had committed so gross an error as to say that a contract, forbidden by an act of Congress, or against its policy, was not fraudulent and void, and that it might be enforced in a court of justice, it would not follow that this writ of error could be maintained. In order to bring himself within the 25th section of the act of 1789 he must show that he claimed some right, some interest, which the law recognizes and protects, and which was denied to him in the state court. But this act of Congress certainly gives him no right to protection from the consequences of a contract made in violation of law. Such a contract, it is true, would not be enforced against him in a court of justice; not on account of his own rights and merits, but from the want of merits and good conscience in the *party asking the aid of the court. [650 But to support this writ of error, he must claim a right which, if well founded, he would be able to assert in a court of justice, upon its own merits, and by its own strength. No such right is claimed in the answer of the plaintiff in error. . . . Neither can the writ of error be supported on the ground that Walworth was unable to purchase, at $1.25 per acre, another portion of the land mentioned in the contracts, in consequence of its subsequent cession by the United States to the territory of Wisconsin. Whether that cession, and the enhanced price at which it was held, absolved him from the obligation of performing any part of the contract, depended altogether upon its construction. The rights of the parties did not depend on the act of Congress making the cession, but upon the contract into which they had entered. And the construction of that agreement, and the rights and obligations of the parties under it, were questions exclusively for the state court; and over its decree in this respect this court has no control."

In Jersey City and Bergen City Railroad Company v. Morgan, 160 U. S. 288 [40: 430], in an action brought in a state court against a railroad company for ejecting the plaintiff from a car, the defense was that a silver coin offered by him in payment of his fare was so abraded as to be no longer legal tender, and that defense was overruled. And a writ of error having been sued out by the railroad company from this court to review the judgment thereupon rendered against it, we held that the writ could not be maintained. It was there said: "The claim which defendant now states it relied on is that the coin in question was not legal tender under the laws of the United States. This, however, is only a denial of the claim by plaintiff that the coin was such, and as, upon the facts determined by the verdict, the state courts so adjudged, the decision was in favor of and not against the right thus claimed under the laws of the United States, if such a right could be treated as involved on this record, and this court has no jurisdiction to review it. Missouri v. Andriano, 138 U. S. 496 [34: 1012], and cases cited. And, although denying plaintiff's 651]claim, defendant did *not pretend to set up any right it had under any statute of the United States in reference to the effect of the reduction in weight of silver coin by natural abrasion."

Writ of error dismissed.

Questions certified—when not sufficient—distinct proposition of law—Dakota act of 1883—railroad lands, when not taxable—proper classification—payment of percentage of earnings—time of payment—valid act—power of territorial legislature—equitable relief.

1. The question whether the circuit court has jurisdiction to hear and decide the case is not sufficiently specific to be certified to this court, as no single question of law is plainly raised therein, where the record only shows that the case was removed by one defendant from the state court to the circuit court, and neither party raised any question of jurisdiction in the circuit court, and no hint is given as to what, if any, objection exists.
2. The question whether the lands described in the complaint were subject to taxation under the laws of a territory by reason of the facts stated in the complaint respecting the title is not one which can be certified to this court, as it is not a distinct point or proposition of law, where neither the particular condition of the title nor the objection raised is stated.
3. The question whether the appellants are entitled to equitable relief by reason of any of the alleged irregularities or defects in the mode of assessment is not one which can be certified, as it contains no plain statement of a distinct proposition of law, where the alleged irregularities are various, each of which might be a separable question of law.
4. Dakota Laws 1883, chap. 99, exempts from taxation in any other manner than as provided therein lands granted to aid in the construction of the Northern Pacific Railroad by the act of July 2, 1864, which are outside of its right of way and not used in its business as a common carrier.
5. The meaning of said Dakota statute is to render the railroad company and all its property, land grants as well as right of way, free from the payment of all taxes, excepting the amount and in the manner described in the act.
6. Lands granted to aid in the construction of the Northern Pacific Railroad by the act of Congress of July 2, 1864, which are outside of its right of way and are not used in its business as a common carrier, are in a materially different condition from lands absolutely owned by an individual, so as to justify a classification thereof for taxation by a different method and upon different lines than the lands of individuals.
7. A payment of the percentage of the gross earnings of such railroad company for the year 1888 under Dak. act 1883, which by the act of 1889 is made a condition of the acceptance of the terms of that act, operates to discharge all claims for taxes assessed under any law for that year.
8. The question of time in the payment of taxes is one which may be waived by the public authorities, and an objection to delay is, in law and in fact, waived by the receipt and retention of the money.
9. Dak. act 1883, providing for the taxation of railroads by a percentage of gross earnings in lieu of all other taxes, does not violate the organic act creating that territory, which prohibits discrimination in taxation, nor does such act violate the 14th constitutional amendment.
10. Although Dak. act 1883 exempts from taxation in any other manner than as provided by that act, lands granted to aid in the construction of said railroad which are outside of the right of way and not used in its business as a common carrier, yet such act is not void in whole or in part as transgressing the limitations placed upon the power of the territorial legislature.
11. The payment of the percentage of the gross earnings for the year 1888, as alleged in the complaint to have been made, is sufficient to entitle the complainant to the equitable relief sought.

Statement by Mr. Justice Peckham:

This case comes here on a certificate from the United States circuit court of appeals for the eighth circuit, and that court certifies several questions concerning which it desires the instruction of this court for the proper decision of the cause. These questions are founded, among other papers, upon the bill of complaint which forms part of the record herein. It appears that the bill was filed by the complainants' predecessors (who were receivers of the property of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company) on the 22d day of March, 1894, in the district court of the fourth judicial district of North Dakota, sitting for the county of Richland in that state. It was filed, among other things, for the purpose of obtaining a decree adjudging that certain alleged and pretended and attempted assessments, under state authority, were null and void, and that all certificates and deeds executed by virtue of such assessments were void and constituted clouds upon the title to the lands described therein, and which were alleged to be owned by the corporation of which the plaintiffs were receivers. Some of the individual defendants named in the bill were alleged to have purchased at a tax sale under the assessments separate portions of the property of the company situated in Richland county, and to have received certificates or deeds from the county officials purporting to convey to each of them certain portions of such property. Upon a petition of one of the individual defendants named Sumner R. Clark, alleging diverse citi-
653] zenship between the parties *and the existence of a separate controversy between the petitioner and the complainants, a removal of the cause to the United States circuit court for the district of North Dakota was prayed for, and on the 5th of September, 1894, the court granted the petition and made an order for the removal of the cause. Upon a trial of the issues joined in the case, the circuit court of the United States for the district of North Dakota dismissed the complainants' bill, and the complainants thereupon appealed to the United States circuit court of appeals for the eighth circuit.

It appears from the complainants' bill that the Northern Pacific Railroad Company was a corporation created and existing by virtue of an act of Congress, approved July 2, 1864, (13 Stat. at L. 365, chap. 217), entitled "An Act Granting Lands to Aid in the Construction of a Railroad and Telegraph Line from Lake Superior to Puget Sound, on the Pacific Coast, by the Northern Route." The 3d section of that act, for the purpose of aiding in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line to the Pacific coast, granted to the railroad company, its successors and assigns, certain portions of the public lands, as mentioned in the section. Pursuant to the provisions of the act, and prior to the year 1888, the company had definitely fixed the line of its railroad, and prior to that year had constructed and put in operation a continuous line of railroad and telegraph, extending from the waters of Lake Superior westerly and through the territory of North Dakota to the waters of Puget sound; and prior to and during the year 1888 many thousand acres of land in North Dakota were owned by the railroad company, under the land grant above mentioned, although patents for a portion of the same were not issued until June 24, 1893, and, for another portion, not until June 18, 1894. (No question is made by the complainants herein that the lands owned by the company were not taxable in 1888 on account of the fact that the company had not then received patents from the United States therefor.)

On the 31st of May, 1870, Congress adopted a resolution authorizing the company to issue bonds for the construction of its road, and to secure the same by mortgages on its property *of all kinds and description, real, per- [654 sonal, and mixed, including its franchises as a corporation. Under that resolution the company executed, at different times, several mortgages to secure the payment of 100,000,000 or more of bonds issued to aid in the construction of the road, and these mortgages covered all the property of the company, including the lands granted to it by the United States under the act of 1864.

In 1893 the company was insolvent and unable to meet the interest upon its bonds or to pay its other indebtedness, and in that year suits were duly commenced against it by creditors to recover the amount of its indebtedness, and also, by the trustee mortgagee to foreclose the mortgages, in which suit receivers were appointed, and the complainants are their successors.

On March 9, 1883 (Laws 1883, chap. 99, p. 211), the legislature of the territory enacted a statute entitled "An Act to Provide for the Levy and Collection of Taxes upon Railroad Property of Railroad Companies in This Territory," the 1st and 5th sections of which are set forth in the margin.† This act was repealed by chapter 105 of the Laws of 1889.

*Subsequently, and on the 7th day of [655

Act of 1883.

†Sec. 1. Percentage of gross earnings to be paid in lieu of other taxes.—In lieu of any and all other taxes upon any railroads, except railroads operated by horse power, within this territory, or upon the equipment, appurtenances, or appendages thereof, or upon any other property situated in this territory, belonging to the corporation owning or operating such railroads, or upon the capital stock or business transaction of such railroad company, there shall hereafter be paid into the treasury of this territory a percentage of all the gross earnings of the corporation owning or operating such railroad, arising from the operation of such railroad as shall be situated within this territory, as hereinafter stated, that is to say: Every such railroad corporation or person operating a railroad in this territory shall pay to said treasurer each year for the first five years after said railroad shall be or shall have been operated in whole or in part, two (2) per cent of such gross earnings; and for and in each and every year after the expiration of the said five years, three (3) per cent of the said gross earnings; and the payment of such per cent annually as aforesaid shall be and is in full of all taxation and assessments whatever upon the property aforesaid. The said payments shall be made, one half (½) on or before the 15th day of February, and one half (½) on March, 1889, the legislature of the territory passed another act, entitled "An Act for the Levy and Collection of Taxes upon Property of Railroad Companies in This Territory."

Section 7 of the act of 1889 is set forth in the margin.†

656] *The Northern Pacific Railroad Company, within thirty days after the passage of the act of 1889, duly accepted its provisions, and within thirty days from that date paid into the treasury of the territory the entire amount of taxes and interest theretofore claimed by the territory as due and remaining unpaid to it from the company on local and interstate earnings under the act of 1883, excepting that the second half of the sum due from the company to the territory for the taxes of 1888, according to the provisions of the act of 1883, was not paid to and received by the treasurer of the territory until August 15, 1889. The whole tax for 1888, under the act of 1883, amounted to nearly $ 00,000, while for all the years in which the company was in arrear under the act of 1883 (including the year 1888) the amount paid was nearly $200,000.

In the year 1888 the usual proceedings were taken by the officials of Richland county to assess all the property in the county under the 657] general assessment laws of the territory,* and in such assessment the land grant lands of the railroad company were included (regardless of the act of 1883), and thereafter in due course, the taxes thus levied not having been paid by the company, the treasurer of the county on the 4th day of November, 1889, attempted and pretended to sell many parcels of land belonging to the railroad company and being in the county already mentioned, for the purpose of collecting the taxes unpaid thereon, and no redemptions of the lands having been made, the county treasurer executed to the persons who purchased the lands or their assignees, some of whom are defendants in this suit, deeds purporting to convey the lands so sold to such persons, and these deeds are alleged to be invalid, but still a cloud upon the title of the company to the lands described therein.

The bill also sets forth a great many different alleged errors, irregularities, and omissions on the part of the taxing authorities in taking proceedings to levy the taxes, by reason of which, as alleged, the taxation of the property of the company was illegal and the deeds were null and void.

A joint and several demurrer and answer to the bill was served upon the part of the defendants, taking issue upon some of the allegations of fact in the bill and demurring to other parts thereof, but a sufficient statement of the case has already been made to lead to a proper understanding of the questions hereinafter discussed.

Mr. C. W. Bunn for appellants.
Mr. Edgar W. Camp for appellees.

Mr. Justice Peckham delivered the opinion of the court:

The learned circuit court of appeals has certified to this court six questions, concerning or before the 15th day of August, in each year, and, for the purpose of ascertaining the gross earnings aforesaid, an accurate account of such earnings shall be kept by said company; an abstract whereof shall be furnished by said company to the treasurer of this territory on or before the first (1st) day of February in each year; the truth of which abstract shall be verified by the affidavits of the treasurer and secretary of said company, and for the purpose of ascertaining the truth of such affidavits and the correctness of such abstracts, full power is hereby vested in the governor of this territory, or any other person appointed by law, to examine under oath the officers and employees of said company, or other persons, and if any person so examined by the governor or other authorized persons shall knowingly or wilfully swear falsely concerning the matter aforesaid, every such person is declared to have committed perjury. And for the purpose of securing to the territory the payment of the aforesaid per centums, it is hereby declared that the territory shall have a lien upon the railroad of said company and upon all property, estate, and effects of said company whatsoever, personal, real, or mixed. And the lien hereby secured to the territory shall have and take precedence of all demands, decrees, and judgments against said company.

SEC. 5. Lands subject to taxation.—The lands of any railroad company shall become subject to taxation in the same manner as other similar property, as soon as the same are sold, leased, or contracted to be sold or leased; and on or before the 1st day of April of each year each railroad company having lands within this territory shall return to the county clerk of each county full and complete lists, verified by the affidavits of some officer of the company having knowledge of the facts, of all lands of such company situated in such county, sold or contracted to be sold or leased during the year ending the last day of December preceding, and the list furnished on or before the 1st day of April, A. D. 1883, in compliance with the terms of this section, shall include a complete list of all lands sold or leased, or contracted to be sold or leased, prior to the last day of December, A. D. 1882.

†SEC. 7. Any railroad company which at the date of the passage of this act owns or is engaged in operating any line or lines of railroad in this territory may, at any time within thirty days after the passage of this act, by resolution of its board of directors, attested by its secretary, and filed with the secretary of the territory, accept and become subject to the provisions of this act, and provided that any railroad company which is now in arrears in the payment of taxes assessed under chapter 99 of the laws of 1883, shall, within thirty days after the passage of this act, pay into the territorial treasury the full amount of the taxes and interest due under the assessments under said law of 1883 before they can avail themselves of the provisions of this act, by accepting its terms, including taxes on both territorial and interstate earnings. It is further expressly provided that any company failing to strictly comply with the provisions of this act within the term herein provided shall be immediately subject to assessment and taxation in the manner provided for the assessment and the taxation of the property of individuals of this territory, and said taxes shall be collected in the same manner as is now provided in cases of the property of individuals. Any company which has not complied with the provisions of chapter 99 of the Session Laws of 1883 by paying all taxes claimed on gross earnings, both territorial and interstate, or by filing an account of gross earnings, both territorial and interstate, shall prepare and file such account in the manner therein provided within thirty days from the passage hereof, and pay one half of the entire amount due under the agreement and acceptance herein referred to, for the current year, and also the entire amount of taxes heretofore claimed by the territory on local and interstate earnings of such companies, but remaining unpaid at the time of filing said account, and within thirty days after the passage of this act, or the same shall not apply to such company or companies. The balance of said taxes due for the current year shall be paid to the territorial treasurer on or before the 15th day of August, 1889.

which it desires the instruction of this court for a proper decision of the cause. The following are the questions so certified:

658]*"1. Has the United States circuit court for the district of North Dakota jurisdiction to hear and decide said case?

"2. Were or were not the lands described in the bill of complaint subject to taxation under the laws of the territory of Dakota in the year 1888 by reason of the facts stated in the bill of complaint respecting the condition of the title thereof?

"3. Was it the purpose of chapter 99 of the Laws of Dakota for 1883 to exempt from taxation lands granted to aid in the construction of the Northern Pacific Railroad by the act of July 2, 1864, which are outside of its right of way and are not shown to be used in its business as a common carrier?

"4. If such was the purpose of the act was the act void in whole or in part as transgressing the limitations placed upon the power of the territorial legislature?

"5. Conceding that the purpose of chapter 99 of the laws of 1883 was to exempt, among other things, the land grant of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, and that said law is valid, are the payments of the percentage of the gross earnings for the year 1888, alleged in the bill to have been made, sufficient to entitle the complainant to the equitable relief sought?

"6. Conceding the lands in controversy to have been subject to taxation for the year 1888, were the appellants, by reason of any of the alleged irregularities or defects in the mode of assessment, entitled to equitable relief without first offering to pay the taxes properly chargeable against said lands?"

Of these questions, we think we ought to answer only the third, fourth, and fifth. The first, second, and sixth come within our rulings in the cases of Jewell v. Knight, 123 U. S. 426 [31: 190]; Fire Insurance Association v. Wickham, 128 U. S. 426 [32: 503]; Maynard v. Hecht, 151 U. S. 324 [38: 179]; Graver v. Faurot, 162 U. S. 435 [40: 1030]; Cross v. Evans, 167 U. S. 60 [42: 77]; and United States v. Union Pacific Railway Company (decided December 13, 1897,—not yet reported).

In the case last cited, in speaking of the rules which govern the certification provided for in §§ 5 and 6 of the judiciary act of March 3, 1891 (26 Stat. at L. 826, chap. 517), the chief 659] justice repeated *those rules as derived from prior decisions, and said that "each question had to be a distinct point or proposition of law, clearly stated, so that it could be distinctly answered without regard to the other issues of law in the case; to be a question of law only, and not a question of fact, or of mixed law and fact, and hence could not involve or imply a conclusion or judgment upon the weight or effect of testimony or facts adduced in the case; and could not embrace the whole case, even where its decision turned upon matter of law only, and even though it was split up in the form of questions."

Guided by these rules, we find that the first question does not comply with their requirements. No single question of law is plainly raised therein. The record only shows that the case was commenced in a state court, and was removed, upon the petition of one of the individual defendants, into the circuit court of the United States for the district of North Dakota. Neither party (so far as appears from the record) raised any question of jurisdiction in the circuit court to hear and determine the whole case. Whether there is some defect supposed to exist in the petition for removal, or whether the controversy was or was not a separable one, or whether the citizenship of the different parties was not sufficiently alleged or did not sufficiently appear; whether the petition was filed in the proper time, or the bond was sufficient in form, or the approval of the court was or was not sufficient,—all these questions are possible subjects of inquiry in order to answer the general question submitted to us. We should not be asked to grope our way through the papers submitted and examine every objection that imagination could raise, with no hint as to what, if any, objection is really supposed to exist. Some of the above-enumerated possible objections could not in any event be answered in the present state of the record, which does not contain all the facts necessary to be known in their consideration. If the whole case were here upon writ of error or appeal, we should have to look into any question of jurisdiction, whether raised or not, but we are not obliged to do so when questions only are certified to us, unless presented in proper form.

*The second question we regard as [660 equally objectionable. The question certified is not a distinct point or proposition of law clearly stated so that it can be definitely answered without regard to other issues of law or fact in the case. What is the particular condition of the title to the lands which raises the doubt as to their being subject to taxation and induces the certification of the whole question to this court? This is not stated, and we are left to discover any or all possible objections by reading the bill and then conjecturing what the particular objection may really be.

What might otherwise have been considered as an objection, regard being had to the decision of this court in Northern P. Railroad Co. v. Traill County [Northern P. R. Co. v. Rockne], 115 U. S. 600 [29: 477], would seem to have been rendered of no force by the act of Congress of 1886 (24 Stat. at L. 143, chap. 264), providing for taxation of railroad grant lands. The question of law arising from the condition of the title is neither plainly stated nor is the condition itself clearly presented.

The sixth question, for the same reasons, cannot be answered. There is no plain statement of a distinct proposition of law. We are left to read the whole of that part of the bill alleging many different facts said to constitute various and separate irregularities, each of which might be a separate and distinct question of law, but all of which are joined together in an inseparable mass.

Questions of the character of the three thus described are not within the meaning of the act of 1891, and certifying them confers no jurisdiction upon this court to answer them.

We come then to the consideration of the third, fourth, and fifth questions, and we will proceed to answer them.

The wording of the third question may at first sight render its meaning somewhat ob-secure. We are asked whether it was "the purpose of chapter 99 of the Laws of Dakota of 1883 to exempt from taxation lands granted to aid in the construction of the Northern Pacific Railroad by the act of July 2, 1864, which are outside of its right of way, and are not shown to be used in its business as a com-661]mon carrier?" We should *answer No, it was not the intention to exempt from but to change the mode of taxation.

This court, in Northern Pacific Railroad Co. v. Clark, 153 U. S. 252, at page 271 [38: 706, 713], in speaking of the act of 1889, which in this particular (that of substituting an assessment upon gross earnings) is similar in substance to the act of 1883, said that the act did not exempt the property of the railroad company from taxation, but that it merely substituted one method of taxation for another upon the terms and conditions specified.

But we take the true meaning of the question to be whether the act exempts from taxation the lands granted to aid in the construction of the railroad company in any other manner than as provided for in that act. Thus interpreting the meaning of the question, we are of opinion it should be answered in the affirmative.

The language of the act in its 1st section seems to be so plain as to be beyond the necessity of construction. The act says that the payments therein provided for are "in lieu of any and all other taxes upon any railroads, except railroads operated by horse power, within this territory, or upon the equipment, appurtenances, or appendages thereof, or upon any other property situated in this territory belonging to the corporation owning or operating such railroads, or upon the capital stock or business transactions of such railroad company." These payments are also said to be "in full of any and all other taxation and assessments whatever upon the property aforesaid."

In addition to this plain language, the act, for the purpose of securing the payment of the taxes as provided, gives to the territory a lien upon the railroad of the company and upon all its property, estate, and effects whatsoever, personal, real, or mixed. This provision for a lien upon all property of the company, together with the provision of § 5, that "the lands of any railroad company shall become subject to taxation in the same manner as other similar property as soon as the same are sold, leased, or contracted to be sold or leased," is additional proof to conclusively show that the lands 662]while owned *by the company and not leased, etc., shall not be taxed other than as they are taxed by the act and through the payment of the percentages on the gross earnings, as provided for therein. The principle that exemption from taxation must be clearly shown, and that it generally applies (if at all) only to property used in the business of the company claiming the exemption, is acknowledged and assented to. The case of Ford v. Delta & P. Land Company, 164 U. S. 662 [41: 590], is an illustration of the principle, but it does not here apply. The language of this act is clear and absolute. It is also not the case of an exemption from taxation but the substitution of one method for another. The land here in question is, in addition, closely connected with the business of the company. We shall show this more at length hereafter.

The learned counsel for the defendants argues that if the payment of the percentage of the earnings under this act was intended to be in lieu of the land tax, then a part at least of the payment would have been divided among the counties according to the value of the granted lands unsold within such counties, because, as he says, it is a well-known fact that many counties of North Dakota contain large tracts of land owned by this company but do not contain a mile of the line of its road, and under the provisions of this law a county thus situated received no part of the gross-earnings tax. But this argument goes only to the alleged injustice of the appropriation of the tax when paid, and not to its extent or character.

Under the act of 1889 it is admitted that the legislature intended the exemption of lands like these in controversy from any taxation other than the indirect kind arising from the taxation of gross earnings, because under that act a part of the proceeds of the tax was divided among the counties according to the acreage of the unsold granted lands, even where no portion of the railroad was contained in such county. But the language of the exemption above described is substantially the same in both acts. The later act simply makes an appropriation of the proceeds of the tax somewhat different from that of the earlier one. The exemption was the same in each and founded upon the same language. *While [663 the later act, perhaps recogizing the injustice in bestowing no portion of the tax collected upon those counties through which the road did not run, although lands of the company were therein situated, altered the disposition and appropriated a portion to the counties in which some of the lands were situated, yet no difference as to the intention of the legislature to exempt all the lands can be properly based upon this alteration. The exemption of the lands from a tax other than as therein provided for is based upon the same language in each act, and is perfectly plain in both.

It is also seen that by the act of 1879 (Session Laws of Dakota, chap. 46, p. 122) a system of taxation of certain specified property of railroad companies by a tax on their gross earnings was provided for, and the tax thus collected was stated in the act to be "in lieu of all other taxation . . . of the roadbed, right of way, stations or depot grounds, tracks, rolling stock, water stations," etc., "used in or incident to the operation of such railroad."

This act by reason of the tax on the gross earnings limits the freedom from taxation to the road bed, as above stated, and property "used in or incident to the operation of such railroad." The act also provides that "all property of railroads not above enumerated, subject to taxation, shall be treated in all respects, in regard to assessment and equalization, the same as similar property belonging to individuals, whether said lands are derived from the general government or from other sources."

The difference between the language of the act in 1879 and that of 1883 is most marked. Instead of enumerating the particular property which is to be regarded as exempt from other taxation by reason of the tax on gross earnings, and providing for the taxation of the rest of the property of the railroad the same as similar property of the individual, as in the case in the act of 1879, the act of 1883 says the tax is in lieu of any and all other taxes upon any railroad within the territory or upon the equipment or upon any other property situated in the territory.

664] *Does not this different language import, clearly and plainly, a different intention?

We are unable to think of any language of plainer meaning than that used in this statute, and there can be no doubt, as it seems to us, that its meaning is to render the railroad company and all its property, land grants as well as right of way, free from the payment of all taxes, excepting of the amount and in the manner described in the act.

This same question was argued in the supreme court of the state, and decided by it in 1892, in accordance with the views we have above expressed. Northern Pacific Railroad Company v. Barnes, 2 N. D. 310. It was afterwards decided in another way in Northern P. Railroad Company v. McGinnis, 4 N. D. 494, somewhat upon the theory that as it was a Federal question the court would follow the decision to that effect by a Federal court. [Northern P. R. Co. v. Walker] 47 Fed. Rep. 681.

We are not embarrassed by these conflicting decisions, and we have no difficulty in answering the third question in the affirmative.

We come now to the fourth question which involves, among other things, the construction of one of the sections of the organic act creating the territory of Dakota (Laws 1861, 12 Stat. at L. 239, at 241, chap. 86, § 6), the material portion of which relating to the authority of the territorial legislature provides that no law "shall be passed impairing the rights of private property; nor shall any discrimination be made in taxing different kinds of property; but all property subject to taxation shall be in proportion to the value of the property taxed." The same provision in substance is found in § 1925, Revised Statutes, relating to the legislative assemblies of Colorado, Dakota, and Wyoming.

It is argued by counsel that although under this provision of the organic law the territorial legislature could generally select the subjects of taxation, and could classify property for that purpose, and that these different classes of property could be valued or taxed by different methods, that nevertheless the act of 1883, under consideration, is in excess of the lawful exercise of any of the powers granted under the 665] organic act, *notwithstanding that act in the section above alluded to provided that "the legislative power of the territory shall extend to all rightful subjects of legislation consistent with the Constitution of the United States and the provisions of this act." There must be some solid ground for making a distinct classification of property, and such ground does not exist, as is contended, by reason of any of the facts herein mentioned.

Viewing the character, condition, and use of these lands, it is said to be plain that they are simply "property owned by a railroad," and not "railroad property," as described in the title to the act of 1883, and that the two are not equivalent terms; that although railroad property might be taxed in a special method and at a special rate, yet by the term "railroad property" is simply meant property necessary for use in the usual daily conduct of the business of the company as a common carrier by rail, and that any lands outside of that use, although owned by a railroad company, could not be classified and taxed in any different manner from land owned by an individual, otherwise such classification would be purely arbitrary, and the taxation in that way would be illegal; that no earnings arise from these lands which are assessed under the act, because the earnings upon which the tax is assessed are by the terms of the act restricted to "the gross earnings . . . arising from the operating of such railroad," and such earnings are not created by, nor do they arise from, nor are they in any way connected with, these lands, which are therefore not taxed at all under this act, and no justification for their special classification for purposes of taxation can on that account be found.

All these various statements are made in the course of the main and general argument that these lands cannot be taxed under an act like that of 1883, because there is no sound distinction between such lands owned by the company and ordinary lands owned absolutely by an individual.

We do not concur in the accuracy of the description as to the condition of these lands, and we are not, therefore, impressed with the force of the argument based upon it. The lands are *not purely and simply owned or held [666 for sale or other disposition for profit, and in no way connected with the use or operation of the railroad, and in regard to them the company is not a landed proprietor, on the same footing with any other proprietor of lands, and it is not correct to say that these lands do not substantially, though indirectly, contribute towards the gross earnings of the railroad company, as provided in the act of 1883, nor can it be admitted that in merely taxing the gross earnings arising from the operation of the road these lands are not taxed at all. The lands are closely connected with the railroad and with its operation, and they are not in the same condition as a subject for taxation as are the lands of an individual. While we agree that property of the same kind and under the same condition and used for the same purpose cannot be divided into different classes for purposes of taxation and taxed by a different rule simply because it belongs to different owners, yet, where the situation and the possible use and the present condition of the ownership of lands are wholly different, such as they are in this case from ordinary ownership, a classification is not arbitrary nor unreasonable which places such lands outside the class of lands owned in the ordinary way by individuals.

Although the act here provides for the taxation of the gross earnings arising from the operation of the road, the phrase means earnings which arise because of its operation. The road is in operation, and the earnings which it is thereby enabled to make are to be taxed. Property which the company owns.

and which has enabled and continues to enable it to operate its road, is part of the property from which the earnings arise by reason of such operation, and is within the meaning of the act. These lands are of this description. Although they are not taxed directly, yet the same is true of the right of way, the roadbed, the engines, cars, and water tanks, all of which are confessedly "railroad property," without which the road could not be operated. In substance, it must be said that without the existence of all the various pieces of property just enumerated, gross earnings would be quite impossible. It is also true in re-667]gard to these lands. It is *not a question of what might under other circumstances have been their condition with relation to the railroad. We must take the circumstances that actually did exist at the time this act was passed for the purpose of determining this question. And, looking at those facts, we see that unquestionably these lands have indirectly contributed to the gross earnings derived from operating the road, and that such earnings have arisen and been made possible by reason of the lands. They have not only aided in making these gross earnings possible, but they have formed, and do still form, a material factor in the combination of circumstances contributing to the construction of the railroad, to its operation, and to its earnings.

They originally formed a part of the public domain, and were granted by Congress for the purpose of aiding in the construction of this railroad to the Pacific coast, and were given to and accepted by the company, subject to the conditions named in the 8th section of the act. When the lands finally became the property of the company they were impressed with a trust in favor of the government, as representing the public, that they should be used for the purpose for which they were granted, and the company was not even allowed to mortgage or create any lien upon them in any way except by the consent of the Congress of the United States. Act July 2, 1864 (13 Stat. at L. 365, at page 370, § 10).

Subsequently it was found that the road could not be built under the conditions at first imposed, and Congress therefore, in 1870, authorized the company to issue bonds for the construction of its road and to secure the same by mortgage. Under such authority, mortgages were thereafter made to secure bonds for more than $100,000,000, the proceeds of which were used in building the road. These lands have, therefore, actually and directly contributed in a large measure and have formed a most potent factor towards building the road and enabling it to be operated and to earn moneys by reason of such operation. How can it be correctly said that they are not in any way taxed by a tax on the gross earnings of the road arising from its operation when the road 668]could *only be constructed and operated by reason (among others) of the moneys raised upon the security of these very lands? The present insolvency of the railroad company shows that the lands must form a most important item in the ability of the company or its successors to continue the operation of the road and make any earnings whatever.

If it be assumed that after the lands became the property of the company it was at that moment no more restricted in their sale than any other corporation organized to buy and sell real estate, and that it had the entire right to sell, or not to sell, or to mortgage to whom and at what price it might obtain, and that it owned the land like an individual, still the question is presented as to what was the actual condition of affairs when the act of 1883 was passed. At that time these lands were so closely connected with the railroad, its construction and operation, as in effect to be part and parcel thereof; they stood as security for millions of bonds issued to secure the construction and operation of the road, and upon these facts the reason and justification for a classification, such as was made in that act, are plainly apparent. At that time totally different circumstances than those which surround an individual in the absolute ownership of his property existed in relation to these lands. As they made the gross earnings possible, it cannot be said, with the least regard to the fact, that those earnings did not in part issue out of the lands upon the same principle that they partly issued out of the right of way, the roadbed, track, engines, cars, tanks, and other confessedly "railroad property," There is no difference in principle between the two classes of property so far as this question is concerned. Then, too, the road of the company runs through the whole state, hundreds of miles; it owns thousands upon thousands of acres therein, granted it for the purposes stated, and these lands it has accordingly pledged to redeem its bonds issued as mentioned. Its building was a work of national importance, and it was built for use by the government, as well as for other purposes. Surely all these various facts justify a classification of such an entity for taxation by a different method and upon different lines than the *individual, [669 and the lands thus situated and owned are in a materially different condition from lands absolutely owned by an individual.

It is said this reasoning, while it might be applicable to the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, would not be applicable to many other railroads which had no land grants, or which were not situated as is the company in question, and that as the law is in its terms general, and applies to all roads, this company cannot obtain its benefit without showing that it is a valid provision in regard to all railroad property. But if the property of this company is so situated and the facts regarding it are so materially different from other real estate as to fulfil the conditions upon which a general classification may be proper, we think the company could avail itself of the act even if some other companies could not.

Many cases are cited, in the brief of counsel, from the different states, having provisions in their Constitutions somewhat similar to those found in the organic act of Dakota, and in which states it has been held that the legislature is not confined to taxation in precisely the same method for all classes of property, but that it has power to classify and to provide different methods of taxation of the property so classified. The particular facts arose in, and the cases are cited from, Wisconsin, Iowa, Kansas, Louisiana, Michigan, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Mississippi, Missouri, and Illinois. They are cited in the margin.†

670] *Upon a full consideration of the subject, we are persuaded that there is nothing in any provision of the act of 1883 for the taxation of the gross earnings which violates the letter or the spirit of the organic act.

Objection is also made to the act of 1883 on the ground that it is in violation of the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution in that by its terms taxes are laid upon earnings arising from the transportation of persons and property between different states, etc. In other words that the tax is not confined to earnings which arise from the transaction of its business wholly within the state. It is said that the case of State Tax on Railway Gross Receipts [Philadelphia & R. R. Co. v. Pennsylvania], 82 U. S. 15 Wall. 284 [21: 164], holding that the imposition of taxes upon gross receipts of railway companies was not illegal, although the gross receipts were made up in part of freights received from the transportation of merchandise from one state to another or through one state into another, has been overruled by the subsequent cases in this court, among which are those of Fargo v. Michigan [Fargo v. Stevens], 121 U. S. 230, 244 [30: 888, 894, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 51]; Philadelphia & S. Mail Steamship Company v. Pennsylvania, 122 U. S. 326 [30: 1200, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 308], and it is claimed that the case is not brought under that of Maine v. Grand Trunk Railway Company, 142 U. S. 217 [35: 994, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 807], in that there is no provision for ascertaining the amount of gross earnings derived from interstate commerce, and for the taxation of the balance only.

A perusal of the 1st section of the act does not render it at all clear that there was intended to be a tax of any portion of the gross earnings of the corporation which arose from interstate commerce. The language of the act which declares that the tax should be paid into the treasury of the territory upon a percentage of all gross earnings of the corporation owning or operating such railroad "arising from the operating of such railroad as shall be situated within the territory," gives great reason to doubt the correctness of the construction which would levy the tax upon the earnings derived from interstate commerce. But there is great force in the claim that the act is not subject to the objections mentioned in the above 671] *cases reported in 121 and 122 U. S. and the cases therein referred to. In those cases there was a distinct tax upon the gross earnings without reference to any other tax and not in substitution or in lieu of another tax, while in this case the act plainly substitutes a different method of taxation upon the property of a railroad company. It is a tax upon the lands and all the other property of the company, but instead of placing a valuation upon the lands and other property, and apportioning a certain amount upon such valuation directly, as was the old method, a new one is established of taking a percentage upon the gross earnings as a fair substitute for the former taxes upon all the lands and property of the company, and when it is said, as it is in this act, that the tax collected by this method shall be in lieu of all other taxes whatever, it would seem that it might be claimed with great plausibility that a tax levied under such circumstances and by such methods was not in reality a tax upon the gross earnings, but was a tax upon the lands and other property of the company, and that the method adopted of arriving at the sum which the company should pay as taxes upon its property was by taking a percentage of its gross earnings.

We do not think it necessary, however, to decide this question, because we are of opinion that, by the act of 1889, the legislature proffered the company a compromise as to the taxes claimed to be due and the company accepted the same. Construing the act of 1883 as we do, and as meaning to exempt the company from the payment of all other taxes than those therein named, upon all its property of every name and nature, we find that in 1889 this company had been in default in the payment of its taxes under the act of 1883 for the years 1886, 1887, and 1888. It owed nearly $200,000 in taxes for those years under that act. The taxing authorities of the county of Richland had also assumed to tax the lands of the company for the year 1888 in the same way as if owned by individuals, but the tax as thus assessed had not been paid by the company. In this state of affairs the act of 1889 was passed, the effect of which was to say to the company, if you will pay all the taxes that are due under the act of 1883, you may then accept and come in under *the provisions of [672] this act. And there is in addition to this offer a clear and necessary implication from the language used in the act, that if the company would pay those taxes in full which were thus in arrear such payment would operate as a discharge of all claims for taxes, including those claims made by virtue of the proceedings to tax the lands of the company under the general law. It certainly is not possible to believe that the legislature intended to make it a condition for the acceptance of the act of 1889 by the company that it should not only pay all the taxes which were provided for under the act of 1883 (and which by the terms of that act were in full of all other taxation), and for the payment of which the company might be in default, and yet and in addition should still be liable to pay the taxes as assessed in Richland county under the general law. We cannot suppose the legislature intended to compel the payment of taxes twice, and therefore the language of the act of 1889, providing for the payment of all taxes in arrear under the act of 1888 as a condition for the acceptance of the act of 1889, implied that such payment should also be in full of all other claims for taxes assessed for the same years. Such a condition and proposition were entirely within the power of the legislature to impose and make, and when the proposition was accepted and the condition performed by the payment of money into the treasury of the territory, all claim for taxes under any general law levied directly upon the lands necessarily fell with such payment and acceptance. This implied release of the taxes for the year 1888, which the authorities had assumed to levy under the general law, and not under the provisions of the act of 1883, arises from the language of the act of 1889, and is just as strong and just as clear as if it had been stated in so many words in that act. That which arises by plain and clear implication from the language used in an act is as much a part of the act as if the implication had been embodied in so many words.

It may be said that the money should have been paid, if at all, within thirty days after the passage of the act. Possibly, if the payment had not been made within that time and the 673] *company subsequently had offered to pay it, the money might have been refused by the authorities of the territory, as not paid in time. But the question of the time of payment was one which might be waived by the public authorities, and the objection was in law and in fact waived by the receipt and retention of the money.

The other objection made to the act of 1883, that it violates the 14th Amendment, we think untenable under the views we have above expressed.

Basing our opinion upon the facts of this case, we would say that for the reasons herein stated the company can avail itself of the payment of the taxes under the act of 1883 as a full payment of the taxes for the year 1888, and we formally answer the fourth question in the negative.

The next and fifth question we answer in the affirmative. The payments made by the railroad company for the year 1888, as set forth in the bill, embraced the whole amount of taxes due from the defendant for that year (as well as others) under the act of 1883. Even if not paid at the exact time provided for in the statute, the failure to so pay might, as we have already stated, be waived by the public authorities, and when the moneys were in fact paid to and received by the officers of the territory and went into its treasury, and never have been returned or tendered back, we think there was an effectual waiver of any objection which might possibly have been urged that the payment was not in time.

To sum up, therefore, we do not answer the first, second, and sixth questions. The answers to the third, fourth, and fifth we make as above stated, and they will be so certified.

RAFAEL MARIA DEL CASTILLO, [674
Plff. in Err.,
v.
WALTER L. McCONNICO, John H. Lang, Horace C. Reese, and William H. Fitzpatrick.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 674-685.)

Federal question—right of plaintiff in error—state question—sale of land for taxes—error in assessment—due process of law.

1. A Federal question is not presented to this court for review, although decided by the state court, if questions of a purely state character were passed upon by that court, which are sufficient to sustain its decree, wholly independent of the Federal question.
2. Because a state statute might be construed so as to cause it to violate the Constitution is not sufficient to raise a Federal question, but the right of the plaintiff in error is limited to the inquiry whether, in the case presented, the statute is so applied as to deprive him of property without due process of law.
3. The decision of a state court that an advertisement of the sale of land for taxes was sufficient under the state statute involves purely a state question, which this court accepts and follows.
4. Thirty days' publication required by the state law of a sale of land for taxes is sufficient notice to constitute due process of law; and the mere fact that there was added to the name of a male person in the advertisement the words "or her estate and heirs" did not destroy the efficacy of the advertisement, or render it legally inoperative.
5. The use of an initial, instead of the first name, of a person in an assessment roll, does not make the assessment void for want of due process of law, where the law provides for describing the property as well as naming the owner, when known, on the roll, and also fixes a time for examination and correction, of which notice is given by a general publication calling upon all persons having property subject to taxation to come forward and ask for such corrections as they desire to have made.
6. The decision by a state court that a particular formality is or is not essential under a state statute presents no Federal question, if the statute as thus construed is sufficient to provide due process of law.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of Louisiana to review a judgment of that court affirming the judgment of the Civil District Court of the Parish of New Orleans in favor of the defendants, Walter L McConnico et al., in an action brought in said Civil District Court by Rafael Maria del Castillo, plaintiff, to recover land in the city of New Orleans. Dismissed, for want of jurisdiction.

See same case below, 47 La. Ann. 1473.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. William Winans Wall, John Watt, and James L. Bradford for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. J. Zach Spearing, Richard Henry Lea, and Thomas H. Thorpe for defendants in error.

Mr. Justice White delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff in error, who was plaintiff in the trial court and appellant in the supreme court of Louisiana, prosecutes this writ of error to the judgment of the supreme court of Louisiana, affirming a decision of the trial court. This suit was commenced in the civil district 675] court of the parish of Orleans *to recover a square of ground situated in the city of New Orleans, the proceeding being known under the Louisiana Code as a petitory action. La. C. P. art. 43 et seq. The petition alleged the ownership by the plaintiff of the square of ground, and averred that the defendant McConnico was in possession and claiming title thereto. It alleged that the source from which the defendant asserted his title to have been deraigned was a tax sale made by a state tax collector in November, 1885, to enforce delinquent state taxes for the years 1876, 1877, and 1878, at which sale Orloff Lake was the purchaser. It was averred that Lake sold the property thus bought by him, in December, 1885, to one Lallance, who, in January, 1891, sold it to Lang; that he in turn sold, in February, 1892, to Fitzpatrick and Reese, each in equal undivided proportions, and that each of them in 1893 and 1894 respectively conveyed their undivided interest to the defendant McConnico. The petition charged that the tax sale, upon which the title of the defendant rested, was absolutely void; because, although the property belonged to the petitioner, whose name was Rafael Maria del Castillo, the taxes thereon for the years 1876, 1877, and 1878, to enforce the payment of which the tax sale had been made, were assessed in the name of R. Castillo. It was also alleged that the tax sale was void because, in the advertisement which preceded it and which was made by the Louisiana law a prerequisite to a valid sale, the property was described as belonging to Rafael Maria del Castillo, or her estate and heirs; that, as petitioner was a male person, the adding to the name the words "or her estate and heirs" caused the advertisement to be nothing worth and the sale thereunder to be null. The various acts of sale in the chain of title, from Lake, the purchaser, at the tax sale, to the defendant McConnico, were referred to in the petition, which prayed that not only the tax sale, but all these various transfers between the several parties, be declared to be void and the petitioner be recognized as the owner of the property and entitled to the possession thereof.

McConnico, the defendant, by answer asserted the validity of his title and called his vendor in warranty, who in turn by *answer [676 became a defendant in the cause, set up the validity of his title and called his vendor in warranty, and so on down to and including Lallance, the transferee from Lake who bought at the tax sale. All the defendants who were called in warranty averred that they were purchasers in good faith for adequate value, one alleging that after contracting to buy the property from his vendor he became doubtful about the validity of the tax sale, and had declined to carry out his contract, and that in a suit brought against him to compel compliance, a final decree had passed between himself and his vendor adjudging the title to be valid and compelling him to become the purchaser under his agreement, the price paid being the full value of the property. Another of the defendants averred that after his purchase of the property, finding that it had been forfeited to the state of Louisiana for taxes due by Castillo subsequent to the years to enforce which the tax sale had been made, he had paid the sum of the taxes, and thus held the property, not only under the tax sale, but under the title which the state of Louisiana had acquired by forfeiting the property, and which inured to his benefit in consequence of his having made the redemption. One of the defendants, McConnico, specifically pleaded by way of exception the conclusive presumptions created by act No. 82 of 1884, as debarring the court from considering the errors in the assessment and sale which were alleged in the petition. Two of the other defendants, reserving the defenses set up in their respective answers, excepted on the ground of no cause of action. The act No. 82 of 1884, which was necessarily pleaded by McConnico's exception and the consideration of which was also presented by the exceptions of no cause of action filed by the two other defendants, was substantially as follows: It made it the duty of the tax collectors to advertise for sale at public auction "all property on which there remained unpaid taxes due to the state prior to December 1, 1879." It provided for thirty days' advertisement, and directed the tax collectors, where property was bought at a tax sale, to make a deed thereof to the purchaser, and the deed thus to be made, the statute said, "shall be prima facie evidence *of the following facts: 1st. That the[677 property conveyed was subject to taxation; 2d. that none of the taxes for which said property was offered were paid, and said deed shall be conclusive evidence of the following facts: 1st. That the property was assessed according to law; 2d. that the taxes were levied according to law; 3d. that the property was advertised according to law; 4th. that the property was adjudicated and sold as stated in said deed; and, 5th. that all the prerequisites of the law were complied with by all the officers from the assessment up to and including the execution and registry of the deed to said purchaser; and duly certified copies of said deeds shall be full proof without further evidence of all contained therein." Louisiana Acts of 1884, p. 104.

The trial court heard the exceptions separately from the merits, and overruled them. The case was subsequently tried and judgment was rendered in favor of the defendants rejecting the demand of the plaintiff. This judgment was, on appeal, affirmed by the supreme court of the state of Louisiana. Castillo v. McConnico, 47 La. Ann. 1473. The court in its opinion, which is a part of the record in this cause (Egan v. Hart, 165 U. S. 188, 189 [41: 680]), after deciding that the tax sale in question was authorized by the state statute, said:

"It is urged on behalf of plaintiff that the property was not properly assessed for the taxes prior to 1879, because the assessment was in the name of R. Castillo instead of Rafael Maria del Castillo. We are relieved of the necessity of passing on the question of the sufficiency of this assessment. The act of 1884 makes the deed conclusive of the sufficiency of the assessment of the property sold under it. The question of the competency of this legislation in this respect has been before this court on repeated occasions. The argument now addressed to us against the constitutionality and interpretation of the act must be viewed as directed against a series of decisions of this court. To those decisions we must adhere and hold the act precludes the inquiry. Re Orloff Lake, 40 La. Ann. 142; Re Douglass, 41 La. Ann. 765; Breaux v. Negrotto, Jr., 43 La. Ann. 430 et seq."

678] *Referring to the thirty days' advertisement which preceded the tax sale, the court said: "In this case the advertisement gave the full name of plaintiff, adding his estate or heirs, and in our view the advertisement conformed to the requirement of the act."

The defendant in error asserts that we have no jurisdiction to review the decision of the state court because no Federal question appears by the record to have been raised either in the trial court or in the supreme court of Louisiana and because no question of that nature was decided in either of these courts, or if a Federal controversy was passed upon by the supreme court of the state, the decree of that court is sufficiently sustained, apart from any Federal question which may have been referred to in the opinion. To the contrary, the plaintiff in error contends that a Federal question was necessarily involved in and was passed on by the decision below, and that the issue so determined was there duly presented for consideration. The first of these propositions is thus evolved. The defects asserted to exist in the tax assessment and sale were, it is claimed, so radical in their nature that they would, if they had been considered, have caused the assessment and sale to amount to a denial of due process of law under the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States. From this premise is deduced the conclusion that the action of the state supreme court in refusing to consider the proof as to the existence of the defects was equivalent to taking property without due process of law. In other words, the argument is that the decision below, in effect, held that by virtue of the presumption engendered by the Louisiana act of 1884, and arising from the tax collector's deed, the plaintiff was estopped from claiming his property, even although there had been no assessment and no sale at all. Whilst it is conceded that the Federal question which is thus asserted to be necessarily involved in and embraced by the decision of the supreme court of Louisiana does not appear to have been raised on the record either in the trial court or the supreme court, this fact is claimed to be immaterial. The system of practice prevailing in Louisiana, it is argued, *rendered it impossible to place [679 the Federal question on the record in the strict sense of the word, and caused it to be possible only to present such issue by means of the brief of counsel filed in the supreme court of the state before the hearing. This brief, duly certified by the clerk of the supreme court of the state of Louisiana, has been presented, and it is argued that, in view of the system of practice obtaining in the state of Louisiana, this court may look to the brief as a legitimate source of information, and Stewart v. Kahn, 78 U. S. 11 Wall. 493 [20: 176], is relied on as supporting this proposition.

To decide the issue as to jurisdiction, we will at the outset ascertain whether a Federal question was necessarily involved in the decision of the state supreme court. Even though it be that a Federal controversy was decided, nevertheless if the questions of a purely state character, upon which the supreme court of Louisiana passed, are completely adequate to sustain the decree by that court, rendered wholly independent of the Federal question, it will result that no Federal issue is presented for review. Egan v. Hart, 165 U. S. 188, 191 [41: 680]; Powell v. Brunswick County Supers. 150 U. S. 441 [37: 1137], and authorities referred to in both of the foregoing cases. And if this conclusion be reached it will be unnecessary to consider whether, under the practice which prevails in Louisiana, the Federal question could have been presented in any other mode than by brief of counsel, and whether this fact would authorize this court to go beyond the technical record and look to such brief to aid in determining whether the Federal issue was duly set up and claimed.

Because the court below applied the statutory presumption of correctness arising from the tax collector's deed, and refused to consider the alleged defects in the assessment and sale, it does not follow that if the presumption had not been applied and the alleged imperfections in the assessment had been given their full weight, that want of due process of law would have resulted from maintaining the sufficiency of the assessment and from upholding the validity of the tax sale. It follows that, in order to ascertain whether a Federal question was necessarily involved in the decision of the lower court, we are compelled to determine whether *the vices asserted to exist in the as- [680 sessment and sale were of such a nature as to cause the enforcement of the assessment and sale to deprive the plaintiff in error of his property without due process of law. The contention advanced in argument on this subject is much broader than the case justifies; thus, it is said, the state statute directs that from a tax collector's deed a conclusive presumption of a previous assessment shall be deduced, hence the statute in terms is repugnant to the 14th Amendment since it takes property under a tax sale, although no assessment whatever had ever been levied on the property so taken. But, as thus stated, the proposition presents a purely moot question. The plaintiff in error has no interest to assert that the statute is unconstitutional because it might be construed so as to cause it to violate the Constitution. His right is limited solely to the inquiry whether in the case which he presents the effect of applying the statute is to deprive him of his property without due process of law.

We come, then, to consider whether the alleged defects in the assessment and in the advertisement were of such a nature as to cause the enforcement of the one and the upholding of the other to so operate as to deprive the plaintiff of his property without due process of law. The error in the advertisement was that, although the publication gave the full name Rafael Maria del Castillo, it was accompanied with the addition "or her estate and heirs," and the alleged defect in the assessment was that the property was assessed in the name of R. Castillo, when the real name of the owner was Rafael Maria del Castillo. The decision of the state court that the advertisement was sufficient under the Louisiana statute involved purely a state question, which we accept and follow. Conceding that a sale to enforce taxes made without notice, actual or constructive, would be a want of due process of law, it is yet obvious that the publication for thirty days required by the state law was sufficient notice to constitute due process of law, and that the mere fact that there was affixed to the name inserted in the advertisement the words "or her estate and heirs" did not destroy the efficacy of the advertisement, and did [681] not *cause it to be, in legal contemplation, no notice whatever. The contrary proposition could only be supported upon the theory that, although a complete description of the property and the full name of the owner were inserted in the advertisement, the mere addition of the words referred to were so calculated to deceive and mislead as to render the notice legally inoperative. But such assumption would be to the last degree technical and unreasonable, and cannot be indulged in.

We dismiss, then, from view the alleged defects in the advertisement, and will consider the assessment. In doing so we will take notice of, and give full effect to, the fact that the name placed on the assessment roll was R. Castillo instead of Rafael Maria del Castillo, which was the full name of the owner of the property assessed. Although the law of Louisiana under which the assessments in question were made provided for the placing of the name of the owner on the assessment roll where such name was known, it also directed that the property assessed should be described in the assessment roll. The statutes, moreover, expressly fixed a time when the assessment rolls should be exposed for examination and correction, and furnished ample opportunity, not only for revision as to valuation, but also for judicial correction of any legal error which might be asserted to exist in the assessment. The notice required by the statute to be given of the opening of the assessment rolls for inspection and revision was not addressed to each particular person assessed, but was afforded by a general publication, calling upon all persons having property subject to taxation to come forward and ask for such correction as they desired to have made. Louisiana Acts, Extra Session of 1877, pp. 154, 155; Louisiana Acts of 1871, p. 118. Beyond peradventure, this statute afforded both constructive and actual notice of the making of the assessment, and ample opportunity to any property owner to correct or resist the same if he deemed himself injured thereby. It cannot be doubted that in the exercise of its taxing power the state of Louisiana could have directed that the property subject to its taxing authority should be assessed without any reference *whatever to the name of the owner, [682] that is to say, by any such description and method as would have been legally adequate to convey either actual or constructive notice to the owner. As said in Witherspoon v. Duncan, 71 U. S. 4 Wall. 217 [18:339]: "It is not the province of this court to interfere with the policy of the revenue laws of the states, nor with the interpretation given to them by their courts. Arkansas has the right to determine the manner of levying and collecting taxes, and can declare that the particular tract of land shall be chargeable with the taxes, no matter who is the owner, or in whose name it is assessed and advertised, and that an erroneous assessment does not vitiate a sale for taxes."

The claim, then, is that the assessment in question did not constitute due process of law within the 14th Amendment because of error in the name of the owner, although the assessment would have been due process if under the state law it had not been required to mention the name of the owner, that is to say, that the assessment is repugnant to the Constitution of the United States, because of the lesser when it would not have been in conflict with the Constitution for the greater omission. This deduction demonstrates the error of the proposition relied on, and it cannot be escaped by saying that although the state had the power, without violating due process of law, to dispense with the name, nevertheless where the state statute has directed the use of a name in making an assessment, a defective giving thereof renders the assessment wholly void and a want of due process of law. This argument is answered by Williams v. Supervisors of Albany County, 122 U. S. 154 [30:1088], where, in considering the power of a state as to the assessment and collection of taxes, speaking through Mr. Justice Field, it was said:

"The mode in which the property shall be appraised, by whom its appraisement shall be made, the time within which it shall be done, what certificate of their action shall be furnished, and when parties shall be heard for the correction of errors, are matters resting in its discretion. Where directions upon the subject might originally have been dispensed with, or executed at another time, irregularities arising from neglect *to follow them may [683] be remedied by the legislature, unless its action in this respect is restrained by constitutional provisions prohibiting retrospective legislation. It is only necessary, therefore, in any case, to consider whether the assessment could have been ordered originally without requiring the proceedings, the omission or defective performance of which is complained of, or without requiring them within the time designated. If they were not essential to any valid assessment, and therefore might have been omitted or performed at another time, their omission or defective performance may be cured by the same authority which directed them, provided, always, that intervening rights are not impaired."

The vice which underlies the entire argument of the plaintiff in error arises from a failure to distinguish between the essentials of due process of law under the 14th Amendment, and matters which may or may not be essential under the terms of a state assessing or taxing law. The two are neither correlative nor coterminous. The first, due process of law, must be found in the state statute, and cannot be departed from without violating the Constitution of the United States. The other depends on the lawmaking power of the state, and, as it is solely the result of such authority, may vary or change as the legislative will of the state sees fit to ordain. It follows that, to determine the existence of the one, due process of law is the final province of this court, whilst the ascertainment of the other, that is, what is merely essential under the state statute, is a state question within the final jurisdiction of courts of last resort of the several states. When, then, a state court decides that a particular formality was or was not essential under the state statute, such decision presents no Federal question, providing always the statute as thus construed does not violate the Constitution of the United States, by depriving of property without due process of law. This paramount requirement being fulfilled, as to other matters the state interpretation of its own law is controlling and decisive. This distinction is pointed out by the decisions of 694]this court. Pittsburg, Cincinnati C. & St. L. Railway Company* v. Backus, 154 U.S. 421, [38:1032]; Kentucky Railroad Tax Cases, 115 U. S. 322 [29:414]; Davidson v. New Orleans, 96 U. S. 97 [24:616].

Bearing the foregoing elementary principle in mind, we will briefly notice the adjudicated cases upon which the plaintiff in error relies.

The authorities referred to tending to establish that where the law requires an assessment to contain the name, the omission of the name renders the assessment void, are inapposite to the question under consideration. We are not here concerned with the meaning of the Louisiana statutes, or whether we would hold as an original proposition, were we construing them, that a defect in the name of the person assessed would not be a material variance. The supreme court of the state of Louisiana has construed the statutes of that state otherwise. The issue which we are to determine is not what interpretation should be given to the statutes of the state of Louisiana, but whether, accepting the meaning affixed to the statutes of that state by the court of last resort of the state, their provisions as so interpreted are repugnant to the Constitution of the United States, because not affording due process of law. The previous adjudications of the supreme court of Louisiana referred to by that court in its opinion and upon which it rested its decree in this case, in effect held that under the Louisiana law a mistake in the name did not render the assessment void, and therefore that the conclusive presumption engendered by the Louisiana act of 1884 was not intended and did not make valid a wholly void assessment. Because in a case decided subsequently to the one now under review the supreme court of the state of Louisiana has held that an assessment in the name of a person deceased rendered such assessment wholly void, it does not follow that the court thereby departed from the ruling which it had made in this case, and which had been by it rested upon a line of decisions declared by it to have conclusively settled the law of Louisiana on the subject, and which, in effect, it announced had become a rule of property in that state. The case of Marx v. Hanthorn, 148 U. S. 172 [37:410], in no way conflicts with the foregoing considerations. That case came to this *court[685 on appeal from a circuit court of the United States, and its decision involved ascertaining the meaning of the tax laws of the state as interpreted by the court of last resort thereof. In performing this duty the court adopted and followed the construction given to the tax laws of the state by the supreme court of the state whence the case came.

There is a claim asserted in argument that as a particular section of the act of 1884 provided that the sum of the bid at a tax sale should be paid into the state treasury, therefore it is clearly unconstitutional, since in a case where the bid exceeded the taxes the surplus money of the owner would go into the state treasury without provision for its repayment. But this is a mere abstract contention, since the fact is that the sum bid at the tax sale in question was less than the amount of the taxes assessed against the property.

Dismissed for want of jurisdiction.

of appeals, this court has jurisdiction of an appeal directly to this court from a final judgment of the United States circuit court where it is claimed in the complaint that certain ordinances of a city and a state statute impaired the obligation of a contract, and were therefore in contravention of the United States Constitution.

2. City ordinances are the equivalent of laws of the state within the meaning of the provision giving jurisdiction to this court of an appeal from a circuit court, in a case in which the law of the state is claimed to violate the Constitution of the United States.

3. The fact that a claim of the violation of the Constitution of the United States by state law is not well founded does not preclude the jurisdiction of this court on appeal from a circuit court of the United States.

4. Equity may withhold relief from those who have delayed the assertion of their claims for an unreasonable length of time, even though the laches are not pleaded or the bill demurred to.

5. Equitable powers will not be exerted to save a person from the consequences of his own neglect after the position of the parties has so changed that equitable relief cannot be afforded without doing injustice or destroying or impairing the intervening rights of third parties.

6. Laches is not, like limitation, a mere matter of time, but principally a question of the inequity of permitting the claim to be enforced,—an inequity founded upon some change in the condition or relations of the property or parties.

7. Five years' delay in taking steps to contest the validity of an ordinance for the construction of public works will preclude relief, where in the meantime the city has incurred great expense in the work and has sold bonds therefor.

Argued April 23, 1897. Decided January 3, 1898.

APPEAL from a decree of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Western District of Texas sustaining a demurrer to the complaint and dismissing for want of equity a suit brought by the Penn Mutual Life Insurance Company et al., plaintiffs, against the city of Austin et al., defendants, to obtain a decree that a city ordinance and contract for supplying the city of Austin with water, etc., are in full force and effect and that the contract is valid and that said city must perform the same, and for an injunction restraining said city and its council, etc., from constructing a new system of waterworks, etc. Affirmed as modified.

Statement by Mr. Justice White:

The court below sustained a demurrer to and dismissed for want of equity the bill of the complainants, by which, as citizens of the states of Pennsylvania, Maryland, and New York, respectively, they impleaded the defendants, the one a municipal corporation created by a law of the state of Texas, and its mayor and board of public works, citizens of the state of Texas, and the other a corporation organized under the authority of the general laws of the state of Texas regulating the formation of corporations, also a citizen of that state.

The bill which was filed on January 8, 1895, alleged in substance as follows: That the city of Austin was in 1892 a municipal corporation, and that for many years its inhabitants and the city itself for municipal purposes had been supplied with water by a corporation known as the City Water Company; that in 1882, in consequence of the growth of the city, both for the health of the people of the city, the safety of its property, and the development of its manufacturing industries, a larger supply of water was absolutely needed, and that the taxpayers presented a petition to the city authorities asking that an arrangement by contract or otherwise be at once made to afford the augmented water supply which was essential; that the municipality, being fully empowered by its charter to supply water, and being authorized by the general laws of the state of Texas to make a contract for so doing, on the 13th day of April, 1882, did enter into a contract with the City Water Company to the end that a more copious supply of water should be furnished; that this contract gave to the company the right to furnish water for twenty years, with the privilege on the part of the city of buying at the end of ten years, or at any time on giving one year's notice, the waterworks which *the contract required the company to [687 erect; that the contract fixed a reasonable price to be paid for the use of water to be furnished by the water company, provided for the establishment of a given number of hydrants for the use of the city, and stipulated a rental therefor; that it imposed upon the corporation obligations of the most onerous character, compelling it to erect a large and costly plant, to lay extensive mains and pipes, and to extend them at any time during the life of the contract wherever the city might direct, and exacted that the company should add new hydrants for municipal uses as the city might require, giving to the water company as compensation in addition to the rentals to be paid by the city for hydrants, as above stated, a commutation of municipal taxation.

The bill averred that the contract was in all respects advantageous to the city and beneficial to its inhabitants, and was indeed as to each and every obligation contained therein or resulting therefrom reasonable and just; that the city at the time the contract was entered into was not in a position to itself erect the works without inordinately increasing its burden of taxation, and that the contract contemplated that the water company should obtain the money to erect the works by issuing its negotiable bonds, since there was therein contained a stipulation that the money to become due for the rentals of the hydrants should be paid by the city to the trustee of any bonds which might be issued by the water company, so as to guarantee the prompt payment of the interest on any such bonds; that the water company, on the faith of the contract, issued to the Farmers' Loan & Trust Company its negotiable bonds for $250,000, secured them by mortgage upon all its property, present and prospective, and with the sum thus realized and other available resources, with integrity and fidelity and in complete compliance with every obligation resting on it, erected the desired waterworks plant, which afforded the desired supply of water; that of the bonds thus issued to the Farmers' Loan & Trust Company, $100,000 in amount were bought for more than their face value in open market by the Penn Mutual Life Insurance

688] Company, one of the *complainants. The bill moreover alleged that, in March, 1883, after the plant had been constructed and many miles of mains had been laid, the city, by ordinance duly enacted, accepted the work, and declared that the water company had fully performed its obligations. That subsequent to this date, the city directed a very large extension of the mains and pipes to be made, which was promptly executed by the water company with money obtained from an additional issue of bonds on the Farmers' Loan & Trust Company amounting to $100,000, $10,000 of which Jacob Tome, another of the complainants, bought for full value in open market.

The bill then alleged that in 1884 the city of Austin contracted with a corporation known as the Austin Electric Light Company to build and carry on a plant required to light that city, and that this corporation issued its bonds to carry out its corporate purposes to the extent of $25,000. That in June, 1887, all the plant rights, privileges, franchises, and obligations of this electric-light company, as well as those of the water company, were, with the consent and approval of the city of Austin, transferred to a corporation known as the Austin Water, Light, & Power Company, a Texas corporation having corporate capacity both to undertake the duty of supplying water and of furnishing light to the city of Austin; that, in consequence of its assumption of all the obligations of both the aforementioned companies, the Austin Water, Light, & Power Company was required by the city to make considerable additions to its water mains, and in order to obtain the capital to execute these directions of the city, that company issued to the Farmers' Loan & Trust Company of New York $750,000 of bonds, secured by mortgage upon all its property, $375,000 of these bonds being reserved to pay the outstanding bonds (that is, the $250,000 first issued of the water company, the $100,000 second issue and the $25,000 issue by the Austin Electric Light Company), and the remaining $375,000 being negotiated in open market for full value, the proceeds being expended in complying with the city's direction, and that $50,000 of these last bonds were purchased in open market for full value by Ogden 689]and Robert Goelet, *the last-named complainants. The bill averred that the waterworks thus originally established and extended were in every respect entirely adequate to supply every want, not only of all the inhabitants of the city of Austin, but of the municipality, and that in each and every particular the municipality was as advantageously placed with respect to a water supply as it could have been under any condition or circumstance whatever.

The bill then alleged that, despite the existence of the contract, and the entire justness and fairness of each and every obligation and stipulation therein contained, and without any just reason therefor, the city of Austin, on the 31st day of March, 1890, passed an ordinance entitled "An Ordinance Ordering an Election to Obtain the Consent of the Property Tax Paying Qualified Voters of the City of Austin, to the Extension by the City Council of the Bonded Indebtedness of the City of Austin for the Purposes of Constructing a System of Waterworks and Furnishing Lights for the City of Austin." That this ordinance provided that an election should be held on the 5th day of May, 1890, to obtain the consent of the taxpayers for an increase of the bonded indebtedness of the city to the amount of $1,400,000 for the purpose of obtaining money to erect a system of waterworks and an electric-light plant for lighting the city; that on the 5th of May, 1890, the election was held, as provided, and the taxpayers gave their assent to the proposition submitted by the ordinance, and that the city council thereafter declared the election to have been carried, and that the power to issue bonds had been sanctioned; that on July 21, 1890, the city passed an ordinance authorizing the increased issue of $1,400,000 of bonds, providing for the levy and collection each year, as long as the bonds should be outstanding, of a tax to aid in paying the same. This ordinance directed that the bonds on their face should not only contain a statement of the objects for which they were issued, but should also show that their payment was secured by all the sums to be collected for the use of the water to be furnished by the new plant, and the ordinance moreover contained a provision guaranteeing that the rates to be charged for the water to be furnished *should [690 be so regulated that their product would equal the sum of the interest on the bonds, and a sinking fund to provide for the retirement of the principal thereof. The money to be realized from the sale of the bonds was required to be set apart in a distinct fund, to be warranted for from time to time in payment of the work as it progressed. The character of the work to be done was moreover fixed by an ordinance which empowered the board of public works to construct waterworks by means of a dam across the Colorado river at a designated point, in accordance with the plans of a civil engineer who was named therein.

It was alleged that as the purpose and necessary effect of the foregoing action of the city was to impair the contract rights of the Austin Water, Light, & Power Company held by it as the assignee of the two original companies, the ordinances passed by the city and each and everything subsequently done thereunder was void because repugnant to the Constitution of the United States. The bill moreover averred that in April, 1891, the legislature of the state of Texas passed an act giving a new charter to the city of Austin, which contained an express grant of power to that city to construct for its own use a waterworks plant, and that the sole object of this new charter was to sanction the action of the municipality previously taken, and therefore the act in question was also void under the Constitution of the United States, because it impaired the previous contract rights of the Austin Water, Light, & Power Company.

It was averred that the board of public works had "already expended a large sum of money in the construction of a dam across the Colorado river," and "are now actually laying water pipe in and along the streets of the city of Austin, and it is the avowed intention of the said city to press the construction of said rival system of waterworks to a speedy completion, and upon the completion of the same to discontinue the taking of water from the said water company, and to refuse to perform any obligation resting upon the said city as embraced in the said contract with the said city water company." It was alleged that the 691] tax provided by the ordinance *which authorized the building of the new waterworks had been levied for the years 1893 and 1894, and that the property of the Austin Water, Light, & Power Company had been assessed for this tax, and that the property of the company was thus being levied upon for a tax to be used for the purpose of erecting the new works which were intended to take the place of its plant, and thereby to destroy its contract rights. Although the bill was filed by the complainants in virtue of their rights as holders and owners of the bonds issued or assumed by the Austin Water, Light, & Power Company as aforesaid, it contained no averment that either the bondholders, who were complainants, or any others, had at any previous time requested the trustee to take any action so as to prevent the accomplishment of the violation of the contract rights of the corporation and its bondholders, which it was alleged had inevitably arisen from the action of the city originating in 1890. The bill, however, contained the following averments:

"That as soon as the said city of Austin announced its intention of constructing a rival system of waterworks, and before anything was done in pursuance thereof, the said M. D. Mathers, president of the Austin Water, Light, & Power Company, on behalf of the said water company and these bondholders, remonstrated with the said mayor and city council, and requested them and urged them not to violate the said contract, or to take any steps to depreciate the value of the property of the said water company, but to exercise the right which the said city has to purchase the said works at their appraised value; and the said bondholders have continued, ever since that time, to remonstrate with the said city of Austin and the officers thereof, but that the said city has entirely disregarded the said remonstrances and requests, and has openly repudiated all liability under the said contract."

And further the bill alleged:

"That your orators and the other bondholders of the said water company have repeatedly applied to the said Austin Water, Light, & Power Company, and its president and board of directors, and requested them to institute proceedings 692] *to protect the property of the said water company, and the rights therein of the said bondholders; but that the said water company has failed to comply with the request of your orators and said bondholders. But the said Austin Water, Light, & Power Company, and the officers thereof, by reason of the contract relations existing between the said city of Austin and the said company, fear that the consequences of any such litigation instituted by the said Water Company would be exceedingly disastrous and would precipitate adverse and hostile action by the said city of Austin."

The relief asked by the bill is thus stated in the prayer thereof:

"That your orators may have the decree of your honorable court, adjudging and decreeing that the said ordinance and contract, so accepted and acted upon by all the parties, are in full force and effect, and that the said contract is a valid and subsisting contract, binding upon the said city as well as upon the said water company and upon the said bondholders, and that the said city must abide by and perform the same, and that until its purchase of the said existing waterworks, in the manner and upon the terms set forth in the said contract, and that the said city of Austin, its mayor and city council and board of public works, have no right or power to construct a river waterworks system to, in any way, interfere with the rights of the said Austin Water, Light, & Power Company, and that it is unlawful and inequitable for the said city of Austin to levy and collect the tax upon the property of the said Austin Water, Light, & Power Company to be expended in the unlawful and inequitable manner hereinbefore alleged, in the construction of a rival system of waterworks; and that a writ of injunction may issue out of this honorable court restraining the said city of Austin, its mayor and city council and board of public works, and its other officers, servants, agents, and employees, from taking a supply of water from any other source and from proceeding in constructing and maintaining a new and distinct system of waterworks, and from taking and appropriating to its own use, except in the manner provided in said contract, any portion of the said works* so constructed at 693] its instance and for its benefit with money furnished upon the faith of its obligation by the said Austin Water, Light, & Power Company and the said bondholders, that your orators may have such other and further relief as the case may, in equity, require and as to this honorable court may seem proper."

The demurrer which the lower court sustained, besides asserting that the bill disclosed no cause for equitable relief, rested upon seven grounds, which may be reduced to six, substantially as follows: 1st. Because by the Constitution of the state of Texas the contract made by the city of Austin with the water company was void. 2d. Because the contract was beyond the power of the corporation as defined in its charter and as limited by the general laws of the state of Texas. 3d. Because the commutation of taxation granted to the water company was in its essence but an exemption, and the city was without power, under the Constitution of the state of Texas, to grant it. 4th. Because even if an exclusive right was given to the water company, such grant under the Constitution and laws of the state of Texas was subject to alteration, amendment, or repeal by the legislature which had exercised such reserved power. 5th. Because the granting of any exclusive rights was forbidden by the Constitution which was in force at the time the alleged contract was made. 6th. Because even if the complainants had any contract rights, and if there had been an impairment thereof, full and adequate remedy was afforded by an action at law, and there was, hence, no reason for the interposition of a court of equity.

Messrs. Skipwith Wilmer, D. T. Watson, and Samuel B. Huey for appellants.

Mr. S. R. Fisher for appellees.

Mr. Justice White delivered the opinion of the court:

The jurisdiction of this court to review the decree of the trial court is denied, the contention being that if an appeal *from the decision of the trial court was desired, it should have been had in the circuit court of appeals and cannot be here obtained. 694]

By the 5th section of the act of March 3, 1891, creating the circuit court of appeals (26 Stat. at L. 826, chap. 517), jurisdiction is conferred upon this court to review by direct appeal any final judgment rendered by the circuit court "in any case in which the Constitution or law of a state is claimed to be in contravention of the Constitution of the United States." There can be no doubt that the case at bar comes within this provision. The complainants in their bill in express terms predicated their right to the relief sought upon the averment that certain ordinances adopted by the municipal authorities of the city of Austin, and an act of the legislature of the state of Texas referred to in the bill, impaired the obligations of the contract which the bill alleged had been entered into with the complainants by the city of Austin, and that both the law of the state of Texas and the city ordinances were in contravention of the Constitution of the United States. No language could more plainly bring a case within the letter of a statute than do these allegations of the bill bring this case within the law of 1891.

Not only were the averments of the bill as to the invalidity of the state law adequate, but so also were the allegations as to the nullity of the city ordinances. These ordinances were but the exercise by the city of a legislative power which it assumed had been delegated to it by the state, and were, therefore, in legal intendment the equivalent of laws enacted by the state itself. City Railroad Co. v. Citizens' Street Railway Co. 166 U. S. 557 [41: 1114], and cases there cited. The argument by which it is sought to support the contention that a right to review the case by direct appeal does not exist, not only disregards the letter of the statute, but is unsound in reason. It says that the right to the direct appeal can alone rest on the proposition, "that the Constitution or a law of the state of Texas conflicts with appellant's contract, and contravenes the Federal Constitution; in other words, it must affirmatively appear upon the face 695]of the complainant's *bill that there was involved in this case a Federal question, the determination of which was essential to a correct decision of the case." But the words of the statute which empower this court to review directly the action of the circuit court are that such power shall exist wherever it is claimed on the record that a law of a state is in contravention of the Federal Constitution. Of course, the claim must be real and colorable, not fictitious and fraudulent. The contention here made, however, is, not that the bill, without color of right, alleges that the state law and city ordinances violate the Constitution of the United States, but that such claim as alleged in the bill is legally unsound. The argument, then, in effect, is that the right to direct appeal to this court does not exist where it is claimed that a state law violates the Constitution of the United States, unless the claim be well founded. But it cannot be decided whether the claim is meritorious and should be maintained without taking jurisdiction of the case. The authorities referred to as supporting the position indicate that the argument is the result of a confusion of thought, and that it arises from confounding the power of this court to review on a writ of error the action of a state court with the power exercised by this court under the act of 1891, to review by direct appeal the final action of the circuit court where, on the face of the record, it appears that the claim was made that the statute of a state contravened the Constitution of the United States. These classes of jurisdiction are distinct in their nature, and are embraced in different statutory provisions. Having jurisdiction of the cause, there exists the power to consider every question arising on the record. Horner v. United States, 143 U. S. 571 [36: 267].

Conceding without deciding, the legality and binding force of the contract as averred in the bill, and that the obligations which it created were materially impaired, not only by a law of the state of Texas, but also by the ordinances passed by the city, and the execution of such ordinances, all as alleged; conceding, moreover, without so deciding, that the Austin Water, Light, & Power Company was the successor in law of the original corporations, and hence responsible for all their obligations *and entitled to all their rights; 696] and, further, conceding that the complainants as bondholders have the capacity to assert the impairment of the contract made by the city of Austin with the City Water Company, it yet becomes at the outset necessary to decide whether, granting, arguendo, all these propositions, the complainants are entitled to the relief which they seek, that is to say, whether they can be heard to invoke the interposition of a court of equity. As a prerequisite to the solution of this question, it is necessary to determine precisely the remedy which it is the purpose of the bill to obtain in order to redress the wrongs which it alleged to exist. Whilst the prayer of the bill asks that the validity of the contract be recognized, and whilst it also prays that the legality of the communication of taxation created by the city ordinance be decreed, these prayers are made but the foundation or premise for the real relief which the bill invokes; that is, the exercise of the power to enjoin in order thereby to perpetually restrain the city of Austin from completing the waterworks, by it commenced, and from levying on the property of the Austin Water, Light, & Power Company any taxation to be used to complete the new waterworks. The preliminary inquiry, therefore, is whether the complainants have so exercised their rights as to entitle them to prevent the city from completing the waterworks.

In Speidel v. Henrici, 120 U. S. 377, 387 [30: 718, 719], the court said, speaking through Mr. Justice Gray:

"Independently of any statute of limitations, courts of equity uniformly decline to assist a person who has slept upon his rights and shows no excuse for his laches in asserting them. 'A court of equity,' said Lord Camden, 'has always refused its aid to stale demands, where the party slept upon his rights, and acquiesced for a great length of time. Nothing can call forth this court into activity, but conscience, good faith, and reasonable diligence; where these are wanting, the court is passive, and does nothing. Laches and neglect are always discountenanced; and therefore from the beginning of this jurisdiction there was always a limitation to suits in this court.'"

697] *In Galliher v. Cadwell, 145 U. S. 368, 371 [36: 738, 739], speaking through Mr. Justice Brewer, it was said:

"The question of laches turns not simply upon the number of years which have elapsed between the accruing of her rights, whatever they were, and her assertion of them, but also upon the nature and evidence of those rights, the changes in value, and other circumstances occurring during that lapse of years. The cases are many in which this defense has been invoked and considered. It is true that by reason of their differences of fact no one case becomes an existing precedent for another, yet a uniform principle pervades them all."

In Hammond v. Hopkins, 143 U. S. 224, 250 [36: 134, 145], through Mr. Chief Justice Fuller, the court said:

"No rule of law is better settled than that a court of equity will not aid a party whose application is destitute of conscience, good faith, and reasonable diligence, but will discourage stale demands, for the peace of society, by refusing to interfere where there have been gross laches in prosecuting rights, or where long acquiescence in the assertion of adverse rights has occurred."

In Willard v. Woods, 164 U. S. 502, 524 [41. 531, 540], the court said:

"But the recognized doctrine of courts of equity to withhold relief from those who have delayed the assertion of their claims for a reasonable length of time may be applied in the discretion of the court, even though the laches are not pleaded or the bill demurred to. Sullivan v. Portland and Kennebec R. R. Co. 94 U. S. 806, 811 [24: 324, 326]; Lansdale v. Smith, 106 U. S. 391, 394 [27·219, 220]; Badger v. Badger, 69 U. S. 2 Wall. 87, 95 [17: 836, 839].

In Lane & Bodley Co. v. Locke, 150 U. S. 193 [37: 1049], and Mackall v. Cassilear, 137 U. S. 566 [34: 779], it was held that the mere assertion of a claim, unaccompanied with any act to give effect to the asserted right, could not avail to keep alive a right which would otherwise be precluded because of laches. Indeed, the principle by which a court of equity declines to exert its powers to relieve one who has been guilty of laches as expressed in the foregoing decisions has been applied by this court in so many cases besides those above referred to as to render the doctrine elementary.

698] * Whitney v. Fox, 166 U. S. 637, 647, 648 [41: 1145, 1148, 1149]; Gildersleeve v. New Mexico Mining Co. 161 U. S. 573, 582 [40: 812, 815]; Abraham v. Ordway, 158 U. S. 416, 423 [39: 1036, 1040]; Ware v. Galveston City Co. 146 U. S. 102, 116 [36: 904, 910]; Foster v. Mansfield, Coldwater & L. M. Railroad Co. 146 U. S. 88, 102 [36: 902, 904]; Galliher v. Cadwell, supra where the earlier cases are fully reviewed; Hoyt v. Latham, 143 U. S. 553 [36: 259]; Hanna v. Moulton, 138 U. S. 486, 495 [34: 1032, 1037]; Richards v. Mackall, 124 U. S. 183, 188 [31: 396, 400].

The reason upon which the rule is based is not alone the lapse of time during which the neglect to enforce the right has existed, but the changes of condition which may have arisen during the period in which there has been neglect. In other words, where a court of equity finds that the position of the parties has so changed that equitable relief cannot be afforded without doing injustice, or that the intervening rights of third persons may be destroyed or seriously impaired, it will not exert its equitable powers in order to save one from the consequences of his own neglect. The adjudicated cases, as said in Galliher v. Cadwell, supra, 372 [36: 740], "proceed on the assumption that the party to whom laches is imputed has knowledge of his rights, and an ample opportunity to establish them in the proper forum; that by reason of his delay the adverse party has good reason to believe that the alleged rights are worthless, or have been abandoned; and that, because of the change in condition of relations during this period of delay, it would be an injustice to the latter to permit him now to assert them." The requirement of diligence, and the loss of the right to invoke the arm of a court of equity in case of laches, is particularly applicable where the subject-matter of the controversy is a public work. In a case of this nature, where a public expenditure has been made, or a public work undertaken, and where one having full opportunity to prevent its accomplishment has stood by and seen the public work proceed, a court of equity will more readily consider laches. The equitable doctrine in this regard is somewhat analogous to the legal rule which holds that where one who has the title in fee to real estate, although he has not been compensated, "remains inactive and permits them [a railway company] to go on and expend large sums in the work, he will be *estopped [699 from maintaining either trespass or ejectment for the entry, and will be regarded as having acquiesced therein, and be restricted to a suit for damages." Roberts v. The Northern Pacific Railroad Co. 158 U. S. 11 [39: 877], and authorities there cited. As said in Galliher v. Cadwell, supra, 373 [36: 740]: "But it is unnecessary to multiply cases. They all proceed upon the theory that laches is not, like limitation, a mere matter of time, but principally a question of the inequity of permitting the claim to be enforced—an inequity founded upon some change in the condition or relation of the property or the parties."

Do the facts in the case before us bring it within the rule of laches as expounded in the foregoing authorities? The rights of the water company, under its contract, were created long prior to the year 1890. Before that year the waterworks plant was constructed and from it the inhabitants of the city of Austin were being supplied with water. The violation of the contract relied upon as impairing its obligations originated in 1890. The first step was the passage of an ordinance submit-ing to the voters of the city of Austin the proposition whether the bonded debt of the municipality should be increased by the issue of $1,400,000 of negotiable bonds, the proceeds arising from the sale of such bonds to be used in erecting the new waterworks. There was nothing clandestine in the conduct of the municipality, since its action was dependent on a municipal election. The holding of the municipal election followed, and, after it had taken place, occurred the passage of the ordinance, directing the issue of the new bonds, providing that they were to be secured by the water rates to be collected from the new waterworks which were to be constructed. From the time of the submission to the vote, and of the ordinances issuing the bonds and directing the work to be done, all in 1890, until this bill was filed in 1895, no legal steps whatever appear by the bill to have been taken to prevent the consummation of the wrong which the bill alleges was necessarily to result from the action of the municipal authorities. During all this period it does not appear from the bill that the trustee representing the bondholders was ever 700] *called upon by them to take any steps whatever to protect their interest. It cannot be said that the bondholders were ignorant of the action and purposes of the city of Austin, since the bill avers that, conscious of the fact that their rights were to be impaired by the action of the city, they repeatedly called upon the Austin Water, Light, & Power Company to take action on the subject, but that that corporation refused so to do, and that the bondholders continued to object to the proposed action of the city without doing anything whatever to protect their legal rights. The bill alleges the issue by the municipal authorities of the series of bonds provided for, since it says, in referring to the tax levied upon the property of the Austin Water, Light, & Power Company, that for the purpose "of providing for the interest and sinking fund on the bonds of the said city of Austin, issued for said purpose [that is, the new waterworks], the said city of Austin has levied a tax." The exact amount of the new bonds which have been issued is not specifically set out in the bill, but it is inferable from the allegations, to which we have just referred, that the whole series has been issued by the city, since the bill alleges that the taxation has been levied for the purpose of paying the bonds provided by the ordinance. Moreover, that either the whole or a large portion of the bonds have been issued is plainly deducible from other averments in the bill. The ordinance, which is an exhibit to the bill, provides that to pay for the work proposed the bonds should be discounted from time to time as required by the necessities of the situation, that the proceeds arising from their sale should be put to a special fund, and be warranted against by the proper city officer to pay for the work. And the bill avers that the city at great expense has nearly completed a costly dam across the Colorado river as a part of the work provided. The bill therefore presents a case where there has arisen during the existence of the delay a material change in the situation of the parties, and besides is one where rights of third parties have intervened. It cannot be said, under the case made by the bill, that the power of a court of equity can be exerted to forbid *the finishing of [701 the waterworks structure, which the bill alleges has been largely completed, without seriously impairing the rights of the bondholders under the ordinances in question. One of the methods of payment stipulated, as we have seen, for these bonds was the revenue to be derived from the new waterworks, and of course no such revenues can ever result if the waterworks are never to be finished. It is certain, then, that if the completion of the new waterworks be restrained by an injunction, that the interest of the new bondholders will be seriously affected, and that this result will be brought about by a decree of a court of equity rendered in the enforcement of asserted rights of complainants, who, if they had taken timely action, could have adequately protected themselves from injury without resulting wrong to the rights of many other persons.

It being clear under such circumstances that the complainants were not entitled to the relief which they sought, it of course follows that the court below did not err in sustaining the demurrer and dismissing the bill for want of equity. We think, however, that the dismissal should have been without prejudice, and the decree below is therefore modified in that particular, and, as so modified, it is affirmed.

THE DECISIONS

OF THE

Supreme Court of the United States

AT

OCTOBER TERM, 1897.

[Authenticated copy of opinion record strictly followed, except as to such reference words and figures as are inclosed in brackets.]

1] AMBROSE P. S. STUART, Appt.,
v.
KENT K. HAYDEN, Receiver of the Capital National Bank of Lincoln, Nebraska, August T. Gruetter, and Charles F. Joers.

AUGUST T. GRUETTER and Charles F. Joers, Appts.,
v.
AMBROSE P. S. STUART and Kent K. Hayden, Receiver of the Capital National Bank of Lincoln, Nebraska.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 1-15.)

Liability of stockholder of national bank—facts found by lower courts—remedy by rescission.

1. A transfer of shares of stock in an insolvent national bank, with intent to escape individual liability as a stockholder, made by one who has knowledge of the insolvency of the bank, or at least of facts which reasonably justify a belief of its existing or impending insolvency, will not relieve him from his liability under U. S. Rev. Stat. § 5151.

2. Ultimate facts found by the circuit court, and also by the circuit court of appeals, to be established by the evidence, will be accepted by this court unless they clearly appear to be wrong.

3. An action to recover damages for fraudulent misrepresentations of the value of property at the time of a trade is in effect an action for part of the purchase price, and, while it is pending, constitutes an election to ratify the trade, so as to preclude the remedy by rescission.

Argued December 9, 10, 1897. Decided January 10, 1898.

APPEALS from a decree of the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit reversing the decree of the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Nebraska and decreeing a certain transfer of stock of the Capital National Bank of Lincoln from Ambrose P. S. Stuart to August T. Gruetter and Charles F. Joers to be fraudulent and voidable as to the receiver of the Bank and that the receiver recover of Stuart an assessment made by him, etc., in an action brought by Kent K. Hayden, receiver of said bank, against said Stuart et al., to recover an assessment upon said stock, etc. Decree of court of appeals affirmed, but without prejudice to the prosecution of any claim that Gruetter and Joers may have against Stuart arising out of the transactions.

See same case below, 36 U. S. App. 462.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. C. C. Flansburg for Ambrose P. S. Stuart.

Messrs. G. M. Lambertson, Amasa Cobb, A. E. Harvey, and F. M. Hall for Kent K. Hayden, Receiver.

Mr. John H. Ames for Gruetter & Joers.

Mr. Justice Harlan delivered the opinion of the court:

On the 6th day of February, 1893, the Controller of the Curreney appointed a receiver of the Capital National Bank of Lincoln, Nebraska, which had a nominal capital of $300,000. The bank had shortly before suspended business, and upon due examination had been found to be insolvent.

Subsequently, June 10, 1893, that officer—having first determined that in order to pay the debts of the bank it was necessary to enforce the individual liability of shareholders as prescribed in §§ 5151 and 5234 of the Revised Statutes—made an assessment for $300,000, to be paid by shareholders equally and ratably on or before July 10, 1893. Of this assessment and requisition Stuart had proper notice.

*In execution of this order the receiver [3 brought the present action against Stuart.

Stuart became the owner of one hundred shares of the stock of the Capital National

NOTE.—That the Supreme Court will not review the discretionary action of the court below, see note to Barrow v. Hill, 14: 48.

Bank in 1884 and of fifty additional shares in 1886. Substantially from the time of becoming a shareholder he was one of the directors of the bank, and a member of its finance committee, and acted in both capacities until about December 16, 1892. On the last-named day, Gruetter & Joers, dealers in furniture at Lincoln, sold to Stuart certain real property in that city for $67,500, upon which there was at the time a mortgage for $30,000 bearing interest at the rate of 6 per cent per annum. The terms of the contract were that Stuart should assume the mortgage debt, deliver to Gruetter & Joers his stock in the Capital National Bank as of the value of $18,000, meet the taxes on the property which then amounted to $250, and pay the balance of the price in cash; Gruetter & Joers to take a lease of the real estate for ten years, at $6,000 per year. At the time of this agreement, Stuart paid $1,000 to bind the bargain. On the 22d day of December, 1892, Gruetter & Joers made their deed to Stuart for the real estate; and Stuart delivered to them his certificates of shares of stock, having signed the blank forms of powers of attorney indorsed thereon, and paid the balance of the agreed price in cash, the taxes on the property, and the interest that had accrued on the mortgage.

On the 3d day of January, 1893, the certificates of stock, with the blank powers of attorney indorsed thereon, were returned to the bank, and new certificates were issued to Gruetter & Joers.

The bank closed its doors within less than three weeks after the stock was transferred on its books to Gruetter & Joers, its total assets being about $900,000, and total liabilities $1,463,013.17. Its bills receivable on hand were $519,600, of which $58,596.82 were good, $141,393.27 were doubtful, and $319,611.90 were worthless. Its bills receivable not on hand amounted to $141,000, of which only $10,000 were worth anything.

4] *The original bill was against Stuart alone. But a demurrer for want of parties having been sustained, an amended bill was filed against Stuart, Gruetter, and Joers.

The amended bill alleged in substance that, at the time of the transaction between Stuart and Gruetter & Joers, the former was fully advised of the failing condition and insolvency of the bank, and transferred his stock to them in anticipation of its early failure and the necessary enforcement of the liability of shareholders for the benefit of creditors, and with the intent to evade such liability and to defraud the creditors of the bank. The relief sought was a decree setting aside the transfers of stock, and adjudging that Stuart was liable as a shareholder of the bank under the assessment made by the Controller of the Currency. It was further alleged by the receiver that Gruetter & Joers were, at the time of the transfer to them of Stuart's stock, pecuniarily irresponsible persons, from whom the amount of such assessment upon each share of the stock so owned and held by Stuart could not be made by legal process or otherwise.

Stuart in his answer insisted that the sale to Gruetter & Joers was an ordinary business transaction, and denied that he had, at the time of his purchase from Gruetter & Joers, any knowledge whatever of the condition of the bank, or that he knew that the bank was then insolvent, or that he expected it to fail; that, on the contrary, he believed it to be perfectly solvent, sold and transferred his stock without any thought of the enforcement of his liability as a shareholder, and without any intention to evade such liability or to defraud the bank's creditors.

Gruetter and Joers answered, and averred that Stuart made the transfer of stock to them with full knowledge of the failing condition and insolvency of the bank, in anticipation of its approaching suspension, and with the intent to defraud the bank, its depositors and creditors, of the security afforded to such depositors and creditors, by law, and render it impossible to enforce his liability as a shareholder; also, that Stuart, with the knowledge and intent stated, represented and warranted to them that the bank was in a safe and solvent *condition, and that its stock was reasonably [5 worth $125 per share, or $18,000 in all. They also filed a cross bill against the receiver and Stuart in which the relief sought was a decree declaring the transfer of the stock standing in the name of Stuart to be fraudulent and void as against them, as well as against the receiver and the creditors of the bank, and adjudging that Stuart make full restitution to them of the amount at which such stock was received on the contract for the purchase of the real property sold and conveyed to him.

The decree in the circuit court recited—though not in the form of a finding of facts—that on and prior to January 3, 1893, Stuart was the owner of and had standing in his name upon the books of the bank the shares of stock above mentioned; that on or about December 16, 1892, and for more than eight years prior to that date, he was a member of the board of directors and of the finance committee of the bank; that on both of the above dates he had knowledge of its then existing insolvency; that at the time of the transfer of the stock he represented to Gruetter and Joers that the bank was in a solvent and prosperous condition, and that such representation was made for the purpose of inducing them to purchase the stock, and of evading and escaping his liability as a shareholder for an assessment thereon. It was then ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the sale, assignment, and transfer of the one hundred and fifty shares of stock of the Capital National Bank was wholly void as against the receiver and Gruetter and Joers; that the sale, assignment, and transfer be set aside, canceled, and held for naught; that the stock be reinstated upon the books of the bank in the name of Stuart, who was declared to be the holder and owner thereof; that Stuart, within twenty days from the date of the decree, pay to the receiver the full amount of the assessment against the stock, and that the receiver recover from him the sum of $15,000, together with interest at the rate of 7 per cent per annum, from the 10th day of July, 1893, being in the aggregate the sum of sixteen thousand, eight hundred and seventy-five and $\frac{49}{100}$ dollars; that Stuart, *within [6 twenty days from the date of the decree, make full restitution and payment to Gruetter and Joers of the amount of the purchase price of the stock, to wit, the sum of $18,000, together with interest thereon at the rate of 7 per cent per annum, from the 3d day of January, 1893, being in the aggregate the sum of $20,905; that Gruetter and Joers be relieved from all liability to the receiver for and on account of any assessment on the stock, and in case Stuart neglected to pay each of the aforesaid sums of money, together with the costs of the suit, to be taxed by the clerk, that execution should issue therefor.

Upon appeal to the circuit court of appeals the decree was reversed, without cost to either party, and the cause was remanded with instructions to enter a decree declaring the transfer of stock from Stuart to Gruetter and Joers to be fraudulent and voidable as to the receiver of the bank; that the receiver recover of Stuart the assessment made upon him, with costs; and that Gruetter and Joers were not entitled to relief against Stuart in this suit, and their cross bill should be dismissed with costs to Stuart. 36 U. S. App. 462. In the opinion of that court it is stated that the evidence justified the conclusion reached by the circuit court as to the facts.

From the decree of the circuit court of appeals the present appeals have been prosecuted.

The shares of the capital stock of a national bank are transferable on its books in such manner as may be prescribed by the by-laws or articles of the association, and everyone becoming a shareholder by such transfer succeeds, in proportion to his shares, to all the rights and liabilities of the prior holder. Rev. Stat. § 5139.

It is also provided by statute that "the shareholders of every national banking association shall be held individually responsible, equally and ratably, and not one for another, for all contracts, debts, and engagements of such association, to the extent of the amount of their stock therein, at the par value thereof, in addition to the amount invested in such shares." Rev. Stat. § 5151.

7] *The principal inquiry in this case is whether Stuart transferred his stock to Gruetter & Joers in order to escape the liability imposed by statute upon shareholders of national banking associations. His contention is that if the transfer was absolute and to persons who were at the time solvent and able to respond to an assessment upon the shares, the motive with which the transfer was made is of no consequence.

This construction of the statute seems to find some support in the general language used in a few cases. But it will be found upon examination that those cases were dealt with upon the basis that the facts therein showed not only an intent upon the part of the shareholder to escape liability by transferring his stock, but that the transfer was either colorable or to a person who was financially irresponsible at the time of such transfer. There is no case in which this court has held that the intent with which the shareholder got rid of his stock was of no consequence; certainly, no case in which the intent was held to be immaterial, when coupled with knowledge or reasonable belief upon the part of the transferrer that the bank was insolvent or in a failing condition.

In Germania National Bank v. Case, 99 U. S. 628, 631, 632 [25: 448-450], this court, speaking by Mr. Justice Strong, said that while a shareholder of the stock of a corporation had, generally, a right to transfer his shares, and thereby disconnect himself from the corporation, and from responsibility on account of it, there were limits to that right; that it is not every transfer that releases a stockholder from his responsibility as such; and that "a transfer for the mere purpose of avoiding his liability to the company or its creditors is fraudulent and void, and he remains still liable." And in Pauly v. State Loan & Trust Company, 165 U. S. 606, 619 [41: 844, 849], where the previous cases in this court were reviewed, it was held to have been established that "if the real owner of the shares [of a national banking association] transfers them to another person, or causes them to be placed on the books of the association in the name of another person, with the intent simply to evade the responsibility imposed by § 5151 on shareholders of national banking *associations, such owner may be [8 treated, for the purposes of that section, as a shareholder, and liable as therein prescribed."

The safety of a national banking association, so far as its creditors are concerned, depends largely upon the security given by the statutory provision entitling creditors to look to the individual liability of shareholders, including the liability of the estates and funds in the hands of executors, guardians, and trustees holding shares of national bank stock. § 5152. One who holds such shares—the bank being at the time insolvent—cannot escape the individual liability imposed by the statute by transferring his stock with intent simply to avoid that liability, knowing or having reason to believe, at the time of the transfer on the books of the bank (Richmond v. Irons, 121 U. S. 27, 58 [30: 864, 874]), that it is insolvent or about to fail. A transfer with such intent and under such circumstances is a fraud upon the creditors of the bank, and may be treated by the receiver as inoperative between the transferrer and himself, and the former held liable as a shareholder without reference to the financial condition of the transferee. The right of creditors of a national bank to look to the individual liability of shareholders, to the extent indicated by the statute, for its contracts, debts, and engagements, attaches when the bank becomes insolvent, and the shareholder cannot, by transferring his stock, require creditors to surrender this security as to him, and compel the receiver and creditors to look to the person to whom his stock has been transferred. This court has said that "the individual liability of the stockholders is an essential element in the contract by which the stockholders became members of the corporation. It is voluntarily entered into by subscribing for and accepting shares of stock. Its obligation becomes a part of every contract, debt, and engagement of the bank itself, as much so as if they were made directly by the stockholder instead of by the corporation. There is nothing in the statute to indicate that the obligation arising upon these undertakings and promises should not have the same force and effect, and be as binding in all respects, as any other contracts of the individual stockholders." Richmond v. Irons, 121 U. S. 27, 55, 56 [30: 864, 873, 874]. If the bank be solvent 9] *at the time of the transfer, that is, able to meet its existing contracts, debts, and engagements, the motive with which the transfer is made is, of course, immaterial. But if the bank be insolvent, the receiver may, at least, without suing the transferee and litigating the question of his liability, look to those shareholders who, knowing or having reason to know, at the time, that the bank was insolvent, got rid of their stock in order to escape the individual liability to which the statute subjected them. Whether—the bank being in fact insolvent—the transferrer is liable to be treated as a shareholder, in respect of its existing contracts, debts, and engagements, if he believed in good faith, at the time of transfer, that the bank was solvent, is a question which, in the view we take of the present case, need not be discussed; although he may be so treated even when acting in good faith, if the transfer is to one who is financially irresponsible.

The intent with which an act was done may be proved by the declarations of the party concerned, or by facts and circumstances from which the existence of the intent may be reasonably inferred.

Stuart, both in his answer, and as a witness in his own behalf, denies that the sale of his stock was with the view of escaping his liability as a shareholder. He states, also, that it was an ordinary business transaction, and so far from knowing at the time that the bank was insolvent, he believed it to be solvent and able to meet its liabilities of every kind.

But the contention of the receiver was sustained by the proof in the cause. It was in evidence that Stuart, for some time previous to the sale of his stock, had been dissatisfied with the conduct of Mosher, the president of the bank. In addition to the latter's duties as president he was in enterprises that required much attention and which must have interfered with the proper supervision of the affairs of the bank. He was connected with a manufacturing company, an insurance company, and a gas company; was interested in a company engaged in the making of staves in Arkansas; was in the skating rink business, and also in the baseball business. In addition, he had a 10] penitentiary contract, *and was a legislative lobbyist. All this was well known to Stuart when he sold his stock to Gruetter & Joers. Before that transaction, he had received an "intimation" that the next general dividend would be passed. He also had information that a large amount of the bank's money was "locked up" in real estate, and invested in worthless securities. And he was in a position to ascertain, with at least reasonable certainty, the condition of the bank at or before the sale of his stock to Gruetter & Joers. As a director he signed each of the reports made to the Controller of the Currency of the condition of the bank at the close of business on September 25, 1891, December 2, 1891, March 1, 1892, May 17, 1892, and September 30, 1892. He did not sign the report of December 9, 1892. In addition his membership of the finance committee of the bank gave him peculiar facilities to ascertain how the bank's money was being used by its president. And that he had information that made him somewhat uneasy about the condition of the bank, and its management by Mosher, is shown by his own testimony as well as by his declarations to witnesses, whose intelligence and truthfulness are not impeached by anything in the record, except the denial by Stuart that he said just what those witnesses testified that he did say. Nor is this negatived by the circumstance that Stuart and his wife had each $1,250 on deposit in the bank at the time its doors were closed. That may be accounted for by the fact, admitted by him, that he did not expect the bank to fail so soon.

When the bank failed, Mrs. King, the wife of Dr. S. H. King, had $26,105.80 on deposit there. The first intimation she received of the failure was a statement in a morning paper that the bank had closed its doors. She hurried to the residence of Stuart to ascertain what was the matter with the bank. Her account of the interview with him was as follows: "I told him the Doctor had sent me there for him to tell me about the bank, what the condition had been, and if there was anything wrong, and he sat down, and in his good, quiet way told me he did not like the way the bank had been doing for a long time. He said he did not like their going into the *Western Manufacturing [11 Company business, and he said he had a talk with Mr. Mosher about it, and he said he did not like the Arkansas business, and I asked him what that was, and he said it was a stave business, and he said he did not know of any loss of money in it, but he did not like it, and he said from that they went into the skating-rink business, and he said then he felt mad, and he said this is not banking, and I told them so, and then he said, when they went into the baseball business, I said it must be stopped; that we must stop that and do a banking business, and not run after these outside affairs, and, as near as I can give it, he said they were mad, but he told them if they did not stop that kind of business he would get out. Q. Who do you mean by them? A. Mosher and Outcalt [the cashier]; and he said one of them swore very badly and used bad language, and he said particularly Mosher, and at this time I said that the Doctor has gone to see Mosher about it, and he said if he has not gone you tell him to go to Outcalt, because he can get the truth out of Outcalt better than Mosher. And I said, Professor, [Stuart] what is the condition of the bank? Why is it closed? He says, I have known for quite a while that they had some bad debts, such as very poor paper there, amounting to about $136,000, and he says, I did not like the way they were doing. They could not do outside business and that too, and I did not like it. And, of course, anybody who knows Professor Stuart knows that would not be the way of his doing business, and he said he was in hopes they would tide it over, and he said they had some very poor paper, and he spoke of some land in a different county, and at that Mrs. Stuart came in, and he says you know I have sold out—which I had not known—and he said, well, he had traded his stock for the Gruetter building a short time before. At this juncture Mrs. Stuart came into the room, and she says, 'It don't let you out from being responsible, does it? How long has it been?' Oh, no, he says, and then he spoke about the board of directors."

Being asked to state any further conversation she had with Stuart the same morning in reference to the bank and its condition, the witness proceeded: "He went on and told me 12]*about it, he said he had not liked the management of the bank, and felt anxious about it, and I asked him how long, and he said a long time; and he went on and repeated again what he said before about going off into side business and said he did not like their not being able to declare a dividend, and I asked him this question. I asked him why the bank was not closed in the condition it was, and asked him if he did not know that the bank's capital was impaired, and he said that it was; still he did not know, he said, about having the bank closed. And I asked if the bank had been closed we could have gotten something out of the bank, and he said he was in hopes they could tide it over, and Mrs. Stuart says, Professor, you did not expect this so soon."

Henry Gerner, a witness for the plaintiff, and a stockholder in the bank, stated that he had a conversation with Stuart before the failure of the bank as to the sale of his stock to Gruetter & Joers. Being asked to state that conversation, he said:

"Well, one afternoon I met the Professor, which was an almost daily occurrence, if I did not see him in the bank I met him on the street, and we passed the compliments of the day and some remarks, and one day in one of our conversations and talks he told me that he was contemplating making a real-estate deal. I said 'yes,' 'yes;' he says he had a proposition made him to purchase the Gruetter block down here, and it was a trade, and he said if he made the trade at all, it would be trading his bank stock and some money and assuming their liabilities, their obligations, a mortgage on the building for $30,000. I told him I thought it was rather an exorbitant price for the property; that I did not consider the building worth any such money, to which he responded that they were going to make a very good lease; they would take it for ten years—a ten years' lease on the premises at a rental of $6,000 a year. I told him I did not think it was possible for those men in the business to pay any such rent, it was too risky. Well, the Professor replied, we have to take some risk. Well, I said, I should rather, if I was in your place hold my stock and my interest in the bank. I think it is 13]better or *safer. He said he did not like the way they were doing business, he did not like the style, and a large share of the bank's capital was tied up in real estate and there was no prospect of dividends, and he preferred to do his own business and manage his own affairs. That is all there was to that conversation. Q. Did you have any subsequent conversation with him about the matter? A. Well, yes. I guess it was after he made the trade, either he told me about it or I took occasion to remark, I see you made that trade, Professor. Yes, he says, I did; he says, as I told you before I don't like Mosher and Outcalt's ways of doing business, and I shall prefer to manage my own affairs hereafter. Q. Did he, in any conversation you had with him, say anything about the amount of the capital stock of the bank that was tied up in real estate? A. Yes, some 130 or 140 thousand dollars, about 140,000 he said was tied up. Q. Do you remember about the time when the last dividend of the bank was returned? A. It was a dividend of 4 per cent declared in July, 1892; that is the last dividend I was credited with. Q. Did you have any talk with the respondent, A. P. S. Stuart, as to whether a dividend would be returned the 1st of January, 1893, or for the close of the year 1892? A. Well, only this, the Professor told me that in all probability there would be no dividend declared in January, owing to the fact that a large amount of the bank's capital was tied up in real estate, and until the amount was reduced and property converted into cash the bank could not pay any dividend."

His cross-examination was as follows: "Q. You say, Mr. Gerner, that he said he did not like the way that Mosher and Outcalt did the business. Did he give you in detail the management of that business he objected to, or was that the sum total of his remarks, that he did not like the way they did business? A. He says, oh, yes, he made comments on Mosher's being in so many things and having so many irons in the fire and paying too much attention to outside matters. As to Outcalt, I do not know whether the Professor made any comments on his conduct or not. Q. And the reason he gave you at that time for getting out was because he wanted *to manage his own[14 business, and he did not like the way they managed the business? A. He did not like the way they conducted the business."

Without referring to other facts and circumstances disclosed by the record, it is sufficient to say that the circuit court was justified by the evidence in finding that Stuart, with knowledge of the insolvency of the bank, or at all events with such knowledge of facts as reasonably justified the belief that insolvency existed or was impending, sold and transferred his stock with the intent to escape the individual liability which the statute imposed upon shareholders of national banks for their contracts, debts, and engagements. And the bank having been, in fact, insolvent at the time of the transfer of his stock—which fact is not disputed—he remained, notwithstanding such transfer, and as between the receiver and himself, a shareholder, subject to the individual liability imposed by § 5151. We will add, that as the circuit court and the circuit court of appeals agreed as to what were the ultimate facts established by the evidence, this court should accept their view as to the facts unless it clearly appeared that they erred as to the effect of the evidence. Morewood v. Enequist, 64 U. S. 23 How. 491 [16: 516]; The Ship Marcellus [Baxter v. Camp], 66 U. S. 1 Black, 414, 417 [17: 217, 218]; Dravo v. Fabel, 132 U. S. 487, 490 [33: 421, 422]; Compania de Navigacion la Flecha v. Brauer, 168 U. S. 104, 123 [ante, 398, 406].

In reference to the appeal by Gruetter & Joers but little need be said. The circuit court of appeals correctly held that the cross bill of Gruetter & Joers attempted to bring into this suit a new and independent controversy, in which the receiver of the bank had no interest, and which could be determined upon facts not material to the issue between the original plaintiff and Stuart. The circuit court of appeals also held the cross suit to be objectionable upon additional and, we think, entirely sufficient grounds. Judge Sanborn, speaking for that court, said: "The supposed cross bill utterly fails to state a case for rescission, because it does not show that Gruetter & Joers ever returned to Stuart the $19,500 in cash which they received from this trade, or that they 15]ever released Stuart *from his agreement to pay the mortgage of $30,000 upon the property they conveyed. They could not rescind this trade and recover back that which they gave in exchange, or any part of it, while they retained at least $49,500 in value that they had received from it. The proof, if it were possible, is more fatal to them than the pleading. The record discloses the fact that they made their election and chose to affirmatively ratify this transaction more than a year before they filed this bill for its rescission. It shows that on January 23, 1893, they brought an action at law against Stuart in one of the courts in the state of Nebraska to recover of him damages to the amount of $18,000 for his fraudulent misrepresentation of the value of this stock at the time of the trade. This was in effect an action for a part of the purchase price of the real estate which they had conveyed, although it was in form an action for deceit. It could be brought and maintained on the ground that the sale or trade of the real estate was valid and its title was vested in Stuart, and on no other theory. That suit is still pending. It was a distinct and affirmative ratification of the transfer of this stock and the conveyance of the real estate, after full knowledge of all the facts, and it barred Gruetter & Joers of all right to rescind the trade thereafter. The result is that all that portion of the decree which grants to Gruetter & Joers any relief against the appellant Stuart was wrong."

The decree of the Court of Appeals is affirmed, but without prejudice to the prosecution of any claim that Gruetter & Joers may have against Stuart arising out of the transactions between them. Affirmed.

FREDERICK S. PASSAVANT et al., Composing the Firm of Passavant & Co.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 16-26.)

Board of general appraisers—estimate of dutiable value—market value.

1. In proceedings brought before the board of general appraisers by protests, under the act of June 10, 1890, § 14, to review the collector's decisions upon the entries of imported merchandise, the board has jurisdiction to inquire into and impeach the dutiable valuations reported to the collector by the appraiser upon which the collector assessed the rate of duty to which the merchandise was subject.
2. A German duty which is a tax by the German government on merchandise sold by the manufacturers thereof for consumption or sale in German markets, but is remitted when the merchandise is purchased in bond, or consigned while in bond for exportation, may be lawfully included by the appraiser in his estimate of dutiable value under the act of June 10, 1890.
3. The laws of this country in the assessment of duties proceed upon the market value in the exporting country, and not upon that market value less such remission or amelioration as that country chooses to allow in accordance with its own views of public policy.

Argued December 1, 1897. Decided January 3, 1898.

ON A CERTIFICATE from the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit certifying certain questions for the decision of this court in an action brought by the United States in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York, which court affirmed the decision of the board of general appraisers reversing the decision of the collector as to the dutiable valuation upon imported merchandise. Questions answered in the affirmative.

Statement by Mr. Chief Justice Fuller:

This case came to this court on the following certificate from the United States circuit court of appeals for the second circuit:

"A judgment or decree of the circuit court of the United States for the southern district of New York having been made and entered on the 30th day of January, 1895, by which it was ordered, adjudged, and decreed that there is no error in certain proceedings before the board of United States general appraisers in this cause and that their decision therein be, and the same hereby is, in all things affirmed; and an appeal having been taken from said judgment or decree to this court by the above-named appellants, and the cause having come on for hearing and argument in this court, certain questions of law arose concerning which this court desires the instructions of the Supreme Court of the United States for the proper decision of said cause.

"The facts from which said questions arise are herewith submitted and certified as follows:

"1. Certain merchandise, consisting of cotton velvets, was imported from the empire of Germany into the port of New *York by[17 the appellees in various steamers between May 22, 1891, and March 13, 1892, and was entered at the customhouse and appraised by the appraiser.

"2. The merchandise was originally imported into Germany in the gray, and was subjected to processes of dyeing and finishing, and was put in bond in that country.

"3. The collector classified the merchandise for duty under paragraph 350 of the tariff act

NOTE.—As to lien of United States for duties, see note to United States v. 350 Chests of Tea, 6: 702.

As to action to recover back duties paid under protest; protest, how made, and its effect,—see note to Greely v. Thompson, 13: 397.

of October 1, 1890, at 20 per cent ad valorem and 14 cents per square yard, and assessed the said rates of duty upon the dutiable value of the merchandise decided by the appraiser and reported by him to the collector.

"4. The merchandise was of a description provided for eo nomine in said paragraph 350, and was properly classified for duty under that section.

"5. The invoices stated certain prices as the net invoice value of this merchandise. The invoices stated also certain additional sums, under the heading 'German duty.'

"6. This German duty is a tax which is imposed by the German government on the merchandise when it is sold by the manufacturers thereof for consumption or sale in the markets of Germany, but when the merchandise is purchased in bond, or consigned while in bond, for exportation to a foreign country, this duty is remitted by the German government, and is called 'bonification of tax,' as distinguished from being refunded as a rebate.

"7. This German duty or tax is the amount of the duty levied by the German tariff upon the goods when consumed in Germany. It is collected when the finished product goes into consumption in Germany, but is remitted when the finished product is sold in bond for exportation.

"8. The merchandise can be purchased in bond for exportation in the principal markets of Germany at the net invoice price and without paying the so-called German duty. The merchandise involved in this action was so purchased for exportation.

"9. In estimating and appraising the actual market value and wholesale price of such mer-[18]chandise at the time of exportation *to the United States in the principal markets of the country from whence imported, the appraiser decided that the dutiable value of such merchandise equalled the sums of the net invoice value and the German duty added together, and reported to the collector this decision as to the dutiable value of the merchandise appraised.

"10. In estimating this dutiable value the local appraiser added as an element of dutiable value to the net invoice value these amounts specified in the invoices and entries under the name of 'German duty.' Such amounts had been included by the importers in their entries under duress, to avoid threatened penalties under the law.

"11. The importers did not call for any reappraisement of the merchandise, but within ten days after the liquidation by the collector of each entry, and the assessment by him of the rates of duty aforesaid upon the dutiable valuation so reported to him by the appraiser, filed protests under § 14 of the act of June 10, 1890, against the decisions of the collector, of which the following protest is one, to which the others are similar:

[Here followed the protest.]

"12. The board of United States general appraisers, acting upon said protests, reversed the decisions of the collector on the ground that the so-called German duty was not a lawful element of dutiable value.

"13. Thereupon the collector applied to the circuit court of the United States for the southern district of New York by petition praying for review of said decision by the board pursuant to § 15 of the act of June 10, 1890, and the said circuit court upon said petition ordered the board of United States general appraisers to return to the circuit court the record and the evidence taken by them, together with a certified statement of the facts involved in the case and their decision thereon, and the said board of general appraisers thereafter made such return; and the circuit court affirmed the decision of the board as aforesaid.

"14. It is admitted that Frederick S. Passavant, Karl Kotzenberg, William Sandhagen, Heinrich Meyer, Arthur W. *Watson, and [19] Oscar Passavant, the importers, are the persons composing the firm of Passavant & Company.

"Upon the foregoing facts, this court, for the proper decision of said cause, desires instruction upon the questions of law following:

"(1) In proceedings brought before the board of general appraisers by protests, under section fourteen (14) of the act of June 10, 1890, to review the collector's decisions upon the entries in this case, had the board jurisdiction to inquire into and impeach the dutiable valuation so reported to the collector by the appraiser, as above stated, and upon which the collector assessed the rate of duty to which the merchandise was lawfully subject?

"(2) If the first question is answered in the affirmative, was the 'German duty' lawfully included by the appraiser in his estimate of dutiable value?"

Mr. John K. Richards, Solicitor General, for appellant.

Mr. Edwin B. Smith for appellees.

The 13th section of the customs administrative act of June 10, 1890 (26 Stat. at L. 131, chap. 407), relates solely to the appraisement of imported merchandise, and declares that the decision of the board of general appraisers, when invoked as provided, "shall be final and conclusive as to the dutiable value of such merchandise," and directs the collector to ascertain, fix, and liquidate the rate and amount of duties to be paid on such merchandise, and the dutiable cost and charges thereon.

Section 14 provides that the decision of the collector as to the "rate and amount of duties, . . . including all dutiable cost and charges, and as to all fees and exactions of whatever character (except duties on tonnage), shall be final and conclusive," unless the importer protests and appeals to *the board of general [20] appraisers. This section clearly allows and provides for an appeal by the importer from the decision of the collector, as to both rate and amount of duties, as well as dutiable costs and charges, and as to all fees and exactions.

By § 15 it is provided that "if the . . . importer, . . . or the collector . . . shall be dissatisfied with the decision of the board of general appraisers, as provided for in § 14 of this act, as to the construction of the law and the facts respecting the classification of such merchandise and the rate of duty imposed thereon under such classification, they or either of them, may . . . apply to the circuit court . . . for a review of the questions of law and fact involved in such decision."

In United States v. Klingenburg, 153 U. S. 93, 102 [38: 647, 650], it was said by Mr. Justice Jackson, speaking for the court: "The right of review by the circuit court is coextensive with the right of appeal to the board as to all matters except the dutiable value of the imported merchandise, as to which the decision of the board of general appraisers is by § 13 made conclusive. Now, by § 14 of the act, if the decision of the collector imposes an excessive amount of duties, under an improper construction of the law, the importer may take an appeal to the board of general appraisers, whose decision on such questions is not made conclusive as it is in respect to the dutiable value of the merchandise, and, not being conclusive, it is subject to review under the express provisions of § 15."

The purpose of § 13 is to afford the importer or collector the right to call for a reappraisement by a general appraiser or a board of general appraisers, to review the decision of the local appraiser or a general appraiser as to the correct amount of the dutiable value of the merchandise, and is distinct and separate from the remedy by protest.

Under § 7 the collector is to determine for himself the question of what is the invoice value of the goods, and, in doing this, he may add such charges as he considers to be dutiable, but his decision in this respect is not in the nature of an appraisement, and may be attacked [21] by protest. And *while the general rule is that the valuation is conclusive upon all parties, nevertheless the appraisement is subject to be impeached where the appraiser or collector has proceeded on a wrong principle contrary to law or has transcended the powers conferred by statute. Oberteuffer v. Robertson, 116 U. S. 499 [29: 706]; Badger v. Cusimano, 130 U. S. 39 [32: 851]; Robertson v. Frank Brothers Co. 132 U. S. 17 [33: 236]; Erhardt v. Schroeder, 155 U. S. 124 [39: 94]; Muser v. Magone, 155 U. S. 240 [39: 135].

These decisions were made under prior similar legislation as to the finality of the appraisement, and when an action against the collector was provided by § 3011 of the Revised Statutes as the remedy for an illegal exaction of duties. Section 3011 was repealed by the act of June 10, 1890, and in Schoenfeld v. Hendricks, 152 U. S. 691 [38: 601], it was held that such an action could not be maintained, as it was not authorized by statute, and would not lie at common law because the money was required to be paid into the treasury by § 3010, so that the importers were remitted to the remedies provided in the latter act. Whether the dutiable value in this case was erroneously increased by the unauthorized addition of an independent item to the market value, as asserted by the importers, was a question of law, and properly carried to the board of general appraisers by protest and appeal.

We think that § 14 furnishes the means of redress for illegal action, and that the board of general appraisers has the same power under this section to inquire into the legality of an assessment as it has under § 13 to see whether or not the valuation is excessive or insufficient through an error of judgment.

The first question must, therefore, be answered in the affirmative.

By § 19 of the act it is provided "that whenever imported merchandise is subject to an ad valorem rate of duty, or to a duty based upon or regulated in any manner by the value thereof, the duty shall be assessed upon the actual market value or wholesale price of such merchandise as bought and sold in usual wholesale quantities, at the time *of ex- [22] portation to the United States, in the principal markets of the country from whence imported, and in the condition in which such merchandise is there bought and sold for exportation to the United States, or consigned to the United States for sale, including the value of all cartons, cases, crates, boxes, sacks, and coverings of any kind, and all other costs, charges, and expenses incident to placing the merchandise in condition, packed ready for shipment to the United States."

By § 10 it is made the duty of the appraisers "by all reasonable ways and means in his or their power to ascertain, estimate, and appraise (any invoice or affidavit thereto or statement of cost, or of cost of production to the contrary notwithstanding) the actual market value and wholesale price of the merchandise at the time of exportation to the United States, in the principal markets of the country whence the same has been imported, and the number of yards, parcels, or quantities, and actual market value or wholesale price of every of them, as the case may require."

Was the action of the appraiser lawful in treating the so-called German duty as an element of value in determining the actual market value or wholesale price of these cotton velvets, at the time of exportation, in the principal markets of Germany?

What was to be ascertained was the actual market value or wholesale price of the merchandise as bought and sold in usual wholesale quantities at the time of exportation, in the principal markets of the country from whence imported. This market value or price was the price in Germany and not the price after leaving that country, and the act does not contemplate two prices or two market values.

The certificate of facts states that the German duty is imposed on merchandise when "sold by the manufacturers thereof for consumption or sale in the markets of Germany;" and "is collected when the finished product goes into consumption in Germany." As the tax accrues when the manufacturer sells, his wholesale price includes it, and the purchaser who buys these cotton velvets in wholesale quantities in the German markets pays a price covering the tax, *and that is the price for [23] the merchandise when bought and sold in those markets.

Doubtless, to encourage exportation and the introduction of German goods into other markets, the German government could remit, or refund the tax, pay a bonus, or allow a drawback.

And it is found that in respect to these goods when "purchased in bond, or consigned while in bond, for exportation to a foreign country, this duty is remitted by the German government, and is called 'bonification of tax,' as distinguished from being refunded as a rebate." The use of the word "bonification" does not change the character of this remission. It is a special advantage extended by the government in aid of manufacturers and trade, having the same effect as a bonus or drawback. To use one of the definitions of drawback, it is "a device resorted to for enabling a commodity affected by taxes to be exported and sold in the foreign market on the same terms as if it had not been taxed at all."

But the laws of this country in the assessment of duties proceed upon the market value in the exporting country and not upon that market value less such remission or amelioration as the country chooses to allow in accordance with its own views of public policy.

Muser v. Magone, 155 U. S. 240 [39: 135], is quite in point. In that case the appraisement was attacked on the ground that certain items or elements of value had been illegally added to and included in the dutiable value. The imported goods were cotton embroideries. The cloth was purchased in the gray by the importers at Manchester; sent to St. Gall, Switzerland, where the embroideries were finished; and thence exported to the United States. The importers owned the plant at St. Gall. The entered value of the goods was raised by the appraisers, and the importers protested for the reasons that commissions and nondutiable charges had been illegally included in the market value; that the goods should have been appraised at their actual market value when in the gray, adding the cost of finishing and laundering them; and on other grounds; the protest being particularly 24]directed to the*alleged illegality of the valuation because one of the constituent elements of the value as found was illegally included. The appraisement was held conclusive in the absence of fraud, and this court, among other things, said:

"The question was not whether through the special advantages which Muser Brothers enjoyed the actual cost to them may have been less than what was decided to be the actual dutiable value of their goods, for the latter was determined by the general market value and wholesale price of all goods of the same description. . . . The issue made by the protest was that the valuation was illegal because including certain specified incidental expenses (one or more of them), as for designs, salary of buyer, clerk hire, rent, interest, and percentage on aggregate cost. Upon the theory of an ascertainable market value at St. Gall, these were matters to be considered and in a sense included, but not in the sense of substantive items independent of market value added thereto to make dutiable value. . . . The course of business at St. Gall in respect of these embroideries was peculiar, and to reach a result, in estimating the value, required the consideration of many elements making up the amount which actually represented the pecuniary basis of transactions. How these various elements impressed the general appraiser, and what grounds influenced or controlled his mental processes, were matters in respect of which he could not be interrogated, since his decision, when approved by the collector, was final and could not be reviewed and the verdict of a jury substituted. . . . The adjudication was of true market value and did not consist in taking market value and adding the cost and charges specified in § 2907 in order to get at dutiable value." United States v. Kenworthy, 28 U. S. App. 450.

As the question in this case was what was the general market value and wholesale price of cotton velvets, as bought and sold in the principal markets of Germany, the fact that the German duty was not in fact paid on such goods when exported is immaterial. Exoneration from its payment was a mere special advantage extended by the German government, *as we have said, in promotion of manu- [25 factures and commerce. The appraiser found, as matter of fact, that the market value in Germany was equal to the invoice price plus the home duty, but he did not therefore include that item as a substantive item independent of the market value, and add it thereto to make dutiable value, though in ascertaining the market value in Germany he properly recognized the fact that that duty formed part of the purchase price in the markets of that country.

The second question must also be answered in the affirmative.

The answers indicated above will be so certified.

Mr. Justice Brown dissenting:

I concur in the opinion of the court that the first question requires an affirmative answer, but I think that the second question should be answered in the negative. In estimating the dutiable value of goods the collector added to the net invoice value what is known as the German duty, which was never paid, and which formed no part of the "market value or wholesale price" of these goods. It does not appear what proportion of this class of goods was imported into Germany for exportation, as distinguished from those imported for consumption, but it clearly appears that there were two entirely distinct and separate prices: one of which was paid for the goods for exportation, and the other for consumption. It seems a great hardship that the defendants, Passavant & Company, should be charged with a price which they did not pay and which was no part of the value of the goods as they were purchased by them in Germany. If there be, in fact, two wholesale prices for these goods in the same markets, I know of no reason why the collector should not recognize this fact and charge the importer with that one of the wholesale prices which he actually paid, and for which others under the same circumstances could obtain the goods.

The construction given to the statute by the court is unnecessary, *and the effect is to[26 increase the cost of the article to the consumer by adding to the price the amount of a tax in fact not paid by the importer. For aught that appears in this record, the sales for exportation may have been ten times as great as those for domestic consumption, and we do not understand why the prices realized in the latter sales should be arbitrarily selected by the government as the actual market value or wholesale price of the articles.

I am authorized to state that Mr. Justice Peckham concurs in this dissent.

MARGARET HETZEL, to the Use of Theodore Bacon, Trustee, Plff. in Err.,
v.
BALTIMORE & OHIO RAILROAD COMPANY.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 26-39.)

Sufficiency of declaration—erroneous instruction—unnecessary recital—rights in an alley—damages for occupation of a street—amount of damages.

1. Damages to any part of the land may be recovered under a declaration claiming for injuries to an entire original lot which was in fact divided into sublots, all owned by the plaintiff.
2. An instruction that the testimony shows that plaintiff undertook to sell land as a whole is error as implying that it was not put on the market for sale except as a whole, where there is evidence that it was offered in parcels or as a whole, and, indeed, "in any way."
3. An unnecessary recital that plaintiff had been prevented from selling land, made in a declaration for injuries thereto, does not restrict the recovery to damages for the prevention of any particular sale.
4. Alleys which, by provisions of a deed of partition, are to be under the control of all the owners of property thereon, and not closed unless by common consent, may be closed by one who becomes the owner of all the lots thereon.
5. Damages equivalent to the injury done may be recovered for an inexcusable and persistent occupation and use of a public street in violation of law and in disregard of the rights of the owner of the adjacent property.
6. Absolute certainty as to the damages sustained need not be shown, but all that the law requires is that such damages be allowed as in the judgment of fair men directly and naturally result from the injury for which suit is brought.

Argued November 9, 1897. Decided January 3, 1898.

IN ERROR to the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia to review a judgment of that court affirming the judgment of the Supreme Court of that District in favor of the plaintiff, Margaret Hetzel, to the use, etc., for nominal damages, without costs, in an action brought against the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company, defendant, for the unlawful obstruction of a street in the city of Washington. Reversed, and cause remanded with directions for a new trial, and for further proceedings.

See same case below, 7 App. D. C. 529.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Walter D. Davidge and Frank W. Hackett for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. George E. Hamilton and M. J. Colbert for defendant in error.

Mr. Justice Harlan delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought by the plaintiff in error to recover damages alleged to have been sustained in consequence of the unlawful obstruction by the defendant in error of D street in the city of Washington.

The jury having been instructed that the plaintiff could not recover anything more than nominal damages returned a verdict for 1 cent; and for that amount judgment was entered in her favor, but without costs. And that judgment was affirmed in the court of appeals of the District.

The declaration alleged that the plaintiff was seised in fee of a certain lot of land on the corner of D and North Capitol streets in the city of Washington, "being lot numbered 1 in square 630," and that the defendant on the 24th day of April, 1873, and thereafter at divers other times, had wrongfully, unlawfully, and injuriously obstructed that street, by placing thereon freight cars, in large numbers, and suffering the same to remain unreasonably long; by loading and unloading freight in the street; by using the street for the general purposes of a freight yard; by blocking the way with wagons and carts for the loading and unloading of freight—the result being that the plaintiff, as well as the public, was prevented from passing and repassing on D street, and more particularly from using that portion of it on which plaintiff's lot abuts to gain access to or exit from her land; and that the defendant still obstructs the street in the manner stated, whereby it has "materially and seriously diminished the value of said land and prevented the plaintiff from selling the same, though she tried so to do."

*The plaintiff brought a suit in April, [28 1873, to recover damages for this obstruction, and obtained a judgment, which was paid. The present suit covers the period of three years from April, 1873. The declaration in the two suits was the same, except that in the present action the declaration contains the additional words "and prevented the plaintiff from selling the same, though she tried so to do."

In the present action the defendant pleaded: 1. Not guilty. 2. That the plaintiff's alleged cause of action did not accrue within three years before the institution of this suit. 3. That the plaintiff ought not to have or maintain her suit, because at a former term of the court she recovered judgment against the defendant in the sum of $843.86 in a suit at law for the same identical cause of action, which judgment was satisfied. Upon these pleas issue was joined in the usual form.

The bill of exceptions states that it was undisputed that the plaintiff owned unimproved land at the corner of D street northwest and North Capitol street in the city of Washington; that along the side of her premises, about where the sidewalk would be, the defendant maintained and used a railroad track for receiving and delivering freight; that the track stopped on D street, being a siding; that the street was occupied by freight cars on the track, and carts were backed against the cars, so that access to the plaintiff's premises on the street was destroyed.

It was conceded that the track was maintained on the street without authority of law.

At the trial below the plaintiff testified that she owned the entire lot numbered 1, in square 630; was joint owner with Judge Wylie in some 28,000 feet, but became sole owner in 1872; had not used the land since January, 1870, it being impossible to get upon it; had tried to sell it, but without success, persons wishing to buy saying that the position of the railroad rendered it useless to them; that there was no access to the land on D street except on foot, that the occupancy of the street by freight cars and the loading and unloading of freight was continuous during the entire period 29] covered by *the present suit; that during this period she made every possible effort to sell the land, having instructed real estate agents to sell or get an offer for purchase. She testified that the property was directed to be sold in any way that the agents could sell it, "to sell it or lease it or in any way to get people to build upon it;" and that she authorized its sale as one lot, but "never confined them to selling the whole." On cross-examination she said: "Of course, I gave them the whole lot to sell, but I did not forbid them to sell any part, and my instructions were to make some disposition of it, so that it could be utilized in some way; to lease it or sell it, in whole or in part, or in any way. I always told them I wanted to sell or lease the whole or any part of it, in order to get buildings put up on the front of it."

The plaintiff introduced the testimony of certain real-estate agents who had been authorized to sell the property, to the effect that the street was obstructed, that they took persons there to buy, who objected to purchasing because of the D street track; that they could readily have sold the lot for a certain price per foot, but for the obstruction of the track. She also produced the evidence "of experts as to the value of the land with the D-street track there and with that track removed."

It further appeared that an offer made for a part of the lot on the corner of D street was declined by the plaintiff because she did not choose to sell off a part, and two persons who had been authorized as agents to sell the property testified that they were instructed to sell lot one as an entirety, and were not permitted to sell in parcels.

The defendant put in evidence the record of conveyances disclosing the title, and tending to prove that the plaintiff and Judge Wylie had owned as tenants in common since 1855 all of original lot 1 except 35 feet 10 inches by a depth of 120 feet, which the latter owned in severalty; and that in December, 1871, they subdivided their holding into lots numbered from 1 to 11, with alleys, according to a plat dated January, 1872, which was put in evidence.

The plat here referred to was as follows:

Upon this plat were recorded the following words: "This is to certify that we have subdivided that part of lot 1 in square No. 630, owned jointly by us, into the lots as laid down in the above plat as lots 1 to 11, both inclusive, with the alleys for their accommodation, which alleys are exclusively for the sole benefit and use of said lots."

At the time of this subdivision Judge Wylie and the plaintiff executed a deed of partition which gave sublots 1 to 5 inclusive in severalty to the plaintiff and sublots from 6 to 11 inclusive to Judge Wylie in severalty, but did not convey the fee in the alleys. In January, 1872, Wylie conveyed to Tyler, and Tyler to the plaintiff, sublots 6 to 11 and that portion of original lot 1 (35 feet 10 inches front) just mentioned as not having been held by plaintiff and Wylie in common, but did not convey the alleys as such. Those deeds read: "Lots 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, and 11 being subdi-31] visions of lot 1, in square *No. 630, on the ground plan of said city, according to the metes and bounds, covenants and conditions set forth and described in the deed of partition, dated December 28, 1871, entered into by and between Andrew Wylie and Mary C., his wife, and the said Margaret Hetzel, and recorded with plat of subdivision annexed thereto; . . . also all that part of said lot 1 in said square No. 630, at the northeast corner thereof, fronting on North Capitol street 35 feet and 10 inches by a depth of 120 feet, together with all the improvements, ways, easements, rights, privileges, and appurtenances to the same belonging or in any wise appertaining, and all the remainders, reversions, rents, issues, and profits thereof, and all the estate, right, title, interest, claim, and demand whatsoever, whether at law or in equity, of the said party of the first part of, in, to, or out of the said piece or parcel of land and premises."

The partition deed above referred to contained the following among other clauses: "And the said parties Andrew Wylie and Margaret Hetzel do and each of them doth hereby mutually covenant and agree to and with each other as follows: That the said Margaret Hetzel, her heirs and assigns, shall have the right to erect any structure or building from lot number 1 on D street north over or across the alley entering from that street on condition that an open space of 10 feet in width and 12 feet in height shall at all times be kept clear for ingress and egress for the use of the other lots in the rear bounding on the alleys and area as designated in said plan. Also that the said Andrew Wylie, his heirs and assigns, being owner or owners of lots 8, 9, and 11 in said plan, and of the abovementioned part of said lot 1 in said square not embraced in this partition, but owned at present by the said Wylie as his own individual property, fronting 35½ feet on North Capitol street by 120 in depth, may at any time in their discretion close the 10-foot alley running northward from the main area in the rear of lots 8 and 9. Also that the owner or owners of lots 4 and 5 shall have the like privi-
32]lege to close the 5-foot *alley along the rear of lot 5 and part of lot 6 so far as the main area aforesaid. Also that all these alleys and area shall be private and to be under the control of all owners of property touching thereon, and, except as hereinbefore otherwise provided, shall never be closed unless by common consent, and the owners thereof and of each of said lots shall at all times contribute their and each of their joint and equitable proportions of all proper and necessary charges for paving the said alleys and area, and keeping the same in proper condition by means of drains, sewers, or otherwise, and the same are to be for the exclusive use of said owners. And the parties hereto have annexed to this deed and made it part of the same for illustration and reference a copy of the aforesaid plan of their subdivision. In testimony whereof," etc.

The railroad company also introduced testimony tending to prove that since 1872 the property had been assessed for taxes and that taxes were paid upon it as subdivided into lots from 1 to 11.

This is substantially all the evidence set forth in the bill of exceptions.

The plaintiff presented several requests for instruction, among which were the following:

"The jury are instructed that if they shall find that the property in question was rendered unsalable by reason of the alleged nuisance, and, further, that the plaintiff in good faith was trying to sell it, an allowable method for them to estimate the measure of damages is to ascertain what the plaintiff might have obtained for the property with the obstruction there and what she might have obtained for it with the obstruction removed, and allow her the legal rate of interest—that is, 6 per cent—on the difference for so long a period, not exceeding three years, as the jury shall be satisfied that she was so continuing her efforts to sell it.

"If you shall find for the plaintiff, then, having ascertained a sum you think would, on the 24th day of April, 1876, have compensated the plaintiff, you are allowed in your discretion to add interest, not exceeding 6 per cent, upon that sum from that date, provided that you shall think that such sum without *interest is not a fair compensa [33
tion for all the loss you find that the plaintiff has sustained.

"If the jury shall find that the defendant so obstructed the access to and egress from the plaintiff's land that she could not use the same as such property is generally used, then the jury are at liberty to allow such damages as they shall find have resulted from the act of the defendant, irrespective of any attempt made by the plaintiff to sell the same."

Each of these instructions was refused, and to that action of the court the plaintiff at the time duly excepted.

Thereupon, the bill of exceptions states, "the court instructed the jury that the plaintiff offered her property for sale as a whole, and undertook to sell it as lot 1; that the action was for damages for her not being able to sell lot 1; that the testimony showed that even if she had received an offer for lot 1 she could not consummate the sale, because she did not own the fee in the alleys. This being so, and the defendant's counsel conceding that the structure was illegal, the court instructed the jury that the plaintiff could not recover any thing more than nominal damages, and thereupon instructed the jury to find for the plaintiff for 1 cent damages, which was done."

1. In the opinion of the court of appeals it is said that there was not a particle of evidence in the record as to the salable or rental value of the land without reference to the existence of the nuisance complained of, and that such facts were essential to be ascertained in order to furnish a basis for estimating the damages. It is clear, however, that there was evidence before the jury "as to the value of the land with the D-street track thereon and with that track removed." It is so expressly stated in the bill of exceptions. The amounts given by the witnesses when testifying as to value were not set out in the bill of exceptions for the reason, we infer, that the real contest was as to questions of law arising upon the instructions asked by the plaintiff and the ruling of the court that the plaintiff could recover only nominal damages. The bill of exceptions was evidently prepared with reference to those questions. It must therefore be assumed, upon 34] the *record, that there was evidence as to value upon which the plaintiff was entitled to go to the jury, unless she was precluded by some principle of law from recovering anything more than nominal damages.

2. The court of appeals [7 App. D. C. 529], after observing that the instructions asked by the plaintiff were founded upon the assumption of injury to her in respect of all the lots contained in the subdivision of original lot 1, and did not propound any proper or exact rule for estimating damages, said: "But, apart from all this, the evidence upon which the prayers were founded showed a state of case quite different from that set out in the declaration. It is not upon the evidence alone, but upon the pleadings and the evidence applicable to the pleadings, that the plaintiff can in any case recover, and the one must consist with the other. The declaration here, as we have seen, proceeds as for an injury to the entire original lot, without any reference or respect to the subdivision of that lot, and that the lots made of the subdivision are separate and distinct parcels of ground, fully recognized and provided for by law; and entirely ignores the fact that the plaintiff never was in reality seised in severalty of the original lot 1, as it existed before the subdivision, and as declared upon in the declaration. The proof produced by the defendant, showing how lot 1 was originally held, and how it had been subdivided and partitioned, and how title to all the lots was acquired by the plaintiff, and their relation to each other and the streets upon which they abut, entirely negatives and refutes the case presented in the declaration, and the right of the plaintiff to recover thereon."

Undoubtedly, the declaration claims damages for the injury done to the entire original lot numbered 1 in square 630. It appears that when this action was brought the plaintiff owned all the sublots which, with the alleys as marked on the plat of 1872, constituted original lot 1. If the railroad company, by its illegal use of D street, had done injury to the land, or any part thereof within the exterior boundaries of original lot 1, we are unable to see why damages might not be recovered 35] in this action *with respect to such part as, in fact, the plaintiff owned, although she may have claimed to own more than belonged to her. In estimating the damages, the jury could take into consideration the subdivision of original lot 1, and eliminate from their calculation any sublot belonging to the plaintiff that was not damaged in salable or rental value by the nuisance in question. So, if the plaintiff did not own the alleys marked on the plat, that fact could be given proper weight in estimating the damages she was entitled to recover; that is, if damages were claimed in respect of more land than belonged to the plaintiff, the recovery could have been limited to injury done to the part that she did own.

3. The jury were instructed that the testimony showed that the plaintiff offered her property for sale as a whole, and undertook to sell it as a whole. This was error, for the instruction implied that the plaintiff had not put her property on the market except as a whole; whereas the bill of exceptions shows that while there was evidence tending to prove that she wished or preferred to sell it as a whole, there was also evidence that the plaintiff authorized her land to be sold in parcels or as a whole, indeed, "in any way."

4. The jury were also erroneously instructed that the action was for damages by reason of the plaintiff not being able to sell lot 1, and that, according to the testimony, "if she received an offer for lot 1 she could not consummate the sale because she did not own the fee in the alleys." In the first place, the action was for damages for the injury done to the value of the plaintiff's land, and the unnecessary recital in the declaration that she had tried to sell did not convert the action into one only for damages for not being able to consummate a particular sale. If the salable or rental value of the land was substantially or materially diminished by the defendant's illegal use of D street, she would be entitled to recover without proving that, on a specific occasion, she tried to sell, but failed to effect a sale. In the second place, the plaintiff's right to damages for material injury done to the land owned by her would not have been defeated even if it were true that she did not own the fee in the alleys. If the *alleys had 36] been dedicated to public use, so as to be beyond the control of those owning the abutting lots, plaintiff would nevertheless have been entitled to recover in this action for any substantial diminution in the value of her land, or of any part thereof, arising from the nuisance in question. Apart from this, we do not perceive why she might not have passed, by deed, the fee of the ground marked on the plat as alleys. By the Revised Statutes of the District of Columbia it is provided that "the ways, alleys, or passages, laid out or expressed on any plat or subdivision, shall be and remain to the public, or subject to the uses declared by the person making such subdivision, at all times under the same police regulations as the alleys laid off by the Commissioners on division with the original proprietors." D. C. Rev. Stat. § 480. What were the uses, in respect of these alleys, as declared by the persons who made the subdivision of lot 1? Upon the plat of the subdivision it is declared that the alleys "are exclusively for the sole benefit and use of said lots." And the deed of partition between Wylie and Hetzel expressly provides that "all these alleys and area shall be private and to be under the control of all owners of property thereon;" that except as provided they "shall never be closed unless by common consent," and that "the same are to be for the exclusive use of said owners." Now, when the plaintiff became the owner of all the sublots of original lot 1, is it to be doubted that she could have closed the alleys altogether and have conveyed a good title to all the land constituting the original lot 1? If this be so, it was error to instruct the jury that she could not have made a good title in fee to the entire original lot as one body of land, including the alleys on which the respective sublots abutted.

5. It results from what has been said that the trial court erred in instructing the jury that the plaintiff could recover nothing more than nominal damages. In our opinion, she was entitled to recover such damages as were equivalent to the injury done to her by the defendant's inexcusable and persistent occupation and use of a public street in violation of law and in disregard of her rights as an owner of ad-[37] jacent property. *At the trial of the first case brought by the plaintiff against the railroad company on account of this nuisance, Judge Hagner instructed the jury that they might ascertain from the evidence what, in the absence of the D-street track, would be the fair value of the property in its unimproved condition during the time covered by the declaration; and if they found that the property during that period remained in that condition by reason of the track maintained and used by the defendant, then they might allow such sum as was equal to 6 per cent interest on such value, if they believed that the loss of revenue was caused wholly by the track, or a lesser sum proportionate to the effect which the maintenance and use of the track had in causing the lot to lie unproductive. This was substantially the proposition of law embodied in one of the instructions asked by the plaintiff.

What was the plaintiff's land reasonably worth, during the period covered by the declaration, if D street had not been occupied and used by the railroad company in the manner disclosed by the evidence? In the absence of the defendant's track was there a reasonable certainty that it could have been used or sold? If so, for what purpose could it have been profitably used, or for what sum could it have been sold? Was it reasonably certain that neither the original lot nor any sublot could have been used or sold while the street was obstructed by the defendant's track? These were all proper inquiries by the jury in determining what damages were equivalent to, or would fairly compensate the plaintiff for, the injury done.

Of course, in such inquiries, absolute certainty as to the damages sustained is in many cases impossible. All that the law requires is that such damages be allowed as, in the judgment of fair men, directly and naturally resulted from the injury for which suit is brought. This is the rule which obtains in civil actions for damages. They have their foundation in the idea of just compensation for wrongs done. In United States Trust Company v. O'Brien, 143 N. Y. 284, 287-289—which was an action for damages for the breach of certain covenants contained in a lease—Mr. Justice Peckham, *speaking for the[38] court of appeals of New York, when a member of that court, said: "It is clear, and so it has been held in many cases, that the rule of damages should not depend upon the form of the action. In all civil actions the law gives or endeavors to give a just indemnity for the wrong which has been done the plaintiff, and whether the act was of the kind designated as a tort or one consisting of a breach of a contract is on the question of damages an irrelevant inquiry. As was said by Rapallo, J., in Baker v. Drake, 53 N. Y. 211, 220 [13 Am. Rep. 507], the inquiry is What is an adequate indemnity to the party injured, and the answer cannot be affected by the form of the action in which he seeks his remedy." Again: "In using the words 'uncertain, speculative, and contingent,' for the purpose of excluding that kind of damage, it is not meant to assert that the loss sustained must be proved with the certainty of a mathematical demonstration to have been the necessary result of the breach of covenant by defendant. The plaintiff is not bound to show to a certainty that excludes the possibility of doubt that the loss to him resulted from the action of the defendant in violating his agreement. In many cases such proof cannot be given and yet there might be a reasonable certainty founded upon inferences legitimately and properly deducible from the evidence that the plaintiff's loss was not only in fact occasioned by the defendant's violation of his covenant, but that such loss was the natural and proximate result of such violation. Certainty to reasonable intent is necessary, and the meaning of that language is that the loss or damage must be so far removed from speculation or doubt as to create in the minds of intelligent and reasonable men the belief that it was most likely to follow from the breach of the contract and was a probable and direct result thereof. Such a result would be regarded as having been within the contemplation of the parties and as being the natural accompaniment and the proximate result of the violation of the contract. . . . The proof may sometimes be rather difficult upon the question whether the damage was the just and proximate result of the breach of the covenant. In such case it does not *come with very good grace from the[39] defendant to insist upon the most specific and certain proof as to the cause and amount of the damage when he has himself been guilty of a most inexcusable violation of the covenants which were inserted for the very purpose of preventing the result which has come about."

We are of opinion that the court of appeals erred in affirming the judgment of the supreme court of the District.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause is remanded, with directions for a new trial in the supreme court of the District and for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

In the Matter of the Application of LOUIS P. BOARDMAN on Behalf of William Henry Theodore Durrant for a Writ of Habeas Corpus.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 39-44.)

Habeas corpus, when denied—refusal of appeal—denial of stay—mandate of this court—Federal question.

1. A writ of habeas corpus must be denied if it is apparent that the only result of its issue would be the remanding of the prisoner to custody.
2. The action of the circuit court of the United States in refusing to grant an appeal in a habeas corpus case in favor of a prisoner under judgment of a state court cannot be revised on application to the Supreme Court of the United States for such a writ.
3. Error of a state court in denying a stay of execution in a capital case because of a pending appeal to a Federal court is not ground for setting the prisoner at liberty on a writ of habeas corpus, when that judgment has been superseded by the supreme court of the state, and further proceedings have been taken in the state courts.
4. If a state court, after judgment here, proceeds before our mandate of affirmance issues, its action, though not to be commended, is not void.
5. A determination by a state court that judgment of conviction in a capital case shall not be stayed, notwithstanding the pendency of an appeal which is alleged to present Federal questions, will not be interfered with by this court on a writ of habeas corpus.

[Original.]

Submitted January 7, 1898. Decided January 7, 1898.

APPLICATION made on behalf of William Henry Theodore Durrant, held in custody by the warden of the state's prison at San Quentin, California, for execution under sentence of death, for leave to file a petition for a writ of habeas corpus. Denied.

See same case below, 116 Cal. 179.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Louis P. Boardman for petitioner.

There were no printed papers in this case.

Mr. Chief Justice Fuller delivered the opinion of the court:

Application was made on behalf of Durrant, held in custody by the warden of the state's prison at San Quentin, California, for execution to-day, under sentence of death, for leave to file a petition for the writ of habeas corpus.

The petition in support of general allegations that Durrant was confined under proceedings in contravention of the Constitution and laws of the United States, set forth, in hæc verba, two petitions for the writ presented on Durrant's behalf to the circuit court of the United States for the ninth circuit and northern district of California, on November 11, and December 31, 1897, respectively; and the action of that court in respect thereof.

The averments of these petitions must be considered in the light of §§ 1227 and 1243 of the Penal Code of California, which read as follows:

"Sec. 1227. If for any reason a judgment of death has not been executed, and it remains in force, the court in which the conviction was had, on the application of the district attorney [of the county in which the conviction is had], must order the defendant to be brought before it, or if he is at large, a warrant for his apprehension may be issued. Upon the defendant being brought before the court, it must inquire into the facts, and if no legal reasons exist against the execution of the judgment, must make an order that [the warden of the state prison to whom] the sheriff [is directed to deliver the defendant shall] execute the judgment at a specified time. The sheriff must execute the judgment accordingly."

"Sec. 1243. An appeal to the supreme court from a judgment of conviction stays the execution of the judgment in all capital cases, and in all other cases, upon filing with the clerk of the court in which the conviction was had a certificate of the judge of such court, or of a justice of the supreme court, *that in his [41 opinion there is probable cause for the appeal, but not otherwise."

It was alleged in the petition of November 11 that theretofore Durrant had been found guilty of murder in the first degree in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco; that judgment had been rendered on the verdict, and he had been sentenced to death; that an appeal had been taken from that judgment to the supreme court of California, and the judgment affirmed. See [116 Cal. 179], 48 Pac. 75.

That on April 10, 1897, the superior court rendered a second judgment against Durrant, from which he took an appeal to the state supreme court, raising Federal questions thereon, and that that appeal was still pending and undetermined.

That on June 2, 1897, application had been made by Durrant to said circuit court of the United States for a writ of habeas corpus, which application was denied, and from that order an appeal was duly taken and perfected to the Supreme Court of the United States, but that no mandate showing the determination of that appeal had been filed in the circuit court, yet, nevertheless, judgment was entered by the superior court November 10, sentencing Durrant to be executed Friday, November 12, though that court was without authentic or official information that said appeal had been considered or determined in the Supreme Court of the United States. Hence it was charged that the judgment of the superior court of November 10 was null and void; and also because of the pendency of the appeal from the alleged judgment of April 10, 1897.

It was further averred that the circuit court on the 11th of November denied the writ and dismissed the petition; that from this order petitioner prayed an appeal, presenting a notice of appeal, assignment of errors, citation, and bond for costs; and that the circuit court refused to allow an appeal, or to permit the papers to be filed, and neither of its judges would approve the bond, nor sign the citation.

The petition of December 31 reiterated in substance the allegations of the previous appli-42] cation, and insisted that by *reason thereof an appeal from the final order of the circuit court of November 11 was actually pending in the Supreme Court of the United States, and suspended further proceedings against Durrant, but that, nevertheless, the superior court on December 15, 1897, though without authority and contrary to the Constitution and laws of the United States, entered an order directing the execution of Durrant on January 7, 1898; that from this order Durrant had prosecuted an appeal to the supreme court of California, which was still pending and undetermined; and that the judge of the superior court and the justices of the supreme court had refused to grant a certificate of probable cause, so that the proceedings below were not stayed by said appeal.

That Federal questions had been raised before the superior court and that the disposition thereof was brought under review by the appeal to the supreme court, and that if the order of December 15 were carried into effect, petitioner would be deprived of the right to prosecute a writ of error from the Supreme Court of the United States to the final judgment of the supreme court of California in respect of such Federal questions; as was true also of the appeal from the judgment of April 10, 1897.

Some other matters were put forward in the petitions, but these were not insisted on at the bar, and were so evidently destitute of merit as to require no observations.

The contention here practically rested on these grounds:

First. That the judgment of the superior court on the 10th of November was void because the mandate of this court on the appeal from the final order of the circuit court of June 2 had not been sent down; and that although the circuit court denied an appeal from its final order refusing the writ and dismissing the petition of November 11, still the appeal should be regarded as duly perfected, and that for that reason, or because the circuit court could not arbitrarily defeat such appeal, petitioner was entitled though the interposition of this court by the issue of the writ applied for to be placed in the same position as if the appeal had been granted.

Second. That as the appeals from the judg-43] ments of *April 10 and of December 15 involved Federal questions and were still pending in the state supreme court, the execution of the sentence in accordance with the state statutes would deprive petitioner of the right, privilege, and immunity of suing out writs of error from this court to revise the final judgments of that court when entered on those appeals.

The rule was laid down in Spies v. Illinois, [Re Spies], 123 U. S. 131 [31: 80], that when application is made to this court for the allowance of a writ of error to the highest court of a state, the writ will not be allowed if it appear from the face of the record that the decision of the Federal question which is complained of was so clearly right as not to require argument. And the same rule governs an application to us for the writ of habeas corpus, which must be denied if it be apparent that the only result, if the writ were issued, would be the remanding of the petitioner to custody, for the object of the writ is to ascertain whether the prisoner applying for it can legally be detained, and it is the duty of the court, justice, or judge granting the writ, on hearing, "to dispose of the party as law and justice may require." Rev. Stat. § 761; Iasigi v. Van De Carr, 166 U. S. 391 [41:1045]; Ekiu v. United States, 142 U. S. 651 [35:1146].

The action of the circuit court in refusing to grant the appeal from its final order of the 11th of November, on the petition then presented, and in declining to entertain the petition of December 31, cannot be revised on this application, and the inquiry really is whether these petitions furnish any ground for the conclusion that if the writ were granted the prisoner's detention would be found illegal.

As it appears on the face of the record that the judgment of November 10 was superseded, and that petitioner is held for execution under the judgment of December 15, it manifestly follows that we could not enlarge the prisoner as unlawfully detained on the ground that if the circuit court had allowed an appeal from its final order of November 11, further proceedings below would have been sta ed until that appeal was disposed of.

Nor could we hold that that final order was erroneous because the judgment of November 10 was entered in the *absence of our man-44] date on the affirmance of the final order of the circuit court of June 2, 1897. The judgment of this court affirming that order was rendered, as we know from our own records, November 8 (See 168 U. S. 705 [42: ——] mem.), and we have decided that if the state court after judgment here proceeds before our mandate issues, its action, though not to be commended, is not void. Re Jugiro [Jugiro v. Brush], 140 U. S. 291 [35:510].

In this instance the state trial court did so proceed, but, in the due and orderly administration of justice, its judgment was superseded by the supreme court of the state, which, it is proper to note, granted the certificate of probable cause on the principal ground that the lower court could not exercise jurisdiction to fix a day for the execution of sentence against defendant in the absence of authentic and official evidence of the disposal of the appeal to this court. People v. Durrant, 50 Pac. 1070.

In respect of the alleged abridgment of petitioner's privilege or immunity to sue out writs of error from this court to revise the final judgments of the state supreme court on appeals therein pending, and particularly the appeal from the judgment of the superior court of December 15, which, it was argued, raised Federal questions, it is sufficient to say that it was for the trial judge or the supreme court of California to determine whether or not the judgments complained of should be stayed or superseded, and with such determination it is not our province through this writ to interfere, nor do the statutory provisions in that behalf, in themselves, involve any infraction of the Constitution or laws of the United States.

Kohl v. Lehlback, 160 U. S. 293 [40:432]; Bergemann v. Backer, 157 U. S. 655 [39:845]; Andrews v. Swartz, 156 U. S. 272 [39:422].

All the averments in the papers, as well as a petition for a writ of error, which had been previously presented to some of our number and denied, as was admitted, and the suggestions urged at the bar, have been duly considered, with the result that the court is unanimously of opinion that if the writ should be awarded it would be its duty on the return thereto to remand the petitioner. The application is therefore denied.

Jurisdictional amount—inference.

1. The matter in dispute on foreclosure of a building and loan association mortgage securing a bond for $4,000, by which the obligor, who has bid $2,000 premium for an advancement of $2,000, agrees to pay $4,000 in nine years, with interest on $2,000 at 6 per cent, or, instead of this payment, to pay such interest and also $24 per month as monthly dues on forty shares of stock until each share is paid up to the value of $100, and then surrender said stock,—cannot be assumed for the purpose of jurisdiction, after some payments of dues have been made, to be merely $2,000 money loaned with interest thereon, less payments made thereon, on the ground that the agreement for monthly dues was only another name for interest, where the amount claimed in the complaint to be due is $2,800, together with some interest.
2. The inference cannot be indulged, on the question of jurisdictional amount, that said scheme is a mere cover to conceal an usurious exaction of interest for the loan of a sum of money not exceeding in any event $2,000.

Submitted December 9, 1897. Decided January 10, 1898.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Texas sustaining a demurrer and dismissing a suit for want of jurisdiction brought by the Building & Loan Association of Dakota against M. S. Price et al., for the foreclosure of a mortgage. Reversed, and case remanded with directions for further proceedings.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. J. H. Hauser and C. W. Starling for appellant.

Messrs. W. S. Simkins and T. E. Conn for appellees.

NOTE.—Jurisdiction of United States Supreme Court dependent on amount; interest cannot be added to give jurisdiction; how value of thing demanded may be shown; what cases reviewable without regard to sum in controversy,—see note to Gordon v. Ogden, 7: 592.

Mr. Justice Peckham delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellants herein commenced this action against the defendants in the circuit court of the United States for the northern district of Texas, the complaint in which was filed on the 3d of October, 1895. The defendants demurred on the ground that the court had no jurisdiction of the several subject-matters set forth in the complaint, one of the objections being that the matter in dispute did not exceed $2,000, exclusive of interest and costs.

The cause was heard in the circuit court, the demurrer was sustained, and the bill dismissed with costs and without prejudice, for want of jurisdiction of the subject-matter in controversy. The complainant appealed to this court, which appeal was allowed and granted solely upon the question of the jurisdiction of the circuit court, and that question alone has *been certified. Whether the bill shows [46 facts sufficient to invoke the consideration of a court of equity is not such a question of jurisdiction as is referred to in the judiciary act of March 3, 1891, and we have therefore no concern with that question. 26 Stat. at L. 826, chap. 517, § 5; Smith v. McKay, 161 U. S. 355 [40: 731].

The decision of the only question before us depends upon whether the allegations contained in the bill of complaint show the matter in dispute to be of sufficient value to give the circuit court jurisdiction.

The appellant was incorporated under the laws of the state of South Dakota, and has its principal place of business in the city of Aberdeen, in that state. The action was brought for the purpose of recovering the amount of an alleged debt, damages, and costs against the defendants Price, Rothschild, and Miller, and for a decree of foreclosure against the defendants H. M. Price and W. B. Luna, under a certain mortgage and vendor's lien on the premises described therein.

The bill alleges, among other things, that on the 1st of January, 1890, one Jacob Rothschild applied for membership in the complainant's association and subscribed for forty shares of its capital stock, which application was accepted, and on that day a certificate for forty shares of the capital stock was issued and delivered to him, and he paid the application or subscription fee due thereon, and the stock was accepted and received by him upon the terms and conditions therein set forth, and he thereupon became a member of the association and the holder and owner of forty shares of its capital stock.

The bill then proceeds as follows:

"3d. Your orator further shows that on or about the said 1st day of January, 1890, the said Jacob Rothschild, being then and there a stockholder in your orator and entitled under the rules, regulations, and by-laws to make application for an advancement on his said stock, made his application to your orator for an advancement of $2,000 in anticipation of the maturity value of his said forty shares of stock, and in competition with other bidders for the funds of your *orator bid as a premium [47 for the privilege of obtaining such advancement the sum of $50 per share and offered as security for the continued payment for the monthly dues on said forty shares of stock and the interest on said advancement the real estate hereinafter described; and your orator further shows that said application and bid were made in accordance with the rules, regulations, and by-laws of said association, and were duly accepted and approved by your orator's board of directors, and the advancement applied for was duly made, and the amount due thereon was duly paid to the said Jacob Rothschild; that said advancement was made by your orator on the faith and in the expectation that the said Rothschild would, according to his agreement, continue the monthly payment on his said forty shares of stock until such stock should have become fully matured and of the value of $100 per share.

"4th. Your orator further shows that on or about the 1st day of February, 1890, the said Jacob Rothschild and the defendant, Bertha Rothschild, for and in consideration of the advancement so made and for the purpose of securing the continued payment of the monthly dues on said stock, made, executed, and delivered to your orator, and thereby promised and agreed to comply with the terms of a bond, of which the following is substantially a copy:

'Know all men by these presents, that Jacob Rothschild and Bertha Rothschild, his wife, of the county of Dallas, and state of Texas, are held and firmly bound unto the Building & Loan Association of Dakota, in the city of Aberdeen, and state of South Dakota, in the sum of four thousand ($4,000) dollars, lawful money of the United States of America, to be paid to the said association, its certain attorney, successors, or assigns, at its home office in Aberdeen, South Dakota, to which payment, well and truly to be made, we bind ourselves and our heirs, executors, and administrators, jointly and severally, firmly by these presents.

'Sealed with our seals, and dated at Aberdeen, South Dakota, this 1st day of February, 1890. 48]* 'The condition of this obligation is such that, whereas, said Jacob Rothschild has bid, in accordance with the by-laws of said association, the sum of two thousand ($2,000) dollars, as and for a premium for the advancement to him by said association of $2,000, by way of anticipation of the value, at their maturity, of forty shares of the capital stock of said association, now owned by said Jacob Rothschild and, whereas said association has this day advanced to said Jacob Rothschild the sum of $2,000, in consideration of said premium, and by way of said anticipation:

'Now, therefore, if the above-bounden Jacob Rothschild and Bertha Rothschild, their heirs, executors, and administrators, or any of them, shall well and truly pay or cause to be paid unto the said association, its certain attorney, successors, or assigns, at its home office, on or before nine years from date hereof, the just sum of $4,000 as aforesaid, together with interest on $2,000, at the rate of 6 per cent per annum, from the 1st day of February, A. D. 1890, until paid, payable monthly in advance; or shall well and truly pay, or cause to be paid, unto said association, its certain attorney, successor, or assigns, at its said home office, the sum of twenty-four and $\frac{00}{100}$ dollars on the 1st day of each and every month hereafter, as and for the monthly dues on said forty shares of capital stock of said association now owned by the said Jacob Rothschild, and by him hereby sold, assigned, transferred, and set over to said association as security for the faithful performance of this bond, and shall also well and truly pay, or cause to be paid, all instalments of interest aforesaid, and all fines which become due on the said stock, without any fraud or further delay, until said stock becomes fully paid in and of the value of $100 per share, and shall then surrender said stock to said association; then, and in either of such cases, the above obligation to be void, otherwise of full force and virtue.

'Provided, however, and it is hereby expressly agreed, that if, at any time, default shall be made in the payment of said interest, or the said monthly dues on said stock, for the space *of six months after the same, or any[49 part thereof, shall have become due, or if the taxes and assessments on the property mortgaged to secure the faithful performance of this bond be not paid when due, or if the insurance policy or policies on the said mortgaged property be allowed to expire without renewal, then, and in either or any such case, the whole principal sum aforesaid shall, at the election of said association, its successors or assigns, immediately thereupon become due and payable, and the sum of $4,000, less whatever sum has been paid said association, as and for the monthly dues on said forty shares of said capital stock, at the time of said default, may be enforced and recovered at once as liquidatad damages, together with and in addition to, all interest and fines then due, and all costs and disbursements, including said taxes, insurance, and assessments, which have been paid by said association, anything hereinbefore contained to the contrary notwithstanding.

'Signed, sealed, and delivered in presence of—

'W. L. Hall.
'C. S. Crysler.'

"5th. Your orator would further show that, on the 1st day of February, 1890, the said Jacob Rothschild and the defendant Bertha Rothschild, in order to better secure your orator for the money advanced by your orator as aforesaid and in all their agreements, obligations, and contract as aforesaid, made, executed, and delivered to your orator their certain mortgage or deed of trust, with power of sale, in which Charles S. Crysler was made trustee on the following described tract or lot of land, situated in the city of Dallas, county of Dallas, and state of Texas, and more particularly described as follows:

(Here follows description of property.)

"6th. Your orator would further show that it is recited in said deed of trust, among other things, that the said Jacob Rothschild is a member of the Building & Loan Association *of[50 Dakota, and is the owner of forty shares of the capital stock thereof, the monthly payments of which amount to $24; and it is further recited that said deed of trust is given for the purpose of securing the aforesaid bond, the nature of which bond is fully set forth in said deed of trust.

"7th. Your orator would further show that it is stipulated in said deed of trust that if the said defendants shall well and truly pay or cause to be paid the sum of $4,000, together with the interest above specified, within the time and in the manner as in said bond specified, or shall pay or cause to be paid, at the home office of said association, the instalments of interest as they become due on said stock, until said stock becomes fully paid in and of the value of $100 per share, and before any of said instalments of interest or monthly payments shall have been past due for a period of sixty (60) days, and shall then surrender said stock to said association in payment of said bond, and shall pay the taxes and assessments and shall keep and perform all and every of the conditions of said bond, then this deed shall be void and the property hereinbefore conveyed shall be released at the cost of the parties executing the said bond, but otherwise to continue in full force and effect; but if default be made in the payment of said sum or sums of money or any instalment of interest thereon or of any monthly payment of stock for the period of sixty (60) days after the same shall be due or any part of either or in the payment of taxes at the time or times specified for payment or in any condition in said deed of trust contained, then or in either or any such case the whole principal sum or sums secured by this trust deed and the interest thereon accrued up to the time —such default shall, at the election of your orator, its successors or assigns, or its or their agent, become thereupon due and payable immediately upon said default. Whereupon the trustee in said trust deed is authorized and empowered to sell said premises in accordance with the stipulations contained in said instrument, and with the proceeds of said sale to pay the expenses of sale and all sums of money due by the terms of said bond so in default, with all interest due thereon, and all taxes, if any, due to said association.

51] *"8th. Your orator further shows that said forty shares of stock have not been withdrawn, nor have they matured or become of the par value of $100 per share; that subsequent to the execution, delivery, and record of the aforesaid deed of trust the said Jacob Rothschild and Bertha Rothschild conveyed the aforesaid premises to the defendant Sophia Miller, who, as a part of the purchase price for said premises, assumed and agreed to pay the said bond in the sum of $4,000, secured by the aforesaid deed of trust lien, retaining a vendor's lien in said deed of conveyance to secure the payment of the aforesaid sum of $4,000; that subsequently the said Sophia Miller conveyed said premises in like manner to the defendant M. S. Price as her separate property, who, and as a part of the purchase price therefor, assumed or agreed to pay said bond secured by said deed of trust lien, said Sophia Miller retaining a vendor's lien for the payment thereof and for the payment of the other portions of the purchase money, by virtue of which she may claim some interest in the aforesaid premises; that W. B. Luna also claims some interest in the aforesaid premises, which interest, if any, is subsequent and inferior to that of your orators.

"Your orator further alleges that it is now the owner and holder of the said bond and deed of trust. Your orator further shows that the said defendants have not paid said principal sum of $4,000, nor any part thereof; that the said defendants have not continually paid the monthly dues on said forty shares of stock, nor the monthly instalments of interest as provided in said bond, but that defendants have paid no part of said dues or interest except the sum of twelve hundred dollars ($1,200) as and for the said monthly dues for the month of February, 1890, to and including the month of March, 1894, and the further sum of $500 as and for the interest, as in said bond provided, for the month of February, 1890, to and including the month of March, 1894.

"Your orator further shows that default has been made in the payment of the monthly dues on said forty shares of stock and the monthly instalments of interest on *said advance- [52 ment; that more than six months have elapsed since the first monthly instalment of interest and dues so in default became due and payable, and your orator elects to declare the whole sum named in and secured by said bond and deed of trust to be immediately due and payable.

"9th Your orator further shows that there is now due and owing your orator from Bertha Rothschild, Sophia Miller, H. M. and M. S. Price, under, and by virtue of the terms of said bond the sum of four thousand dollars ($4,000), less the sum of twelve hundred dollars ($1,200), paid to your orator as the monthly dues on said forty shares of capital stock at the time of the aforesaid default, aggregating $2,800, together with and in addition to interest on $2,000 at the rate of 6 per cent per annum, from April 1, 1894."

The complainant then prays for a decree against defendants for the amount of the above-named debt, damages, and costs, and for a decree of foreclosure of the mortgage above set forth.

We think upon the face of this pleading the matter in dispute exceeds the amount of $2,000 exclusive of interest and costs. 25 Stat. at L. 433, chap. 866.

The by-laws of the complainant are not made a part of the bill and they cannot be referred to for the purpose of aiding or marring the pleading itself. In truth, they are not in the record, and we are ignorant of their contents, except as some matters set forth in the bill are alleged to be in conformity with certain of their provisions. Nor can the inference be indulged, on a question of jurisdictional amount, that the whole scheme is a mere cover to conceal a usurious exaction of interest for the loan of a sum of money not exceeding in any event $2,000. No such legal inference arises from the fact stated in the bill. On the contrary, it appears on the face of the bill that the company was duly incorporated by legislative act; that Rothschild, the original owner of the stock, applied for membership in the company, subscribed for forty shares thereof, and promised to pay for it in the manner stated. We cannot assume, as a matter of legal *inference, [53 that the circumstances set forth in the bill constitute a cover for usury, and we must take those allegations as they are made and assume their truth for the purpose of our decision.

The bill shows an application to complainant for an advance of $2,000 in anticipation of the maturity value of the shares of stock owned by Rothschild; that the application was granted and the advance applied for duly made and the amount paid to Rothschild, and that it was made on the faith and in the expectation that he would, according to his agreement, continue the monthly payments on his stock until it became fully matured and of the value of $100 per share. The bond given as part security for the repayment of this advance contains distinct contracts. The obligor agreed to pay in nine years from the date thereof $4,000, and interest on $2,000 at 6 per cent from February, 1890, until paid, the interest being payable monthly in advance; or, instead of this payment, he agreed to pay $24 on the first of every month at the home office of the company as monthly dues, being at the rate of 60 cents per month on each share, there being forty shares of stock, and he agreed to continue these payments until the stock became fully paid up and of the value of $100 per share, when he was to surrender it to the company, and he agreed also to pay the interest as stated above.

We cannot assume, as against the allegations contained in the bill, that the payment of these monthly dues upon the contract was pursuant to an agreement to pay interest on the loan, and that such payment was merely another name for interest. It is alleged to be separate and distinct from that, and it is set up as a material portion of the obligation of the borrower who, by subscribing for the shares and being accepted, etc., thereby became a shareholder and entitled to dividends and profits coming to the shares he held. Upon default in either of these distinct obligations, to pay interest and to also pay his monthly dues, the whole sum at the option of the association became due less whatever sum had been paid it as the monthly dues at the time the default might be enforced. The bill here shows that there had been a de-54] fault *for six months, and that there was due from defendants at commencement of suit the sum of $4,000 less the sum of $1,200 of monthly dues which had been paid up to and including March, 1894, leaving due the sum of $2,800, together with and in addition to the interest on $2,000, at the rate of 6 per cent per annum, from April, 1894.

The matter in dispute, therefore, is not merely $2,000 money loaned, together with the interest on that sum, but the claim on the part of the complainant is for the payment of the principal sum above stated, which exceeds the sum of $2,000, exclusive of interest and costs. All these facts are admitted by the demurrer.

The nature of this association is not very clearly set forth in the bill, but it is probably not materially different from those which have been incorporated to a great extent in many different states, and referred to generally in Endlich in his work on Building Associations.

A question somewhat similar to this has been decided in Richard v. Southwestern Building & Loan Association, 21 So. 643, 49 La. Ann. 481, where it was held that a loan of this nature was not to be treated as usurious, for the reason that the payments supposed to constitute the usury were by the terms of the contract made upon the stock debt and not upon the loan. To the same effect is Equitable Building & Loan Association v. Vance [49 S. C. 482], 27 S. E 274, supreme court of South Carolina, May, 1897.

The stock is not, as is claimed by counsel for appellee, a mere fiction. It is issued, it is to be assumed on this appeal, in accordance with the provisions of the charter of the complainant, and the owners of it are entitled to share in the profits of the corporation, which it is supposed it will be enabled to make during its existence, and his position of shareholder is entirely separate from his position of borrower from the company.

Without determining any of these questions on the merits, we think the matter in dispute was within the jurisdiction of the circuit court, and we therefore reverse the *judgment [55 dismissing the bill, and remand the case to the circuit court with directions to take such further proceedings as may be in conformity with this opinion.

1. Under the laws of Maryland in force in the District of Columbia in 1859, it was then competent for a married woman outside of the district to execute, with her husband, a sufficient power of attorney to convey her lands therein, if acknowledged by her in the manner a deed of her lands was required to be acknowledged.

Argued November 29, 30, 1897. Decided January 10, 1898.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia affirming the decree of the Supreme Court of that District dismissing a suit brought by Fannie T. Williams et al., plaintiffs, against John W. Paine et al., defendants, for the partition of land in the city of Washington. Affirmed.

See same case below, 23 Wash. L. Rep. 626, 7 App. D. C. 116.

Statement by Mr. Justice Peckham:

The appellants herein brought this suit in the supreme court of the District of Columbia 56]for the purpose of obtaining *partition of certain lands in the city of Washington, known as square 53 of the ground plan of that city.

Upon the trial it appeared that the common source of title was one George W. Peter, who, in January, 1837, conveyed the premises to Henry Huntt and Benjamin Ogle Tayloe as tenants in common. Mr. Huntt died in 1838 intestate, leaving two daughters, Fannie and Mary, and a son named George Gibson Huntt, to whom his undivided interest in these lands descended. Fannie married an officer in the United States Army named Gibson, and Mary married an officer in that army named Robert Ransom, Jr. In May, 1859, Lieutenant Ransom was stationed at Carlisle Barracks in Pennsylvania, and at that time he and his wife executed and acknowledged a power of attorney to the brother of Mrs. Ransom, to convey their interest in the land, the material part of which power reads as follows:

Know all men by these presents, whereas Lieut. Robert Ransom, Jr., of the United States Army, and Mary his wife, in right of the said Mary, are seised in fee simple as tenants in common with the sister and brother of the said Mary, to wit, Fanny Huntt and George Gibson Huntt, and with B. O. Tayloe, of certain lots of ground in the city of Washington in the District of Columbia, which are described as follows: [Describing among others the lots in question.] To provide for the contingency of our absence we, the said Robert Ransom, Jr., and Mary my wife, do by these presents constitute and appoint and in our place put and depute the said George Gibson Huntt, of Washington city aforesaid, to be our true and lawful attorney in fact for us, and in our name, place, and stead to control, manage, grant, bargain, and sell, and in that event convey all our right, title, and interest in and to the said lots and square of ground or any part or parts thereof, or to join in and for us and in our name to sign any proceedings in partition of the said lots and square, or to appear for us in court for that purpose; and in regard to the said real estate to do, execute, and perform every act and thing necessary to be done as fully and amply as we might or could do if personally present, *and we do hereby rat-[57 ify and confirm all and whatsoever our said attorney in fact may legally do in the premises.

In witness whereof we, the said parties to these presents, have hereunto set our hands and seals this 23d day of May, A. D. 1859.

Witnesses present:

S. H. Graham. R. Ransom, Jr. [Seal.]
A. L. Sponsler. M. H. Ransom. [Seal.]

This paper was duly acknowledged by both Lieutenant Ransom and his wife, the latter of whom made the acknowledgment necessary to be made in the District of Columbia in order to convey real estate by a married woman.

The acknowledgment and the certificate thereof are full and complete, and taken and certified by a proper officer.

The premises in question at that time were vacant lots. Soon after the execution of this power of attorney, Lieutenant Ransom was ordered away, and, with his wife, he left the station at Carlisle Barracks and went to Fort Lyon in the western country. He was a native of one of the southern states, and when the war broke out he resigned his commission in the army and entered the Confederate service, and at the conclusion of the war he had risen in that service to the rank of general. Mrs. Ransom's brother, George Gibson Huntt, to whom the power of attorney above mentioned was given, remained in the old army. At the conclusion of the war General Ransom returned with his wife to his native state, North Carolina, where she died in February, 1881, leaving a number of children who are complainants herein. He remained in that state until his death in January, 1892.

During the continuance of the war, the children of the deceased Mr. Huntt became anxious to sell their interest in the premises in question, as the land was still vacant and unimproved, and a source of expense in the way of the payment of taxes. It was more particularly on account of Mrs. Ransom that the sale was desired, in order to aid her as far as possible by turning her interest in the lands into money. Negotiations for the sale of the prop-
58] erty were therefore commenced *some time in 1864 through a real-estate agent employed by Mr. Walter S. Cox, a distant relative of the parties and then a practising lawyer at the bar of the District, now one of the justices of the supreme court thereof. These negotiations resulted in the sale of all their interest in the property to Mr. Tayloe, the owner of the other half interest therein, and deeds were duly given therefor by Mrs. Gibson and Mr. Huntt to Mr. Tayloe, and on the 29th of November, 1864, Mr. Huntt, assuming to act under the power of attorney already mentioned, executed, acknowledged, and delivered to Mr. Benjamin O. Tayloe a paper which reads as follows:

Know all men by these presents, that I, George Gibson Huntt, by virtue of the annexed power of attorney to me from Robert Ransom, Jr., and Mary Ransom, his wife, and for and in consideration of the sum of eight hundred and thirty-three $\frac{33}{100}$ dollars to me in hand paid by Benjamin Ogle Tayloe, of the city of Washington in the District of Columbia, the receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, have bargained and sold to said B. O. Tayloe, his heirs and assigns, all the right, title, and estate of them, the said Robert Ransom, Jr., and Mary Ransom, being one undivided third part of, in, and to those pieces of ground in the city of Washington aforesaid, known and described as lots Nos. 1 and 3 in square No. 5, lot No. 10 in square No. 14, lots Nos. 5 and 9 in square No. 17, lots Nos. 3 and 4 in square No. 28, lot No. 3 in square No. 30, and the whole of square No. 53, with the improvements and appurtenances; and I hereby further agree in behalf of said Robert and Mary Ransom, that they shall and will, as soon as convenient, make and execute a proper deed of conveyance of said premises to said Benj'n O. Tayloe, in fee simple.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and seal this 29th day of November, A. D. 1864.

Witness: W. Kline.

This paper was acknowledged by Huntt be-59] fore officers different *from those before whom proof of the power of attorney was made. It was also and on the 14th day of January, 1865, recorded in the proper land records office in the District of Columbia, together with the power of attorney already referred to.

The purchase price of the lands was paid to Mr. Cox, who promptly paid over her share to Mrs. Gibson, and also included in such payment the share belonging to Mrs. Ransom, and Mrs. Gibson duly paid over Mrs. Ransom's share to her or expended the same for her benefit and with her approval. This was done prior to the close of the war, while Mrs. Ransom was within the lines of the southern army with her husband, and Mrs. Gibson was in one of the northern states.

After the death of Mr. Tayloe, which occurred in 1868, one of his daughters, Julia Tayloe, in November, 1870, succeeded, under proceedings in partition, to all the interest of her father in the premises. She married in 1865 the defendant, John W. Paine, and the other three defendants are the children of such marriage. From the time of the division of the estate of Mrs. Paine's father, Mr. Tayloe, which took place in 1870, his daughter, Mrs. Paine, claimed to be the owner of the property, and was in possession thereof, renting it, through her husband and his agents, for a coal yard and for other purposes, and paying the taxes upon the same up to the time of her death in 1872, since which time her husband has been in possession, claiming the right as tenant by the courtesy, and his three children claim title in fee, subject to the life estate of their father.

Prior to the filing of this bill Mr. Paine had expended large sums of money in building twenty-two dwelling houses on the property at a cost of about $125,000, and has received the rents of such houses and paid the taxes on the property, the whole property being now estimated to be worth about $250,000. The sum at which the property was sold in 1864 was a fair price for the same and the best that could be secured after earnest efforts made to sell it.

After the death of Robert Ransom and his wife this bill was filed by their children, and the relief sought is to have *the paper exe [60 cuted by Mrs. Ransom's brother, George Gibson Huntt, under the power of attorney given by her husband and herself, declared null and void as a cloud upon the title of the complainants in this property, and the bill then asks that the right of the complainants to a one-sixth (Mrs. Ransom's alleged) interest in the land in fee as tenants in common with the defendants may be established against all the defendants, as well the life tenant as the reversioners, and the land partitioned accordingly.

Upon these facts the supreme court of the District of Columbia dismissed the bill with costs, and its judgment to that effect having been affirmed by the court of appeals of the District (7 App. D. C. 116, 23 Wash. L. Rep. 626), the case is now here upon the complainants' appeal from that judgment of affirmance.

Mr. Franklin H. Mackey, for appellants:

A married woman could not, prior to 1869 (when the married woman's act was passed), convey real estate in this District by power of attorney.

Holladay v. Daily, 86 U. S. 19 Wall. 606 (22: 187); Sumner v. Conant, 10 Vt. 9; Mott v. Smith, 16 Cal. 533; Agricultural Bank v. Rice, 45 U. S. 4 How. 225 (11: 949); Rhea v. Rhenner, 26 U. S. 1 Pet. 105 (7: 72).

A power of attorney by a married woman authorizing a third person to convey her real estate could always be made by her if she held her estate (as she might do) with an unqualified power to dispose of it. In that class of cases a married woman has the right and power just as if she were a feme sole to appoint an attorney for the purpose of selling and conveying her estate.

Adams, Eq. 45; Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1104.

The power of attorney was revoked by the war.

This rule does not apply in cases where the creditor, although a subject of the enemy, remains in the country of the debtor, or has a known agent there authorized to receive the debt, because the payment to such creditor or his agent could in no respect be construed into the violation of the duties imposed by the state of war upon the debtor.

Being a contract of sale and not a "deed for the conveyance of land," its defects were not cured by the act of 1865.

The receipt of the purchase money by Mrs. Ransom created no equitable estoppel in her or her heirs to claim the land.

Mr. Justice Peckham delivered the opinion of the court:

The questions in this case grow out of the execution of the power of attorney by Lieutenant Ransom and his wife while at Carlisle Barracks, Pennsylvania, in 1859.

It is claimed on the part of appellants: (1) That the power of attorney given by Mrs. Ransom, a married woman (jointly with her husband) could not operate as a valid authority to the attorney named therein to convey her real estate, because a married woman could not convey real estate by a power of attorney; (2) that the power of attorney was revoked by the war; (3) that the paper executed by the attorney in fact pursuant to the power of attorney was not a conveyance, and did not pass the title of Mrs. Ransom to Mr. Tayloe; (4) that these difficulties were not cured by the act 61] of Congress entitled "An Act to *Quiet Titles in Favor of Parties in Actual Possession of Lands Situated in the District of Columbia" (13 Stat. at L. 531, chap. 110), as that act only applied to instruments conveying lands and to parties who were in actual possession at the time when the act was passed, and the paper executed by the attorney was not a conveyance, and when the act was passed the premises in question were vacant; (5) that the purchase price for her interest in that land was never received by Mrs. Ransom, and her heirs are not estopped from setting up the invalidity of the alleged contract of sale or conveyance upon any equitable grounds.

62] *Very careful and well-considered opinions have been delivered in the case, both in the supreme court and in the court of appeals of the District, in which these various questions are discussed. The supreme court held that the two papers (the power of attorney and the instrument executed in pursuance thereof) were so far valid as to be subject only to such objections and defects of form of execution and acknowledgment as could be cured by legislation, and these defects were cured by the act of Congress; that this statute was constitutional, and that the power of attorney was not revoked by the war, but was in full force and valid when the deed by the attorney was executed. The court also thought the defense which had been set up, that the complainants were at the commencement of the suit and thereafter out of possession and their title denied by the defendants, who were *in actu- [63 al and full possession, was an answer to the bill for partition even if there had been no other defense proved. The bill was therefore dismissed.

The court of appeals, while discussing somewhat the defense that complainants were out of possession, did not decide the case upon that ground, but held that the power of attorney (properly acknowledged by Mrs. Ransom, as above stated) duly conferred upon the attorney in fact the legal power to convey Mrs. Ransom's interest in the land; that the war did not revoke the power; that the paper executed and delivered by the attorney in fact was not a conveyance, but only a contract for the sale and conveyance of the land; that the act of Congress did not apply to such a paper; and, lastly, that the contract of sale was within the scope of the power of attorney, and vested in the purchaser an equitable interest or estate which, upon general equitable principles, a court of equity would not devest out of the vendee in the absence of fraud, and, no fraud being alleged or shown, and the purchase money having been received by Mrs. Ransom, equity would not set aside the sale. We will now state the conclusions to which we have come regarding these questions:

And, first, as to the question whether the power of attorney executed by Lieutenant Ransom and wife to George Gibson Huntt authorized and enabled the attorney to bargain and sell and convey, or contract to convey by deed of bargain and sale, the property therein mentioned. We think it did.

Under the laws of Maryland, which were in

†Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That all deeds heretofore recorded in the land records of the District of Columbia, which have been executed and acknowledged by femes covert (their husbands having signed and sealed the same) for conveying any real estate, or interest therein, situated in said District; and all acknowledgments of deeds heretofore recorded, as aforesaid, which have been made by femes covert (whether they have executed the deed or not) for the purpose of releasing their claims to dower in the lands described therein, situated as aforesaid, in which acknowledgments the form prescribed by law has not been followed; and all deeds heretofore recorded, as aforesaid, which have been executed and acknowledged by an attorney in fact, duly appointed for conveying real estate situated in said District; and all deeds heretofore recorded, as aforesaid, executed, and acknowledged, or only acknowledged by such attorney in fact, for conveying real estate situated in said District, as to which the acknowledgment was made before officers different from those before whom proof of the power of attorney was made, and as to which the power of attorney was proved before only one justice of the peace; and all deeds heretofore executed and recorded as aforesaid for the purpose of conveying land situated in said District, acknowledged out of the District of Columbia, before a judge of the United States court, or before two aldermen of a city, or the chief magistrate of a city, or before a notary public; and all deeds heretofore executed and recorded as aforesaid for the purpose of conveying land situated in said District, acknowledged by an attorney in fact, duly appointed, or by an officer of a corporation, duly authorized, who has acknowledged the same to be his act and deed, instead of the act and deed of the grantor or of the corporation; and all deeds heretofore executed and recorded as aforesaid for the purpose of conveying land situated in said District to which there is not annexed a legal certificate as to the official character of the officer or officers taking the acknowledgment, shall be, and the same are hereby, declared to be of the same effect and validity to pass the fee-simple or other estate intended to be conveyed, and bar dower in the real estate therein mentioned in favor of parties in actual possession, claiming under and through such deeds, as if such deeds had been by such femes covert executed and acknowledged, or acknowledged in case of a dower right, in the form heretofore prescribed by law; as if such deeds had been executed and acknowledged by the grantor in the deed; as if such power of attorney had been proved before the officer or officers taking the acknowledgment; as if such power of attorney had been proved before two justices of the peace; as if such acknowledgment had been made before any judge of a state court, or before two justices of the peace; as if such attorneys in fact or officer of a corporation had acknowledged the deed to be the deed of the grantor or of the corporation; as if such deeds had thereto annexed a certificate, in legal form, that the officer or officers taking the acknowledgment were really what they purport to be: Provided, That the certificate of acknowledgment by a feme covert shall show that the acknowledgment was made "apart" or "privily" from her husband, or use some other term importing that her acknowledgment was made out of his presence, and also that she acknowledged or declared that she willingly executed or that she willingly acknowledged the deed, or that the same was her voluntary act, or to that effect: And provided, also, That when the power of attorney shall have [been] executed by a feme covert the same shall be effectual and sufficient if there shall have been such an acknowledgment of the same as would be sufficient, under the provisions of this act, to pass her estate and interest therein were she a party executing the deed of conveyance, the record and copy thereof of any deed recorded as aforesaid to be evidence thereof, in the same manner and to have the same effect as if such deed had been originally executed, acknowledged, and recorded according to law.

force in the District of Columbia in 1859, we think it was then competent for a married woman, outside of the District, to execute, with her husband, a power of attorney to convey her lands therein, which, when acknowledged by her according to the statute relating to the acknowledgment by married women of deeds conveying their real property in the District, thereby became a valid and sufficient instrument to authorize the conveyance by attorney. It is not claimed that the acknowledgment to the power of attorney in this case was insufficient in matter of form to comply with the statute in that respect.

64] *The real contention is, assuming the acknowledgment to have been sufficient, that a married woman could not by any manner of acknowledgment appoint an attorney with authority to convey her lands. It is true that by the common law a married woman could not convey an estate of freehold owned by her unless by levying a fine or suffering a common recovery. This was altered by the statute in England of 3 & 4 Wm. IV. chap. 74, abolishing fines and recoveries, and providing other means for the conveyance of estates. In most, if not all, of the states of the Union, statutes have been passed providing for the manner in which a married woman can dispose of her real estate. These statutes were intended to and did set aside the technicalities of the common law, and they provided some simple and effectual method for the transfer of the interests of married women in real estate. The chief justice of the court of appeals of the District of Columbia, in delivering the opinion of that court in this case, has cited several Maryland statutes which the court holds were in force in this District in 1859, and those statutes are also held to provide for the case of the execution of a power of attorney by a married woman, joined in by her husband and privily acknowledged by her, authorizing the attorney in fact to convey her real property in the District.

This separate acknowledgment is provided for in probably all the statutes of the various states relating to the subject of the conveyance by married women of any interest they may have in real estate. It has been said to be the most important and essential element in the method employed to transfer such estates.

The statutes referred to in the opinion are the statutes of Maryland of 1715, chapter 47; 1752, chapter 8; and 1766, chapter 14; and in those statutes the ceremony of the private examination of the married woman and her voluntary acknowledgment of the deed were made substitutes for the private examination as to her voluntary consent in the levying of the fine or the suffering of a common recovery. After citing these various statutes of Maryland and commenting upon their provisions relating to conveyances of married women, the chief justice, in his opinion in this case, says:

65] *"These provisions of the acts of 1715 and 1766 were in force in this District in 1859, and are still in force, and they were in no respect repealed by or in conflict with the acts of Congress of the 31st of May, 1832 (4 Stat. at L. 520), and of the 20th of April, 1838 (5 Stat. at 226), relating to the execution and acknowlt of deeds for land in the District of Columbia. The acts of Congress do not profess to repeal the acts of Maryland of 1715 and 1766, or to be exclusive in their operation; but they have, in some particulars not involved here, amplified and extended the provisions of the former statutes then in force. And construing these statutes altogether, and looking to the reason and policy upon which they are founded, it would seem to be clear that in the year 1859 and down to the year 1865, it was competent to a feme covert, by a joint power of attorney with her husband, duly executed and acknowledged according to the forms prescribed by the statute, to execute and acknowledge a valid deed of conveyance of her real estate situate in the District of Columbia. It is well settled that a power to convey land must possess the same requisites, and observe the same solemnities in execution and acknowledgment, as are necessary in a deed directly conveying the land; and that a title to land can only be acquired and lost according to the laws of the place where the land is situated. Clark v. Graham, 19 U. S. 6 Wheat. 577 [5: 334]. In this case the property to be conveyed was specifically mentioned and described in the power of attorney; and the power of attorney was executed and acknowledged at Carlisle, in the state of Pennsylvania, by husband and wife, under their hands and seals, and the acknowledgment and authentication of the instruments were in all respects in accordance with the provision of the statutes in force in the District of Columbia, providing the manner and form in which the real estate of femes covert could be conveyed. Indeed, we do not understand that the statutory requirement in respect to form of acknowledgment and authentication thereof is a matter of objection. The terms of the statutes, 'any grantor or bargainor of any lands or tenements' being out of the province; or 'any person or persons conveying,' etc., not residing in the province *at the time, etc., may acknowledge [66 said deed by letter of attorney, well and sufficiently proved, etc., are sufficient to embrace femes covert, authorized to sell and convey their real estate. If not, then the husband could not sell and convey by power of attorney, free of the contingent right of dower of his wife, for if the wife could not acknowledge by power of attorney a deed for the conveyance of her own real estate, she would be equally unable to acknowledge by power of attorney a deed for the relinquishment of dower in the lands of her husband. Such disability, we think, was never intended by the legislatures passing the statutes to which we have referred, to be fixed upon femes covert having lands with right to convey the same."

We give great weight to the views expressed by the chief justice in regard to these statutes of Maryland because, as is well known, he occupied for many years a seat upon the bench as chief justice of the court of appeals of that state, and is specially familiar with its laws and the construction given them by the courts of the state. In addition to such circumstances, and from a perusal of the various statutes cited, our own judgment concurs with the court of appeals upon this question. We think a clear implication arises from the provisions of these acts that a power of attorney such as has been described, and acknowledged as already mentioned, was good in 1859 in this District. We can think of no good reason for excluding such implication. Where the person is by the statute allowed to do the principal thing directly, we think she could do it by power of attorney as described in this case. The power to convey includes in such case the power to appoint another to do the same thing. We therefore agree with the views expressed by some of the text-writers, when power is given by statute to married women to convey their interest in real estate where their husbands join in the conveyance and where the private examination is made, that in such cases the right of the wife to dispose of it by power of attorney joined in by her husband and where she was privately examined, etc., would naturally be implied. The common law which incapacitates a married woman from making a [67 contract *in general is so far altered by the statute as to permit her to execute a power of attorney and to therein contract to ratify his acts, instead of conveying directly, as the statute in terms provides. See 3 Washb. Real Prop. 4th ed. p. 258. The author there says: "It is laid down unqualifiedly, in some of the states, that a married woman cannot make a valid power of attorney, even jointly with her husband, to make a deed of her interest. But it is difficult to perceive any reason for the rule where she can do the principal thing herself; and such a right is clearly recognized by statute in Massachusetts. A similar right is also recognized by statute in New York." We do not think the aid of a statute is necessary. When the power is given her by law to convey directly, she can by the same ceremonies authorize another to do the act for her. The reason which would prevent it is, as we think, entirely too technical, fragile, and refined for constant use. It is said in Story on Agency, § 6: "So in regard to married women, ordinarily, they are incapable of appointing an agent or attorney; and, even in case of a joint suit at law, an appointment of an attorney by a married woman is void; and her husband may make an attorney for both. But where a married woman is capable of doing an act, or of transferring property or rights with the assent of her husband, there, perhaps, she may, with the assent of her husband, appoint an agent or attorney to do the same." In this case we hold that, as the wife was capable of conveying her real estate in Washington in 1859, by a deed, properly executed and acknowledged by her privily, etc., and joined in by her husband, she could accomplish the same thing by authorizing another to convey for her, where the authority was joined in by her husband, and the required private examination, etc., was made.

The court of appeals of Maryland has never, so far as we can discover, construed the statutes above cited in any manner opposed to the views expressed by the court of appeals of this District in this case. The cases of Webster's Lessees v. Hall, 2 Harr. & M'H. 19 [1 Am. Dec. 370]; Flannigan v. Young, 2 Harr. & M'H. 38; Hollingsworth v. M'Donald, 2 Harr. & J. 230 [3 Am. Dec. 545], and Lawrence v. Heister, 3 Harr. [68 & J. 371], *in which the above-named statutes are referred to, were all cases where deeds had been executed and where the acknowledgment of either the wife or husband was held to be defective under the provisions of those statutes. In some of the cases it was said to be necessary, in order to pass the interest of the wife in her land, that she and her husband must join in the deed as grantors, which must be properly acknowledged, etc. This statement was not made as descriptive of the only method by which a married woman could convey her land, but was made in relation to the defective manner in which the deed of conveyance was executed in the particular case, which was the case of a deed defectively acknowledged under the statute. No decision has been cited by counsel for the appellants from the courts of Maryland which is inconsistent with or opposed to the construction given to these statutes by the court below.

In Holladay v. Daily, 86 U. S. 19 Wall. 606 [22: 187], the plaintiff and his wife appointed an attorney with general power to convey land which belonged to the husband. The attorney in fact subsequently conveyed the land, and the plaintiff Holladay, after such conveyance, alleging that he had never received any of the consideration money recited in the deed, sued to recover back the possession of the land. The only question was as to the sufficiency in law of the power of attorney from Holladay and wife to Hughes, the attorney in fact, and his deed thereunder to pass the title of the husband. It was held that the power was sufficient, the court saying: "Here the object, and the sole object, of the power was to enable the attorney to pass the title freed from any possible claim of the wife; and under the law of Colorado that result could be accomplished by the deed of the husband alone as fully without as with her signature." What was said by the learned justice in delivering the opinion of the court in that case in regard to the manner in which the interest of married women in real estate could be conveyed was not necessary to the decision of the case, the point decided being that, considering its form, the power of attorney signed by the husband and wife was valid to convey his interest in the real property.

*Finally, upon this branch of the case, [69 we also concur with the lower court in holding that the 1st section of the act of Congress, already mentioned, contains a clear legislative recognition of the right to make this power of attorney. In this case, we think this fact is entitled to exceptional consideration. The act was evidently drawn with care, and it fully and plainly describes the different defects of the various instruments upon which it was intended to operate. Although the section is quite long and the phraseology is somewhat involved, yet the meaning of the section is perfectly clear. Certain provisions therein fully recognize the then existing right of a married woman to appoint jointly with her husband an attorney in fact to convey lands owned by her in this District, and language is used for the purpose of curing certain named defects which might exist in the execution or acknowledgment of such a paper. Speaking of the acknowledgment, the statute in the 1st section proceeds in this way: "And provided, also, That when the power of attorney shall have [been] executed by a feme covert, the same shall be effectual and sufficient if there shall have been such an acknowledgment of the same as would be sufficient, under the provisions of this act, to pass her estate and interest therein were she a party executing the deed of conveyance, the record and copy thereof of any deed recorded as aforesaid to be evidence thereof, in the same manner and to have the same effect as if such deed had been originally executed, acknowledged, and recorded according to law." It had already been provided in the section "that the certificate of acknowledgment by a feme covert shall show that the acknowledgment was made 'apart' or 'privily' from her husband, or use some other term importing that her acknowledgment was made out of his presence, and also that she acknowledged or declared that she willingly executed or that she willingly acknowledged the deed, or that the same was her voluntary act, or to that effect."

The acknowledgment attached to the power of attorney in this case was sufficient under the provisions of this act to pass the estate and interest of Mrs. Ransom if she had been a 70] *party executing a deed conveying her real estate in the District.

Upon a consideration of all the circumstances, we have no doubt that the power of attorney in question was properly executed and acknowledged, and that it authorized the person named therein as attorney in fact to convey Mrs. Ransom's real estate situated in this District.

(2) The next question which arises is whether this power of attorney was revoked by the war which broke out between the two sections of the country in 1861.

Lieutenant Ransom, although one of the last officers to go out, did resign his commission in the army of the United States and went south and entered the army of the Confederacy, in which before the close of the war, he attained high rank. His wife followed him, so that during the war they were both inside the lines of the Confederacy.

We are of opinion that the war did not revoke the power of attorney executed by Mrs. Ransom and her husband. It is not every agency that is necessarily revoked by the breaking out of a war between two countries in which the principal and agent respectively live. Certain kinds of agencies are undoubtedly revoked by the breaking out of hostilities. Agents of an insurance company, it is said, would come within that rule. New York Life Insurance Company v. Davis, 95 U. S. 425 [24: 453]. In that case Mr. Justice Bradley, in delivering the opinion of the court, said:

"That war suspends all commercial intercourse between the citizens of two belligerent countries or states, except so far as may be allowed by the sovereign authority, has been so often asserted and explained in this court within the last fifteen years that any further discussion of that proposition would be out of place. As a consequence of this fundamental proposition, it must follow that no active business can be maintained, either personally or by correspondence, or through an agent, by the citizens of one belligerent with the citizens of the other. The only exception to the rule recognized in the books, if we lay out of view contracts for ransom and other matters of absolute necessity, is that of allowing the payment *of debts to an agent of an alien enemy, [71 where such agent resides in the same state with the debtor. But this indulgence is subject to restrictions. In the first place, it must not be done with the view of transmitting the funds to the principal during the continuance of the war; though, if so transmitted without the debtor's connivance, he will not be responsible for it."

The learned judge then adds that, in order to the subsistence of the agency during the war, it must have the assent of the parties.

These remarks were made in relation to the case then before the court, which was an action on a policy of life insurance issued by a New York corporation before the war upon the life of Davis, a citizen and resident of the state of Virginia. The premiums were regularly paid until the beginning of the war, the last one having been made December 28, 1860. Previous to the war the company had an agent residing in Petersburg, Virginia, where the assured also resided, and premiums on the policy had been paid him in the usual way. About a year after the war broke out the agent entered the Confederate service and remained there until the close of the war. An offer of payment of the premium due in December, 1861, was made to the agent, which he declined to receive, alleging that he had received no receipts from the company, and that the money, if he did receive it, would be confiscated by the Confederate government. He testified that he refused to receive any premiums, had no connection with the company during the war, and after it terminated did not resume his agency. Davis died in September, 1867. The plaintiff below was assignee of the policy, and claimed to recover the amount of $10,000, on the ground that he was guilty of no laches and that at the close of the war the policy revived. The judge instructed the jury that if the assured was ready and offered to pay his premium to the agent in Virginia, after the breaking out of the war, there was no forfeiture of the policy, although the agent refused to receive the money, if within reasonable time after the war he endeavored to pay his premium and the company refused to receive it. The defendant contended that the war put an end *to the agency, and that the[72 offer to pay the premium to the former agent was of no validity, and the failure to pay rendered the policy void. This court held that the case was nearly on all fours with that of New York Life Insurance Company v. Statham, 93 U. S. 24 [23: 789], but the point as to the supposed power of an agent of a company in the adhering states to receive premiums in a state in insurrection after the war broke out not having been specially adverted to in the opinion of the court in that case, it was particularly considered in the Davis Case, as above quoted from. It was in relation to such an agency that the remarks were made. Agents of a life insurance company are undoubtedly engaged in the active business of their principal. Their duty is to receive the premiums for all policies obtained by them and to transmit such premiums to the home office. The prompt transmission of such premiums is a necessity for the successful prosecution of the business of the company. Upon their receipt the company is able to invest them in some interest-bearing security, and thus provide funds for the ultimate payment of the policy when it matures. It is easy to see that active and continuous business of such a nature could not be carried on during a war where the principal and the agent reside in the different countries engaged in such war.

In the case of Kershaw v. Kelsey, 100 Mass. 561 [97 Am. Dec. 124], the general subject of the contracts and business entered into and transacted between the citizens of the different states at war with each other is examined, and the question treated with great care by Mr. Justice Gray in delivering the opinion of the supreme judicial court of Massachusetts, and numerous authorities are referred to and commented upon in the opinion. In the course of that opinion it was said at page 572 [97 Am. Dec. 135]: "The result is, that the law of nations, as judicially declared, prohibits all intercourse between citizens of the two belligerents which is inconsistent with the state of war between their countries; and that this includes any act of voluntary submission to the enemy, or receiving his protection; as well any act or contract which tends to increase his resources; and every kind of trading or commercial dealing or 73] intercourse, whether by *transmission of money or goods, or orders for the delivery of either, between the two countries, directly or indirectly, or through the intervention of third persons or partnerships, or by contracts in any form looking to or involving such transmission, or by insurances upon trade with or by the enemy. Beyond the principle of these cases the prohibition has not been carried by judicial decision. The more sweeping statements in the text-books are taken from the dicta which we have already examined, and in none of them is any other example given than those just mentioned. At this age of the world, when all the tendencies of the law of nations are to exempt individuals and private contracts from injury or restraint in consequence of war between their governments, we are not disposed to declare such contracts unlawful as have not been heretofore adjudged to be inconsistent with a state of war."

Under the circumstances of this case, we think the attorney in fact had the right to make the conveyance he did. It was not an agency of the class such as is mentioned in New York Life Insurance Company v. Davis, supra, and was not necessarily revoked and avoided by the war. Where it is obviously and plainly against the interest of the principal that the agency should continue, or where its continuance would impose some new obligation or burden, the assent of the principal to the continuance of the agency after the war broke out will not be presumed, but must be proved, either by his subsequent ratification or in some other manner. And, on the other hand, where it is the manifest interest of the principal that the agency, constituted before the war, should continue, the assent of the principal will be presumed. Or, if the agent continues to act as such, and his so acting is subsequently ratified by the principal, then those acts are just as valid and binding upon the principal as if no war had intervened. New York Life Insurance Company v. Davis, supra.

It is entirely plain, as we think, that the mere fact of the breaking out of a war does not necessarily, and as a matter of law, revoke every agency. Whether it is revoked or not depends upon the circumstances surrounding the case and the *nature and character of the [74 agency. This case shows that in 1859, at the time when the power of attorney was executed, Lieutenant Ransom and his wife were desirous of realizing their share of the value of the land in controversy. It was vacant, unimproved land in the city of Washington, and the charge for taxes was quite burdensome. The parties desired to realize the money. No sale of the property was effected from that time until the latter part of 1864, or early part of 1865. There is no evidence of any such change of circumstances as would naturally suggest a revocation of the authority to sell, but, on the contrary, the testimony is otherwise. It appears to have been to the interest of all parties to sell and thus to free themselves from a constant source of expense. In addition to that, the evidence is clear and sufficient that after the sale the action of the attorney in fact of Mrs. Ransom was ratified and confirmed by her by the receipt of her share of the purchase money or its expenditure for her benefit and with her assent and approval. Her sister, Mrs. Gibson, testified that Mrs. Ransom's share of the purchase money was either paid over to her or expended for her at her direction. This full and complete ratification of the act of the agent shows conclusively the assent of the principal to the continuance of the agency, notwithstanding the war. Some criticism is made upon this testimony of Mrs. Gibson because, after the passage of so many years, she is unable to state definitely which course was pursued, whether the money was paid to Mrs. Ransom, or whether it was expended for her at her direction. We think the criticism is not well founded. Mrs. Gibson might well have been able to state with absolute certainty that she either paid the money to Mrs. Ransom or expended it for her at her direction, and yet after the lapse of time she might also be unable to state with like certainty which of the two courses was pursued. It is perfectly possible for a witness to be certain of the ultimate fact and yet to have forgotten the intermediate facts upon which that ultimate fact was based.

Here we have a power of attorney properly executed for the purpose of selling, among other lots, this real estate in question, and a state of circumstances which fairly shows that *it was for the benefit and interest of the [75 principal that such real estate should be sold at the time the sale in fact occurred; we have also the principal's receipt of her share of the purchase money in 1865, with full knowledge of all the facts, and her acquiescence in and approval of the action of her attorney up to the time of her death in February, 1881. Upon these facts we think it clear that the instrument executed by the attorney in fact was as valid and effectual as if no war had intervened. The ratification of the act of the attorney was full and complete. It recognized and assented to the continued existence of the agency. The purchase money for the land was received by the principal, and to permit her heirs after her death to repudiate the transaction on the ground that the power of attorney had been revoked would be at war with every principle of equity and fair dealing. This principle applies as strongly in the case of a married woman as in any other, and it will not permit her, or, upon her death, her heirs at law, to repudiate a transaction the benefits of which she received with full knowledge of the circumstances attending it, and yet claim to recover an estate which had been sold with her authority and the purchase money for which had been paid to her. Bein v. Heath, 47 U. S. 6 How. 247 [12: 424]; Canal Bank v. Partee, 99 U. S. 325, 329 [25: 390, 392]; Bedford v. Burton, 106 U. S. 338 [27: 112], considers generally the obligation of married women to do equity under circumstances somewhat similar in principle to the present case.

Nor does the act of Congress of July 17, 1862, to suppress insurrections, etc. (12 Stat. at L. 589), chap. 189, have any effect upon the sales, transfers, or conveyance of the estate and property of persons in rebellion after September 23, 1862, except as to the United States. As against that government, the transfers of property liable to seizure were null and void; they were not void as between private parties or against any other party than the United States. Conrad v. Waples, 96 U. S. 279, 288 [24: 721, 723].

(3) Even though the power of attorney were valid and had not been revoked by the war, it is objected that the instrument executed by the attorney in fact conveyed no title, but at best was a mere contract of sale; and,

76] *(4) That this objection is not cured by the act of Congress, above set forth.

These two questions may be considered together; and it makes no difference in the result whether the instrument be construed as conveying a legal title, or an equitable title only.

Some of the justices of this court concur in opinion with the court of appeals that, taking all the provisions of the instrument together, it did not amount to a deed of conveyance, but only to an agreement to convey made by an attorney who was authorized by his power to make a conveyance. In that aspect of the case, the instrument would convey an equitable title which would afford a good defense to this bill; and it would be unnecessary to invoke the curative act of Congress.

But a majority of this court is of opinion that the instrument was in the nature of a conveyance of the legal title, though defectively executed, and that it came within the provisions of the act, and the defect was thereby cured.

We agree generally that although there are words of conveyance in præsenti in a contract for the purchase and sale of lands, still if from the whole instrument it is manifest that further conveyances were contemplated by the parties, it will be considered an agreement to convey and not a conveyance. The whole question is one of intention to be gathered from the instrument itself. Jackson, Shipley, v. Moncrief, 5 Wend. 26; Ogden v. Brown, 33 Pa. 247; Phillips v. Swank, 120 Pa. 76.

Looking at the instrument executed by the attorney it will be seen that he refers to and annexes the power of attorney executed to him by Robert Ransom, Jr., and Mrs. Ransom, his wife, states the consideration received by him from Mr. Tayloe, acknowledges its receipt, and then acknowledges that he has "bargained and sold to Mr. B. O. Tayloe, his heirs and assigns, all the right, title, and estate of them, the said Robert Ransom, Jr., and Mary Ransom, being one undivided third part of, in, and to" the various pieces of ground, including the ground in question, and then adds "with the improvements and appurtenances." Stopping here, and *construing the language of the instrument, [77 there can be no question that it was executed as a conveyance of the interest of the principals in the land, and was intended as such by the attorney in fact. Although the instrument shows an intention on the part of the attorney to convey the title of his principals, yet, instead of signing their names by himself as attorney, he signs his own name, preceding the signature with the statement, "In testimony whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and seal this 29th day of November, 1864." This is one of the defective executions of an instrument under a power of attorney, spoken of in the act of Congress. It is alleged, however, that the following language, which appears at the end of the instrument executed by Huntt, changes the character of that instrument, and shows that it was not intended as a conveyance but as a simple contract of sale. The language referred to comes immediately after the words "with the improvements and appurtenances," and is as follows: "And I hereby further agree, in behalf of said Robert and Mary Ransom, that they shall and will, as soon as convenient, make and execute a proper deed of conveyance of said premises to said Benjamin O. Tayloe in fee simple."

We do not think this language changes the effect of the prior portion of the instrument, nor does it show that the intention of the person executing it was simply to enter into a contract of sale. He is the only one who signs it. The instrument shows that he is executing it as an attorney in fact and by virtue of the power of attorney annexed to the instrument. Although he assumes therein to bargain and sell (in legal effect to convey) to Mr. Tayloe, his heirs and assigns, all the right, title, and estate of his principals, being a one undivided third part of the real estate in question, yet he also agrees in the same instrument, in addition to the conveyance by himself of the title of his principals, to also obtain from them a deed of the same premises. This portion of the instrument is a contract in the nature of a covenant for further assurance. It may well be that the grantee, Mr. Tayloe, while taking the conveyance from the attorney in fact, and paying the full consideration for the land, would also desire to obtain *a deed [78 conveying the same title and executed by the parties in person. This desire may easily be understood even upon the assumption that the instrument executed by virtue of the power of attorney was intended to convey the title. Such a deed would remove all possible question which could, in any event, arise, based upon the fact that the conveyance was executed by an attorney instead of by a principal. The agreement to obtain a conveyance from his principals is entirely consistent with the prior portion of the instrument in which the attorney assumes to convey the title by virtue of the power of attorney which he annexes. If the attorney had, instead of agreeing in behalf of his principals that they should make and execute a proper deed of conveyance of the premises, agreed that he would himself at some future time make such a deed, a different question would be presented, for in that case, taking the whole instrument together, it might be argued that there was no intention at the time to convey the title. But where, in addition to conveying the title himself by apt words, clearly expressed, he simply agrees to also procure a proper deed from his principals at some future time, there is nothing inconsistent in that agreement with the intention to himself convey the title by virtue of the power. Nor do we regard the fact as material upon this latter point that in the acknowledgment of the instrument in question, taken by two aldermen who were ex officio justices of the peace, they describe the instrument as a certain contract of sale, and certify that "Mr. Huntt executed said contract and acknowledged the same to be his act and deed." What the aldermen may have regarded as the legal effect of the instrument is not of much importance, and whether they describe is as a contact of sale or as a conveyance cannot alter the character of the paper itself or its legal effect.

Being of opinion that the paper was in the nature of a conveyance, we also think that the defective execution of the instrument was cured by the act of Congress. This instrument was executed by the attorney in fact, who acknowledged the same to be his act and deed instead of the act and deed of his principals, and the act of Congress provides that in such case 79] *the deed shall have the same effect as if such attorney in fact had acknowledged the deed to be the deed of the grantors (his principals). One or two other defects existed of a like nature, that is, of a nature which might be cured by a legislative act, and which were cured by the act in question.

The statute applies where the parties intended to convey, thought they had conveyed, and yet had not complied with the requisites necessary to make the conveyance in all things effective. In such case, especially where the consideration for the instrument has been received and retained, curative statutes may be passed which give validity to the defective instruments to the same extent as was intended by the parties at the time when they were executed. Watson v. Mercer, 33 U. S. 8 Pet. 88, 110 [8: 876, 884]; Randall v. Krieger, 90 U. S. 23 Wall. 137 [23: 124].

The chief objection to the act, assuming that the instrument was a conveyance, is that it does not apply in this case as plaintiffs urge, because at the time when the act was passed the parties claiming through this deed were not, as plaintiffs contend, in the actual possession of the land covered by it. The statute declares the instrument is to have the effect and validity to pass the fee simple to the estate intended to be conveyed and to bar dower in the real estate therein mentioned "in favor of parties in actual possession, claiming under and through such deeds." It is said that this limitation to the parties in actual possession refers to the time when the act was passed, and if the parties claiming under the deed were not at that time in actual possession of the premises, the statute has no application to them. We think the act applies if at the time when it was passed the parties claiming under the defective instrument were in actual possession of the land, and that the act also applies if the parties claiming under such instrument were not in actual possession at the time of its passage, but subsequently came into such possession. The act cured the defects in the instrument mentioned therein, if when it passed the parties were in actual possession, claiming under such instruments, and if thereafter ousted they could still claim the benefit of the act even in an attempt to regain possession. If not in actual possession *when the act was passed, they could not[80 have the benefit thereof in an attempt to obtain possession thereafter. But if thereafter they were in actual possession, they could defend that possession under the act, so far as their title depended upon defective instruments existing at the time when the act was passed and which were of a character covered by its terms.

We think this is a fair construction of the act, and that it ought to be liberally construed for the purpose of obtaining the benefits it was clearly intended to give in the case of a defective execution of otherwise valid instruments. This view renders it unnecessary to decide as to the validity of the objection that these defendants were not in actual possession when the act was passed. We do not decide whether they were or not. They were in actual and undisturbed possession at the commencement of this suit, and they can avail themselves of the act to protect such possession and their title under the deed in question.

(5) The fifth objection taken we have already answered in holding that Mrs. Ransom did, in fact, receive the purchase price of her share in the land with full knowledge that it was such purchase price, and thereby ratified and confirmed the act of her attorney.

By this disposition of the whole case upon the merits we are not to be considered as deciding that parties situated as the plaintiffs were in this case, out of possession, can maintain an action for partition. We have not discussed that question, and do not decide it, because it was unnecessary on account of the views we have stated in relation to the other aspects of the case.

We are of opinion that the complainants have failed to make out a cause of action, and the judgment dismissing the bill must therefore be affirmed.

Mr. Justice White did not sit in this case and took no part in its decision.

v.
AULTMAN, MILLER, & COMPANY.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 81-92.)

Jurisdiction of this court—Michigan statutes as to foreign corporations—contract, when made —when not made in Michigan.

1. Where a case is brought to this court from a circuit court under the act of March 3, 1891, § 5, the jurisdiction of this court does not depend upon the question whether the right claimed under the United States Constitution has been upheld or denied in the court below, and is not limited to the constitutional question, but includes the whole case.
2. Under the Michigan statute making void all contracts made in that state by any foreign corporation which has not filed its articles of association and paid its franchise tax, a contract made elsewhere than in Michigan is valid, although it is to be performed in that state.
3. A contract is made when, and not before, it has been executed or accepted by both parties, so as to become binding upon both.
4. A contract signed in Michigan by the parties (one of whom is a foreign corporation which signed by its agent), which stipulates that it shall not be valid until approved at the principal office of the corporation in Ohio, is not, when so approved in Ohio, a contract made in Michigan, within its statute invalidating contracts by foreign corporations which have not filed their articles and paid a franchise tax.

[No. 109.]

Argued November 8, 9, 1897. Decided January 10, 1898.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Michigan to review a judgment for the plaintiff, Aultman, Miller, & Co., a corporation of Ohio, against William Holder, defendant, a citizen of Michigan, for the price of agricultural machines furnished by plaintiff to defendant and sold by the latter under a contract in writing. Affirmed.

See same case below, 68 Fed. Rep. 467.

Statement by Mr. Justice Gray:

This was an action of assumpsit, brought September 21, 1894, in the circuit court of the United States for the eastern district of Michigan, by Aultman, Miller, & Co., a corporation of the state of Ohio, against William Holder, a citizen of the state of Michigan, to recover the price of agricultural machines furnished by the plaintiff to the defendant, and sold by the defendant, under a contract in writing, the material parts of which were as follows:

"This agreement, made this 20th day of February, 1894, between Aultman, Miller, & Co., a corporation duly incorporated under the laws of the state of Ohio, of Akron, Ohio, of the first part, and William Holder, of Laingsburgh, county of Shiawassee, and state of Michigan, of the second part, witnesseth, That the party of the second part is hereby authorized to sell Buckeye mowers, reapers, and binders and extra parts thereof in the following territory, viz., Laingsburgh and vicinity," and other specified territory in Michigan, "for and during the season of 1894, on the following terms and conditions, viz.:

"The party of the second part agrees: First. To use all reasonable diligence in canvassing and supplying said territory *with said ma-[82 chines." Second. "To sell the said machines at the retail list prices authorized by said first party;" "to grant credit to such persons only as are of well-known responsibility;" "to see that all notes taken for machines sold are drawn on blanks furnished by the said first party;" "and, in all cases of doubt as to the responsibility of the purchaser, to require a mortgage on property, real or personal;" and to redeem all notes not accepted by the party of the first part. Third. To indorse, unless sufficiently secured, "all notes given by renters and parties owning no real estate." Fourth. "That all machines and parts of machines, and all other goods received on commission under this contract, shall be held by the said second party on special storage and deposit as the property of the party of the first part until converted into notes or money," and such notes shall remain the property of the first party; and, "in all cases where machines are sold for cash, or part cash and notes, all such cash received shall be promptly remitted." Fifth. "To see that all machines sold are properly set up and started;" and "to keep a correct record of sales." Sixth. To receive all "goods shipped or delivered on account of said first party;" to pay the freight on them, and keep them insured; "to keep all unsold goods well housed and cared for, subject to the order of the party of the first part;" and to make no charge for handling or storage. Seventh. To furnish "repairs, free of charge, to customers," only in case of flaw or defect. Eighth. "To make prompt and accurate reports of machines on hand, as often as requested by the first party or its general agent; to promptly execute orders for transfer of machines, if any are on hand unsold; and, in case of failure to make such report or transfers, to pay said first party for all machines remaining on hand at settlement unsold by reason of such failure, at the option of said first party." Ninth. "To sell, or assist in the sale of, no other mowing machines, or combined mowing and reaping machines, or harvesters and binders, in said territory, during the continuance of this contract." Tenth. "To sell and deliver all machines set up and used as samples, or settle for same in cash or approved notes at settlement time." Eleventh. To advertise this agency.

Across the back of the contract were written these words:

"Approved April 29, 1894.

"Ira M. Milloy, Secretary."

The declaration alleged that "on February 27, 1894, at the said village of Laingsburgh and at the city of Lansing, in the eastern district of Michigan, the said plaintiff, by D. C. Gillett and R. H. Worth, its duly authorized agents, entered into a written contract with the defendant, William Holder," above stated; and that "afterwards, to wit, on April 27, 1894, the said written contract was approved by the plaintiff at its office in the city of Akron, in the state of Ohio, and the same then and there became and was a binding and valid contract between the defendant and the plaintiff, according to the terms thereof, to wit, at the city of Lansing, in the eastern district of Michigan:" that the plaintiff faithfully performed its contract, and in pursuance thereof shipped to the defendant a large number of mowers, reapers, and binders, and extra parts for the same; and the defendant sold them under the contract, and became liable to pay the plaintiff the sum of $5,052.56; and had never paid him that sum, or any part thereof. The declaration, besides a count on the contract, contained the common counts.

The defendant relied on the statute of Michigan of 1891, chap. 182, § 1, as amended by the statute of 1893, chap. 79, and copied in the margin; † and alleged that the contract sued on was *made and to be performed in the state [85 of Michigan, within the meaning of the statute; that the plaintiff being a foreign corporation, was at the time of the execution of that contract doing business in the state of Michigan, within the meaning and application of the statute, and had not complied with its requirements; and that the contract was therefore absolutely void and without force as against the defendant.

The parties waived in writing a trial by jury, and submitted the case to the decision of the court, which found the following facts:

On April 29, 1894, the parties entered into the contract above stated; and it was executed, accepted, and approved, as *set forth there- [86 in, and in the indorsement thereon. Its provi-

Sec. 1. The people of the state of Michigan enact, That every corporation or association hereafter incorporated or formed by consolidation or otherwise, by or under any general or special law of this state, which is required by law to file articles of association with the secretary of state, and every foreign corporation or association which shall hereafter be permitted to transact business in this state, which shall not, prior to the passage of this act, have filed or recorded its articles of association under the laws of this state and been thereby authorized to do business therein, shall pay to the secretary of state a franchise fee of ½ of 1 mill upon each dollar of the authorized capital stock of such corporation or association, and a proportionate fee upon any and each subsequent increase thereof; and that every corporation heretofore organized or doing business in this state, which shall hereafter increase the amount of its authorized capital stock, shall pay a franchise fee of ½ of 1 mill upon each dollar of such increase of authorized capital stock of such corporation or association, and a proportionate fee upon any and each subsequent increase thereof: Provided, that the fee herein provided, except in cases of increase of capital stock, shall in no case be less than $5; and in case any corporation or association hereafter incorporated under the law of this state, or foreign corporation authorized to do business in this state, has no authorized capital stock, then in such case each and every corporation or association so incorporated or doing business in this state shall pay a franchise fee of $5. All contracts made in this state after the 1st day of January, 1894, by any corporation which has not first complied with the provisions of this act, shall be wholly void.

This act is ordered to take immediate effect.

Approved May 13, 1893.

sions, so far as the plaintiff is concerned, have been fulfilled, and there is a balance due to the plaintiff under it of $5,052.56. The plaintiff is a corporation organized and existing under the general laws of Ohio, having its corporation office and its manufactory at Akron in that state; and does not manufacture any goods in the state of Michigan. It sells its goods in Michigan by means of local commission agents, and has a general agent at Lansing in Michigan: its commission agents are under contracts with it similar to that sued on; and all contracts are sent to the plaintiff at Akron, for approval or rejection, before taking any effect. The goods manufactured by the plaintiff at its factory in Akron, and sold by it in Michigan, are shipped from the factory upon orders received from commission agents and forwarded by the general agent from Lansing to Akron. Goods are shipped, either directly to the commission agent, or in bulk to Lansing or elsewhere in Michigan, and reshipped in smaller lots to the commission agents. The plaintiff owns a warehouse in Lansing for the transfer of such reshipments, for the temporary storage of a small stock of extras or repairs, which experience has shown may be suddenly needed by customers throughout the state during the harvest season. Some of the commission agents throughout the state also keep on hand a very small stock of repairs for the immediate use of their customers. These are partly commission goods, and partly goods sold directly to them. Accounts with every commission agent in Michigan are kept at the plaintiff's office in Akron. The plaintiff effects settlements with its commission agents by sending copies of such accounts to its general agent, who goes over the season's work with each commission agent, collects the cash and notes taken in payment for machines sold, and forwards them to the plaintiff at Akron, subject to the plaintiff's approval or rejection of the notes. The notes are filed and kept by the plaintiff at Akron until just before maturity, when they are sent to the bank or to express agents for collection and remittance to Akron. The plaintiff has never filed a copy of its articles of association in the office of the 87]*secretary of state or in any other office in Michigan, or paid any franchise fee to the state of Michigan, or in any way complied, or attempted to comply, with the statute above mentioned.

Upon these findings of fact the court made the following conclusions of law: 1st. The plaintiff's business, as carried on under and in pursuance of the contract, is an interstate commerce business; and the plaintiff is not subject to the aforesaid statute; and the statute, so far as it applies, or purports to apply, to foreign corporations like the plaintiff, which are doing an interstate commerce business, is in conflict with the provision of the Constitution of the United States authorizing Congress to regulate interstate commerce. 2d. The contract was made and executed in the state of Ohio, and does not provide for the transaction of any business in Michigan other than an interstate commerce business, and the plaintiff is therefore within the protection of the Constitution of the United States. 3d. The plaintiff is entitled to recover the sum of $5,052.56. 68 Fed. Rep. 467.

Judgment was rendered for the plaintiff accordingly; and the defendant sued out a writ of error from this court, upon the ground that the case was one in which a law of a state was claimed to be in contravention of the Constitution of the United States, within the act of March 3, 1891 (26 Stat. at L. 828, chap. 517, § 5).

Mr. Clark C. Wood for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. John A. Bradley, Fred A. Baker, and Olin L. Sadler for defendant in error.

Mr. Fred A. Maynard, Attorney General of Michigan, filed a brief in behalf of that state by permission of the court.

Mr. Justice Gray delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought in the circuit court of the United States for the eastern district of Michigan, by a *manufacturing corpora- [88 tion of the state of Ohio, having its principal office and its factory at Akron in that state, against one of its commission agents, a citizen of Michigan, to recover the price of agricultural machines sold by the defendant in Michigan under a contract in writing, by which the plaintiff authorized the defendant to sell, within a certain territory in Michigan, such machines supplied to him by the plaintiff; and the defendant agreed to canvass the territory, to sell the machines at retail prices fixed by the plaintiff, to hold the unsold machines as the plaintiff's property, to keep and render account of sales, and to remit the proceeds to the plaintiff.

The defendant relied on a statute of Michigan of May 13, 1893, which required every foreign corporation, permitted to transact business in that state, and not having filed articles of association under its laws, to pay a franchise tax of ¼ of 1 mill upon each dollar of its capital stock; and further provided that "all contracts made in this state after January 1, 1894, by any corporation which has not first complied with the provisions of this act, shall be wholly void." Mich. Pub. Acts 1893, chap. 79, p. 82.

The circuit court, in giving judgment for the plaintiff, held that the contract was made in the state of Ohio, and that the statute of Michigan, so far as it applied to the business carried on by the plaintiff in that state under the contract, was in conflict with the Constitution of the United States authorizing Congress to regulate interstate commerce. 68 Fed. Rep. 467.

This was therefore a "case in which the Constitution or law of a state is claimed to be in contravention of the Constitution of the United States," and was rightly brought directly to this court by writ of error under the act of March 3, 1891 (26 Stat. at L. 828, chap. 517, § 5). Upon such a writ of error, differing in these respects from a writ of error to the highest court of a state, the jurisdiction of this court does not depend upon the question whether the right claimed under the Constitution of the United States has been upheld or denied in the court below; and the jurisdiction of this court is not *limited to the constitution- [89 al question, but includes the whole case. Whitten v. Tomlinson, 160 U. S. 231, 238 [40: 406, 411]; Penn Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Austin, 168 U. S. 685 [ante, 626].

But this court has not found it necessary to pass upon the constitutional question, because it is of the opinion that the contract is not within the statute set up by the defendant.

By the clear terms of the statute of Michigan, the invalidity of the contract does not depend upon the place where, or the time when, it is to be performed, but upon its being "made in this state after January 1, 1894." A contract made before that date is valid, although it is to be performed afterwards; and a contract made elsewhere than in Michigan is valid, although it is to be performed in this state.

A contract is made when, and not before, it has been executed or accepted by both parties, so as to become binding upon both.

This contract is admitted to have been drawn up at Laingsburgh in the state of Michigan, where the defendant resided. It begins by stating that it is "made this 20th day of February, 1894, between" the plaintiff and the defendant; and it ends with the clause, "In witness whereof, the parties hereunto have set their hands the day and date above written." Then follows the signature, "Aultman, Miller, & Co., by D. C. Gillett," who may be assumed to have been the plaintiff's local agent at Laingsburgh. That signature is followed by a stipulation, evidently addressed by the plaintiff to the other party to the contract, in these words: "This contract not valid unless countersigned by our manager at Lansing, Michigan, and approved at Akron, Ohio." Then follows the signature of the defendant, "William Holder," who thereby necessarily assents to this stipulation, as well as to the other terms of the contract. Both parties thus agree that the contract was not to be valid until countersigned by the plaintiff's manager at Lansing in Michigan, and also approved at Akron in Ohio, the site of the plaintiff's principal office. It further appears, upon the contract itself, that it was afterwards, on February 27, 1894, countersigned at Lansing, by "R. H. Worth, Manager;" and, by an indorsement on the con-
90]tract, *that it was approved at Akron April 29, 1894, as shown by the signature of "Ira M. Milloy, Secretary."

The plaintiff in its declaration alleged that on February 27, 1894, at Laingsburgh and Lansing, the plaintiff "by D C. Gillett and R. H. Worth, its duly authorized agents, entered into a written contract with the defendant." The date on which the plaintiff "entered into" the contract with the defendant is thus alleged to have been, not February 20, 1894, mentioned at the beginning of the contract as the day on which it was made, and which may have been the day on which it was signed at Laingsburgh, by Gillett in behalf of the plaintiff, and by the defendant in person, but February 27, 1894, the day on which it was countersigned at Lansing by Worth, the plaintiff's manager. The plaintiff thus assumed that the contract did not exist as a contract before it was countersigned by the plaintiff's manager at Lansing; and there is no more reason for assuming that it existed as a contract before it was approved at the plaintiff's principal office at Akron, for the stipulation above quoted required both countersigning by the manager at Lansing, and approval at Akron, to make it a valid contract. Accordingly, the declaration further alleged that "afterwards, to wit, on April 27, 1894, the said written contract was approved by the plaintiff at its office in the city of Akron, and the same then and there was and became a binding and valid contract between the defendant and the plaintiff, according to the terms thereof." The words "to wit, at the city of Lansing in the eastern district of Michigan," would seem to have been added by way of formal venue only, in accordance with the ancient mode of pleading in suing upon a transaction which took place abroad. As Lord Mansfield said, "No judge ever thought that when the declaration said in Fort St. George, viz., in Cheapside, that the plaintiff meant it was in Cheapside." Mostyn v. Fabrigas, 1 Cowp. 161, 177. See also McKenna v. Fisk, 42 U. S. 1 How. 241, 248 [11: 117, 119].

The circuit court found, as facts, that the parties entered into the contract on April 29, 1894, which was the date of its approval at the plaintiff's home office in Ohio; and that *it[91 was executed, accepted, and approved as set forth therein, and in the indorsement thereon.

Whether, therefore, we look to the contract itself, to the plaintiff's declaration, or to the findings of fact by the court, it clearly appears that the contract, when, after being drawn up in writing and signed by the plaintiff's local agent, it was tendered to the defendant and assented to and signed by him in Michigan, contained a distinct stipulation that it was not valid, unless, not only countersigned by the plaintiff's manager in Michigan, but also approved at the plaintiff's principal office in Ohio; and that it was on April 29, 1894, and at Akron in the state of Ohio, that the contract was approved by the plaintiff's secretary at its principal office, and then and there, for the first time, became a valid and binding contract between the parties. It cannot therefore be considered as "made," within the meaning of the statute in question, at any earlier time, or other place.

The approval at the plaintiff's home office was not a ratification by the plaintiff of an unauthorized act of one of its agents; for each of its agents, Gillett in first signing the contract, and Worth in countersigning it, appears to have acted within the strict limits of his authority. But the final approval by the plaintiff itself was an act which, according to the express stipulation of the parties, and in the contemplation of every person who affixed his signature to the paper, was a necessary step to complete the execution of the instrument by the plaintiff, and to make it a valid and binding contract between the parties.

The opinion of the supreme court of the state of Michigan in Seamans v. Temple Co., cited at the bar, contains nothing inconsistent with this conclusion. It was there held that a contract of insurance, made in another state by a corporation thereof, upon an application procured through its agents in Michigan upon property in Michigan, could not be sued on in the courts of Michigan, because of provisions of earlier statutes of Michigan, making it unlawful for any foreign insurance company to transact any business of insurance in the state, and for any person to aid in any way in procuring a policy 92] *of insurance by a foreign corporation upon property in the state. Howell's Mich. Ann. Stat. §§ 4331, 4354, 8136. And the court said: "If it be conceded that the contract was made in Wisconsin, and that the premiums and loss, if any, are payable there, it is as much in contravention of the policy of this state as though it had been made and was to be performed here. It cannot be supposed that the statutes cited were intended merely to prevent the act of making the contract in this state." 105 Mich. 400, 404 [28 L. R. A. 430].

The statute now before this court contains no such provisions as were contained in the statutes in question in that case; but it simply invalidates "contracts made in this state" by a foreign corporation which has not filed its articles of association in Michigan and paid the franchise tax imposed by this statute.

Judgment affirmed.

CHESAPEAKE & OHIO RAILWAY COMPANY.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 92-103.)

Order remanding cause—when petition for removal may be filed—petition may be amended—trial in state court.

1. An order of the circuit court remanding a cause to the state court because there is no separable controversy between the citizens of different states is not reviewable by this court.
2. A petition for removal filed as soon as the case becomes a removable one,—as, when the action is discontinued against defendants as to whom there is no separable controversy who are citizens of the same state with the plaintiff,—is filed in time, although it is after the time when defendant was required to answer.
3. A petition for removal may be amended in the circuit court of the United States, by leave of that court, so as to state more fully and distinctly the facts which support the grounds of removal, if upon the face of the petition and of the whole record of the state court sufficient grounds for removal are shown.
4. Making a defense in a state court after that court has declined to surrender jurisdiction of the case does not defeat the defendant's right to insist that the case has been lawfully removed into the circuit court of the United States, where the objection to jurisdiction is saved upon the record.

Argued December 6, 7, 1897. Decided January 10, 1898.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Kentucky to review a judgment of that court dismissing an action brought by John T. Powers, plaintiff, against the Chesapeake & Ohio Railway Company et al., to recover damages for injuries suffered by plaintiff from the running of the train of said company against him by the negligence of the defendants. Judgment affirmed.

See same case below, 65 Fed. Rep. 129.

Statement by Mr. Justice Gray:

This action was brought September 7, 1893, in an inferior court of the state of Kentucky, by Powers against the Chesapeake & Ohio Railway Company, as well as against Boyer, Evans, and Hickey, the conductor, engineer, and fireman of a railway train of the company, to recover damages for injuries suffered by the plaintiff from the running of the train against him by the negligence of the defendants. The summons was not served on Hickey, but was served on the other defendants.

The railway company, before its answer was required by the law of Kentucky to be filed, removed the case into the circuit court of the United States, upon a petition alleging that the matter in dispute exceeded, exclusive of interest and costs, the sum or value of $2,000; that the railway company was a citizen of the states of Virginia and West Virginia only, and the plaintiff was a citizen of the state of Kentucky; that there was in this suit a separate controversy, which could be fully determined, as between them; and that the other defendants were fraudulently and improperly joined for the sole purpose of defeating the railway company's right of removal. In the circuit court of the United States, a transcript of the record of the proceedings in the state court was filed; and after a hearing a motion by the plaintiff to remand the case to the state court was sustained by an opinion filed and entered of record which stated that the plaintiff was a citizen of Kentucky and the railway company a citizen of Virginia, and the other defendants were admitted to be citizens of Kentucky; and held that there was no separable *controversy [94 between the railway company and the plaintiff; and the case was ordered to be remanded accordingly.

The railway company then filed in the state court a transcript of the proceedings in the circuit court of the United States, and an answer containing a demurrer, and denying the facts alleged in the original petition, and alleging that the other defendants were fellow servants of the plaintiff. A year after the first petition for removal, and when the case was called for trial before a jury in the state court, the plaintiff discontinued his action against the individual defendants; the court overruled the demurrer; and the railway company filed a second petition for removal, like the first, except in alleging that in bringing this suit Evans and Hickey were fraudulently and improperly joined as defendants for the purpose of defeating the railway company's right of removal; that because of their joinder the cause had been remanded to the state court; and that the action, having now been discontinued as against them, was for the first time pending against the railway company alone. The state court denied the petition for removal, and the railway company excepted to the denial; the trial proceeded in that court, resulting in a verdict and judgment for the plaintiff; and the railway company appealed to the court of appeals of the state.

At the next term of the circuit court of the United States, the railway company filed a transcript of the record of the proceedings in the state court. The plaintiff moved to remand the case to the state court upon the grounds that it was not removable under the acts of Congress; that the second petition for removal was not filed within the time fixed by those acts; and that the question sought to be made by the second petition for removal had been already adjudged by the circuit court of the United States, and its former adjudication was a bar to the second proceeding for removal. The railway company (having filed affidavits showing that Boyer and Hickey were citizens of Kentucky, and that the discontinuance of the action as against the individual defendants was made by the plaintiff's attorney without their request or knowledge and without any consid 95] eration moving *from them) was permitted by the circuit court of the United States to amend its second petition for removal, by substituting therein the name of Boyer for that of Evans, in correction of a clerical mistake in the petition; and by alleging that Evans was a citizen of Virginia, and Boyer and Hickey were citizens of Kentucky, and that by reason of the fraudulent and improper joinder of them to defeat the railway company's right of removal, the plaintiff was estopped to deny that the second petition for removal was not filed within the time required by law.

The circuit court of the United States, being of opinion that the plaintiff had fraudulently joined Boyer and Hickey as defendants in order to defeat the removal of the case to that court, and was therefore estopped to deny that the second petition for removal was filed in time, granted the petition for removal, and denied the motion to remand. 65 Fed. Rep. 129. The plaintiff then pleaded, in abatement of the cause in the circuit court of the United States, and to the jurisdiction of that court, the proceedings in the state court in which the railway company took part after the denial of its second petition for a removal, and its appeal to the court of appeals of the state; and, for the same reasons, moved the court to defer all proceedings until the termination of the case in the courts of the state, and in this court if the case should be brought here from the courts of Kentucky; and also moved to remand the cause to the state court. The circuit court of the United States sustained a demurrer to the plea, and denied the motions to defer and to remand.

The case was afterwards called for trial in the circuit court of the United States; and, the plaintiff insisting on his objection that the court was without jurisdiction, because the case had never been properly removed into that court, and declining for that reason to recognize the jurisdiction thereof or to prosecute his action therein, the court, overruling all the plaintiff's objections, and being of opinion that the original petition of the plaintiff did not state a cause of action, adjudged that the action be dismissed, and rendered final judgment for the defendant.

*A writ of error from this court was sued [96 out by the plaintiff, upon the sole ground that the cause was not properly removed into the circuit court of the United States and therefore that court was without jurisdiction. The court allowed the writ of error, and certified to this court the question so presented, as a question of the jurisdiction of the circuit court, under the act of March 3, 1891 (26 Stat. at L. 827, chap. 517, § 5).

Messrs. Lawrence Maxwell, Jr., William Goebel, and Alfred Mack for plaintiff in error.

Mr. Charles B. Simrall for defendant in error.

Mr. Justice Gray delivered the opinion of the court:

In the circuit court of the United States, the plaintiff contended that the court had no jurisdiction to entertain the case and to render the final judgment complained of, because the case had not been duly removed into that court from the state court in which it had been commenced.

The question thus presented was not, as in Smith v. McKay, 161 U. S. 355 [40: 731], whether a suit of which the circuit court of the United States was admitted to have jurisdiction was cognizable on the common-law or on the equity side of the court; but the question was whether the circuit court of the United States had any jurisdiction whatever of the case. The jurisdiction of the circuit court of the United States was thus in issue, and, the question of its jurisdiction having been duly certified, the case was rightly brought from the circuit court of the United States directly to this court, under the act of March 3, 1891 (26 Stat. at L. 827, chap. 517, § 5), upon the question of jurisdiction only.

The action was brought against a railroad company, and several of its servants to recover for an injury alleged to have been caused to the plaintiff by the negligence of all the defendants. It is well settled that an action of tort, which *might have been brought [97 against many persons or against any one or more of them, and which is brought in a state court against all jointly, contains no separate controversy which will authorize its removal by some of the defendants into the circuit court of the United States, even if they file separate answers and set up different defenses from the other defendants, and allege that they are not jointly liable with them, and that their own controversy with the plaintiff is a separate one; for, as this court has often said, "a defendant has no right to say that an action shall be several, which a plaintiff elects to make joint. . . . A separate defense may defeat a joint recovery, but it cannot deprive a plaintiff of his right to prosecute his own suit to a final determination in his own way. The cause of action is the subject-matter of the controversy, and that is, for all the purposes of the suit, whatever the plaintiff declares it to be in his pleadings." Pirie v. Tvedt, 115 U. S. 41, 43 [29: 331, 332]; Sloane v. Anderson, 117 U. S. 275 [29: 899]; Little v. Giles, 118 U. S. 596, 600, 601 [30: 269-271]; Louisville & Nashville Railroad Co. v. Wangelin, 132 U. S. 599 [33: 474]; Torrence v. Shedd, 144 U. S. 527, 530 [36: 528, 531]; Connell v. Smiley, 156 U. S. 335, 340 [39: 443, 445]. Applying this rule, the circuit court of the United States, when this case was first removed into that court, ordered it to be remanded. 65 Fed. Rep. 129, 130.

It is true that the same court, in similar cases between other parties, has since decided otherwise; and, upon a review of conflicting authorities, and referring to the distinction taken under the old system of special pleading between trespass and trespass on the case, has held that a master and servant cannot be joined in an action for a tort, and therefore the controversy between each of them and the plaintiff is a separate controversy. Warax v. Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. Railway Co. 72 Fed. Rep. 637; Hukill v. Mansfield & Big Sandy Railroad Co. 72 Fed. Rep. 745.

But it is unnecessary now to consider which of the views of the circuit court upon this question is the correct one, because that court, by its order remanding this case, distinctly and finally adjudged, as between these parties and for the purposes of this case, that, at the time of the filing of the first petition for removal, 98]the case was not removable, because, *as it then stood, some of the defendants were citizens of the same state with the plaintiff, and there was no separate controversy between the plaintiff and the railway company, a citizen of a different state from himself. That order is not reviewable by this court. Gurnee v. Patrick County, 137 U. S. 141 [34: 601]; Ex parte Pennsylvania Co. 137 U. S. 451 [34: 738]; Birdseye v. Shaeffer, 140 U. S. 117 [35: 402]; Missouri Pacific Railway Co. v. Fitzgerald, 160 U. S. 556 [40: 536].

After the case had been so remanded, and when it was called for trial in the state court, the plaintiff discontinued his action against all the individual defendants, leaving it an action between citizens of different states; and the case then for the first time became one in its nature removable, and the single remaining defendant thereupon immediately filed a second petition for removal, which was denied by the state court, but was granted and an amendment thereof allowed by the circuit court of the United States. 65 Fed. Rep. 129.

The existence of diverse citizenship, or other equivalent condition of jurisdiction, is fundamental; the want of it will be taken notice of by the court of its own motion, and cannot be waived by either party. Mansfield, C. & L. M. Railway Co. v. Swan, 111 U. S. 379 [28: 462]. But the time of filing a petition for removal is not essential to the jurisdiction; the provision on that subject is, in the words of Mr. Justice Bradley, "but modal and formal," and a failure to comply with it may be the subject of waiver or estoppel. Ayers v. Watson, 113 U. S. 594, 597-599 [28: 1093-1095]; Northern Pacific Railroad Co. v. Austin, 135 U. S. 315, 318 [34: 219]; Martin v. Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. [Gerling v. Baltimore & O. R. Co.], 151 U. S. 673, 688-691 [38: 311, 317, 318]; Connell v. Smiley, 151 U. S. 335 [39: 443].

Undoubtedly when the case, as stated in the plaintiff's declaration, is a removable one, the defendant should file his petition for removal at or before the time when he is required by the law or practice of the state to make any defense whatever in its courts. Edrinyton v. Jefferson, 111 U. S. 770 [28: 594]; Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. v. Burns, 124 U. S. 165 [31: 333]; Kansas City, Ft. S. & M. Railroad Co. v. Daughtry, 138 U. S. 298 [34: 963]; Martin v. Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. [Gerling v. Baltimore & O. R. Co.], 151 U. S. 673, 686, 687 [38: 311, 316].

But it by no means follows, when the case does not become *in its nature a removable[99 one until after the time mentioned in the act has expired, that it cannot be removed at all.

In Northern Pacific Railroad Co. v. Austin, 135 U. S. 315 [34: 219], where a plaintiff suing in an inferior court of a state had laid his damages at less than the sum necessary to authorize a removal into the circuit court of the United States and was permitted at the trial to increase the ad damnum above that sum, and judgment of the district court was affirmed by the highest court of the state, a writ of error to that court was dismissed by this court, solely because no application for removal had been made after the allowance of the amendment; and the chief justice, in delivering the opinion, said: "If the application had been made, the question would then have arisen whether it came too late under the circumstances. The defendant was not entitled to remove the suit as originally brought, 'before or at the term at which such cause could be first tried, and before the trial thereof.' But the objection to removal, depending upon the absence of the jurisdictional amount, was obviated by the amendment. As the time within which a removal must be applied for is not jurisdictional, but modal and formal (Ayers v. Watson, 113 U. S. 594, 598 [28: 1093, 1094]), it may, though obligatory to a certain extent, be waived. And as, where a removal is effected, the party who obtains it is estopped upon the question of the time, so, if the conduct of the plaintiff in a given case were merely a device to prevent a removal, it might be that the objection as to time could not be raised by him." 135 U. S. 318 [34: 219].

The question whether a defendant may file, in the state court in which the suit was commenced, a petition for removal after the time mentioned in the act of Congress has elapsed, in a case which was not removable when that time expired, is now directly presented for adjudication; and the answer to this question depends upon the terms and effect of the act in force when these proceedings took place.

In order to warrant a removal from the court of a state into a circuit court of the United States, according to the terms of that act, the necessary diverse citizenship or other foundation of the jurisdiction of the circuit court of 100]the United States *must exist. It is only when that does exist that "any party entitled to remove any suit . . . may make and file a petition in such suit in such state court at the time, or at any time before the defendant is required by the laws of the state, or the rule of the state court in which such suit is brought, to answer or plead to the declaration or complaint of the plaintiff, for the removal of such suit into the circuit court to be held in the district where such suit is pending," and to give bond to file a copy of the record in that court "on the first day of its then next session." Act of March 3, 1887 (24 Stat. at L. 552, chap. 373), as corrected by act of August 13, 1888 (25 Stat. at L. 435, chap. 866).

This provision clearly manifests the intention of Congress that the petition for removal should be filed at the earliest possible opportunity. But, so long as there does not appear of record to be any removable controversy, no party can be entitled to remove it, and the provision of the act of Congress, that "any party entitled to remove any suit . . . may make and file a petition for removal" at or before the time when he is required to make answer to the suit, cannot be literally applied. To construe that provision as restricting to the time prescribed for answering the declaration the removal of a case which is not a removable one at that time, would not only be inconsistent with the words of the statute; but it would utterly defeat all right of removal in many cases; as, for instance, whenever citizens of the same state as the plaintiff were joined as defendants through an honest mistake, not discovered by the plaintiff until after the time prescribed for answering; or whenever a personal injury was supposed, at the time of bringing an action therefor, to be a comparatively trifling one, which might be fully compensated by a sum much less than $2,000, and was afterwards discovered to be so much graver that there could be no doubt of the power and the duty of the court to allow an amendment increasing the ad damnum.

The reasonable construction of the act of Congress, and the only one which will prevent the right of removal, to which the statute declares the party to be entitled, from being defeated by circumstances wholly beyond his con-101]trol, is to hold *that the incidental provision as to the time must, when necessary to carry out the purpose of the statute, yield to the principal enactment as to the right; and to consider the statute as, in intention and effect, permitting and requiring the defendant to file a petition for removal as soon as the action assumes the shape of a removable case in the court in which it was brought.

The result is that, when this plaintiff discontinued his action as against the individual defendants, the case for the first time became such a one as, by the express terms of the statute, the defendant railway company was entitled to remove; and therefore its petition for removal, filed immediately upon such discontinuance, was filed in due time.

A petition for removal, when presented to the state court, becomes part of the record of that court, and must doubtless show, taken in connection with the other matters on that record, the jurisdictional facts upon which the right of removal depends; because, if those facts are not made to appear upon the record of that court, it is not bound or authorized to surrender its jurisdiction, and if it does, the circuit court of the United States cannot allow an amendment of the petition, but must remand the case. Crehore v. Ohio & Mississippi Railway Co 131 U. S. 240 [33: 144]; Jackson v. Allen, 132 U S. 27 [33: 249]. But if, upon the face of the petition and of the whole record of the state court, sufficient grounds for removal are shown, the petition may be amended in the circuit court of the United States, by leave of that court, by stating more fully and distinctly the facts which support those grounds. Carson v. Dunham, 121 U. S. 421, 427 [39: 992. 994]; Martin v. Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. [Gerling v. Baltimore & O. R. Co.], 151 U. S. 673, 690, 691 [38: 311, 318].

In the case at bar, the second petition for removal, as presented to the state court, alleged that the petitioner was a citizen of the states of Virginia and West Virginia only, that the plaintiff was a citizen of the state of Kentucky, that Evans and Hickey had been fraudulently and improperly joined as defendants for the purpose of defeating the petitioner's right of removal, that because of their joinder the case had been remanded to the state court, and that the action,*having been discontinued against[102 them, was now for the first time pending against the petitioner alone; and by the transcript, previously filed in the state court, of the record of the proceedings in the circuit court of the United States upon the first petition for removal, containing the opinion and order remanding the case, it appeared to have been admitted that the individual defendants were citizens of Kentucky.

It was thus made to appear, upon the record of the state court, that the case could not have been removed before, and that it had now become in its nature removable, by reason of the diverse citizenship of the parties. Such being the case, it was rightly removed by the second petition for removal into the circuit court of the United States; and this petition was rightly permitted to be amended in that court.

The petition, as amended, distinctly alleged that Evans was a citizen of Virginia, that Boyer and Hickey were both citizens of Kentucky, and that by the discontinuance against them the action was for the first time pending against the railway company alone; and thus showed a case which the railway company was entitled to remove, independently of the allegations that these persons had been fraudulently joined as defendants to defeat the right of removal, and that the plaintiff was therefore estopped to deny that the second petition for removal was filed in time.

We do not find it necessary to pass upon the points of fraudulent joinder and of estoppel, made by the railway company, and upon which the circuit court of the United States proceeded in retaining jurisdiction of the case, because, for the reasons before stated, we are of opinion that, upon the true construction of the act of Congress, the petition, filed as soon as the case became a removable one, and before the railway company took any new steps in defense of the action, was seasonably filed; and that it sufficiently stated grounds for removal, and was therefore rightly permitted to be amended.

It is hardly necessary to add that the railway company, by making defense in the state court after that court had declined to surrender jurisdiction of the case, did not lose or impair 103]*its right to insist that the case had been lawfully removed into the circuit court of the United States. The defendant, notwithstanding its objection, duly saved upon the record, to the jurisdiction of the state court, having been forced to a hearing in that court, is entitled to have the error in this respect corrected in any court having jurisdiction for the purpose. Removal Cases, 100 U. S. 457, 475 [25: 593, 600]; Edrington v. Jefferson, 111 U. S. 770, 774 [28: 594, 596].

Judgment affirmed.

UNION MUTUAL LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY, Plff. in Err.,
v.
ELIZABETH KIRCHOFF.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 103-115.)

Federal question, when raised too late—decision by state court.

1. A Federal question raised after the case has been decided on the merits by the supreme court of the state, and remanded to a lower court merely for an accounting, is raised too late for the purpose of a writ of error to this court, where it does not arise on the accounting itself, but by a motion to amend the answer by setting up the Federal question.
2. A declaration by the supreme court of the state on a second appeal, that the plaintiff's rights grew out of an alleged contract, and not merely by reason of anything done in a Federal court, does not amount to a disposition, on a second appeal, of a claim of a Federal right based on the action of the Federal court, where such right might have been, but was not, raised on the first appeal.

Argued December 16, 17, 1897. Decided January 10, 1898.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of Illinois to review a judgment of that court affirming the judgment of the Appellate Court of that State which affirmed the judgment of the Circuit Court of Cook County in that State, settling the accounts between Elizabeth Kirchoff, plaintiff, and the Union Mutual Life Insurance Company, defendant, and ordering the insurance company to convey certain property on payment of the amount found due. There was also a motion to dismiss. Writ of error dismissed.

See same case below, 128 Ill. 99, 33 Ill. App. 607, 133 Ill. 368, 51 Ill. App. 67, 149 Ill. 536. See also same case, 160 U. S. 374 [40: 461].

Statement by Mr. Chief Justice Fuller:

This was a bill filed by Elizabeth Kirchoff in the circuit court of Cook county, Illinois, against the Union Mutual Life Insurance Company, to compel a conveyance of two certain lots in accordance with an agreement between the company and herself on payment of the amount due thereunder as provided for. The circuit court dismissed the bill on hearing, and the cause, after an ineffectual appeal directly to the state supreme court (128 Ill. 199), was carried to the appellate court, which reversed the decree of the circuit court, and remanded the cause with directions that an account be taken, and that, when the amount due the company was ascertained, a decree be entered that on payment of such amount, with interest, the company should convey to Mrs. Kirchoff. 33 Ill. App. 607. From this judgment the insurance company prosecuted an appeal to the supreme court, and the judgment was affirmed. 133 Ill. 368. To review this judgment a writ of error was sued out from this court, but was dismissed *on the ground that the judg [105 ment of the supreme court was not final. 160 U. S. 374 [40: 461].

The case had, in the meantime, gone back to the circuit court, an accounting had been had, and a decree had been entered settling the accounts between the parties, and ordering the insurance company to convey the property in question on payment of the amount found due. From this decree the insurance company appealed to the appellate court; the decree of the circuit court was affirmed, 51 Ill. App. 67; and this second judgment of the appellate court was affirmed by the supreme court. 149 Ill. 536. To review the latter judgment the insurance company prosecuted this writ of error.

The facts as found by the state courts were substantially these: In May, 1871, the Union Mutual Life Insurance Company loaned $60,000 to Elizabeth Kirchoff, her husband, Julius Kirchoff, and her mother, Angela Diversey, upon their judgment note, secured by trust deed, conveying many parcels of land belonging to them in severalty, among which were the lots in question, which lots belonged to Elizabeth Kirchoff. Default having been made in the payment of interest and taxes, judgment was taken against Mrs. Diversey, and later a bill was filed by the insurance company in the circuit court of the United States to foreclose the trust deed. The bill in addition sought to cure a misdescription of the property belonging to Mrs. Diversey, who filed an answer denying the right of the company to correct the misdescription, and averring that the note and mortgage were procured from her by misrepresentation. While this bill was pending an agreement was reached by the parties, pursuant to which the company released to Mrs. Diversey its claim upon 40 acres of the land belonging to her, and she executed to them a warranty deed for the remainder, NOTE.—As to jurisdiction in the United States Supreme Court where Federal question arises or where are drawn in question statutes, treaty, or Constitution, see notes to Martin v. Hunter, 4: 97; Matthews v. Zane, 2: 654; and Williams v. Norris, 6: 571.

As to jurisdiction of United States Supreme Court to declare state law void as in conflict with state Constitution; to revise decrees of state courts as to construction of state laws, see notes to Jackson, Hart, v. Lamphire, 7: 679; and Commercial Bank v. Buckingham, 12: 169.

As to effect of decision of state courts in Federal courts; rule of property; questions of general or commercial law; effect of state decisions in other states; Federal questions,—see note to Forepaugh v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. (Pa.) 5 L. R. A. 508.

while Mrs. Kirchoff and her husband executed a quitclaim deed of all the property belonging to them and included in the trust deed, it being agreed as part of the transaction that Mrs. Kirchoff might purchase from the company the two lots above named for $10,000, $1,000 in cash and $9,000 in annual payments, for which Mrs. Kirchoff was to execute her notes, extend-106]ing *over a period of nine years, bearing interest at 6 per cent, and secured by mortgage upon the two lots. But as there was an intervening claim on one of the lots growing out of a sheriff's deed in pursuance of a sale on a judgment against Mrs. Kirchoff, rendered subsequently to the original trust deed but prior to the deed from Kirchoff and wife to the company, it was agreed that the foreclosure proceedings should continue to be prosecuted; that as soon as the company got a deed from the master it would convey to Mrs. Kirchoff and take the mortgage from her, and the company would thus obtain and convey clear title, and the mortgage back would be a first lien.

No defense was made to the foreclosure; the case went to decree and sale: and a master's deed was issued to the insurance company.

During the prosecution of the foreclosure proceedings a receiver had been appointed of all the property, and about nine months after the confirmation of the report of sale the receiver filed a petition, stating that Julius Kirchoff was in possession of the premises and refused to pay rent therefor, and asking for a writ of assistance to put the receiver in possession, to which Julius Kirchoff filed an answer setting up the agreement and objecting to the issue of the writ lest his rights be prejudiced; but the writ was nevertheless issued.

It appeared on the second hearing that prior to September 10, 1884, the United States had seized the property for certain revenue taxes due from a firm then occupying it as a distillery, Mrs. Kirchoff being in no way connected with the firm; that the property was sold, the government bidding it in and taking a deed for it; and that the government conveyed to the insurance company. In the account stated Mrs. Kirchoff was required to repay the amount the insurance company paid the government, with interest.

The supreme court of Illinois held, on the second appeal, on the authority of Mansfield v. Excelsior Refinery Company, 135 U. S. 326 [34: 162], that the United States took no title by its deed as against Mrs. Kirchoff; and, further, that the insurance company could not set up 107] any right under the deed from *the government, because of its acquisition long prior to the submission of the case upon the first appeal. No question was raised in this court in respect of this transaction.

Messrs. E. Parmalee Prentice, Frank L. Wean, and Josiah H. Drummond, for plaintiff in error:

This is a bill to redeem from a mortgage which had been previously foreclosed in the Federal court. Such a bill is necessarily a bill to review the foreclosure decree and is beyond the jurisdiction of the state courts to entertain.

The subject-matter of the bill makes out a bill of review.

Randall v. Howard, 67 U. S. 2 Black, 585 (17: 269); Nougue v. Clapp, 101 U. S. 551 (25: 1026); Graham v. Boston, H. & E. R. Co. 118 U. S. 161 (30: 196); Rae v. Hulbert, 17 Ill. 572; Frisby v. Withers, 61 Tex. 134.

The bill does not state such a case as may be the subject of an original bill to set aside a decree for fraud.

Gaines v Fuentes, 92 U. S. 10 (23: 524); Barrow v. Hunton, 99 U. S. 80 (25: 407); Johnson v. Waters, 111 U. S. 640 (28: 547); Arrowsmith v. Gleason, 129 U. S. 86 (32: 630).

It was a part of complainant's case to allege and prove that the facts now relied upon for relief could not have been brought forward in defense of the previous suit. In the absence of such allegation and proof, the present bill is merely a bill for a rehearing.

Marshall v. Holmes, 141 U. S. 589 (35: 870); Avery v. United States, 79 U. S. 12 Wall. 304 (20: 405).

The fact that the proceedings in the state courts review the Federal foreclosure decree is shown by the effect of the decree in the state courts upon the Federal decree.

The only fraud charged in complainant's bill is that she conspired with the insurance company to defraud her creditors; the bill states an illegal agreement.

Randall v. Howard, 67 U. S. 2 Black, 585 (17: 269); Dent v. Ferguson, 132 U. S. 50 (33: 242).

The Federal decree of foreclosure is conclusive of the matter litigated in the present suit.

Assuming the existence of the agreement found by the state courts, nevertheless the evidence shows that ten months before the decree in the Federal courts was entered, the insurance company notified the defendant in error that it refused to recognize the contract which she claimed.

It was the duty of the Kirchoffs, at once, upon the repudiation by the insurance company of the contract claimed, to interpose their defense in the foreclosure proceeding, if they had any. Having failed to do so, they are precluded by the Federal decree from setting up claims which existed before that decree.

Dowell v. Applegate, 152 U. S. 327 (38: 463); Aurora v. West, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 82, 102 (19: 42); Cromwell v. Sac County, 94 U. S. 351 (24: 195); Case v. Beauregard, 101 U. S. 688 (25: 1004); Dimock v. Revere Copper Co. 117 U. S. 559 (29: 994); Mally v. Mally, 52 Iowa, 654; Bailey v. Bailey, 115 Ill. 551, 557; Rogers v. Higgins, 57 Ill. 244, 247; Harmon v. Auditor of Public Accounts, 123 Ill. 122; Stickney v. Goudy, 132 Ill. 213; May v. Coleman, 84 Ala. 325; Jones v. Vert, 121 Ind. 140; Adair v. Mergenthein, 114 Ind. 303; Caldwell v. White, 77 Mo. 471, 473; Shelbina Hotel Asso. v. Parker, 58 Mo. 327.

The United States court had jurisdiction.

Milwaukee & M. R. Co. v. Soutter, 69 U. S. 2 Wall. 632 (17: 886); Freeman v. Howe, 65 U. S. 24 How. 450 (16: 749); Randall v. Howard, 67 U. S. 2 Black, 585 (17: 269).

Messrs. William S. Harbert, George R. Daley, and Ira. W. Buell, for defendant in error:

There is no Federal question involved and the motion to dismiss should be sustained.

This court has no jurisdiction for the reason that it does not appear that the right, title, privilege, or immunity now claimed was specially set up or claimed at the proper time and in the proper way.

Willard v. Petitt, 153 Ill. 663; Hook v. Richeson, 115 Ill. 431; Brooklyn v. Orthwein, 140 Ill. 620; Re Spies, 123 U. S. 131 (31: 80); Chappell v. Bradshaw, 128 U. S. 132 (32: 369); Susquehanna Boom Co. v. West Branch Boom Co. 110 U. S. 57 (28: 69); Long Island Water Supply Co. v. Brooklyn, 166 U. S. 685 (41: 1165).

The title acquired in the foreclosure proceedings in the United States circuit court is not attacked by the bill nor discredited by the decree, and therefore no Federal question is presented.

The perfecting of the title by the foreclosure proceeding was part of the agreement and the agreement was therefore not hostile to the foreclosure proceedings.

Mansfield v. Excelsior Refinery Co. 135 U. S. 326 (34: 162).

There was not and could not have been any adjudication in the foreclosure suit of the issues in this suit.

The application for writ of assistance placed in issue only the right of possession of the premises as between Julius Kirchoff and the receiver and the rights of the parties hereto were in no manner affected by the order issued on said application.

Aspden v. Nixon, 45 U. S. 4 How. 467 (11: 1059).

There was nothing immoral, inequitable, improper, or which could have resulted to the injury of anyone in the agreement.

If this court should hold that a Federal question is involved in this case, then such question was correctly decided.

Proper effect was given to the decree of the Federal court.

Dupasseur v. Rochereau, 88 U. S. 21 Wall. 130 (22: 588); Crescent City L. S. L. & S. H Co. v. Butchers' Union S. H. & L. S. L. Co. 120 U. S. 141 (30: 614); Smith v. Adsit, 90 U. S. 23 Wall. 368 (23: 114); Whetherell v. Ebeale, 123 Ill. 668; Adams County v. Burlington & M. River R. Co. 112 U. S. 123 (28: 678); Murdock v. Memphis, 87 U. S. 20 Wall. 590 (22: 429); Hale v. Akers, 132 U. S. 554 (33: 442); Bacon v. Texas, 163 U. S. 207 (41: 132).

In chancery a right presupposes a remedy and the course pursued by defendant in error was the only course open to her.

Peugh v. Davis, 96 U. S. 332 (24: 775); Alexander v. Rodriguez (Villa v. Rodriguez) 79 U. S. 12 Wall. 323 (20: 406).

Though the question relates only to the character of the evidence, and is therefore, as we view it, a matter exclusively for the state courts, yet the agreement was not repugnant to the statute of frauds.

McManus v. O'Sullivan, 91 U. S. 578 (23: 390); Romie v. Casanova, 91 U. S. 379 (23: 374); Warren v. Warren, 105 Ill. 568; Beegle v. Wentz, 55 Pa. 369, 93 Am. Dec. 762; Morrill v. Cooper, 65 Barb. 512; Lantry v. Lantry, 51 Ill. 458, 2 Am. Rep. 310; Fischbeck v. Gross, 112 Ill. 208.

Issues of fact are not reviewable by this court.

Dower v. Richards, 151 U. S. 658 (38: 305); Cunningham v. Neagle, 135 U. S. 14 (34: 63); Kenney v. Effinger, 115 U. S. 577 (29: 498); Baldwin v. Kansas, 129 U. S. 52 (32: 640).

Mr. Chief Justice Fuller delivered the opinion of the court:

When this case was before us on the prior writ of error we were obliged to dismiss the writ because the judgment sought to be reviewed was not final. Union Mut. L. Insurance Company v. Kirchoff, 160 U. S. 374 [40: 461]. And the question whether, had this been otherwise, the jurisdiction could have been maintained, was necessarily not considered. That inquiry, however, now meets us on the threshold, as, in order to invoke our jurisdiction on the ground of the denial of a title or right claimed under the Constitution, or any treaty or statute of, or commission held or authority exercised under, the United States, such title or right must be specially set up or claimed at the proper time and in the proper way.

The judgment of the supreme court of Illinois, when the case was first before it (133 Ill. 368), established the agreement between Mrs. Kirchoff and the insurance company as claimed by her, and determined that she was entitled to the relief she sought by reason thereof, and the cause was remanded for the purposes of an accounting merely. And although the fact that the case was sent back for further proceedings deprived the judgment of that finality deemed essential to the issue of a writ of error from this court, yet it does not follow that the prior determination on the merits can be overhauled on the ground of the existence of a Federal question which was not raised when that determination was arrived at.

*As observed by the supreme court [108 when the case was a second time before that tribunal (149 Ill. 536, 542): "Nothing is better settled than that where a cause has been reviewed by this court, and remanded with directions as to the decree to be entered, a party, on a subsequent appeal, cannot assign for error any cause accrued or existed prior to the judgment of that this court. All errors not assigned will be considered as waived, and cannot afterwards be urged. Hook v. Richeson, 115 Ill. 431; Village of Brooklyn v. Orthwein, 140 Ill. 620, and cases cited."

The record does not disclose that any right or title was specially set up or claimed under any statute of, or authority exercised under, the United States in the courts below or in the supreme court of Illinois prior to the decision of the latter court on the first appeal.

The original bill after setting up the agreement to the effect, among other things, that the title was to be perfected in the company by the foreclosure proceedings, as well as by complainant's deed of release and quitclaim, prayed that the company might be compelled to specifically perform the agreement and convey the lots to her on performance on her part. To this defendant filed a demurrer, assigning as cause that the bill did not show a contract enforceable either at law or in equity. The demurrer was overruled and defendant answered, denying the averments of the bill, pleading the statute of frauds, and asking "the same right by its answer as if it had pleaded or demurred to said bill of complaint." The bill was subsequently amended and prayed that complainant might be allowed "to redeem said premises according to the terms of said agreement; that said defendant may be compelled by the decree of this court to perform the said agreement with your oratrix and convey to her the said two lots of lands hereinbefore specifically described, according to the terms thereof, as before stated;" and for an accounting.

When from the judgment of the appellate court reversing the circuit court and directing the entry of a decree in complainant's favor on 109]payment of the amount due from *her to the company as ascertained on an accounting, the first appeal was taken to the supreme court, the errors there assigned nowhere in terms raised a Federal question. And, in affirming the judgment of the appellate court, the supreme court did not consider or discuss any Federal question as such in its opinion. The supreme court held that the agreement was fully made out, and that complainant was entitled to a conveyance of the lots; that it was not material whether the agreement was called an agreement to redeem or an agreement of repurchase, "as the form of the transaction, in a court of equity, is not to be regarded;" that the bill need not be treated as strictly a bill for specific performance, but it was enough that complainant was entitled to have her property restored to her upon discharging the burden upon it fixed in amount by the agreement.

The supreme court of Illinois [133 Ill. 380] further said: "It is also claimed that complainant's failure to assert the alleged agreement in the foreclosure proceedings is a bar to its assertion here—that the proceedings in the foreclosure are conclusive. We are unable to concur in this position. It was a part of the arrangement under which the complainant was to obtain the two lots in controversy, that a decree of foreclosure should be entered, and that the premises should be sold under such decree. The decree was rendered and the sale made by consent, for the purpose of clearing the different tracts of land mentioned in the quitclaim deed from certain encumbrances. The decree was not adverse to the interest of complainant, but in harmony with her interest. She is not attacking the decree, but claiming the enforcement of an agreement under which it was rendered, and in our judgment there is no ground for holding that the rights of complainant were cut off or in any manner impaired by the decree."

It is now contended that it then appeared that defendant claimed to hold an absolute title to the lots in question by virtue of the foreclosure proceedings and of the master's deed obtained thereunder, and hence that the title was claimed under an authority exercised under the United States; that a Federal question was thereby raised on the record; that 110] the *decision of the case necessarily involved passing on the claim of title; that the opinion of the supreme court of Illinois showed that it was passed upon; and that the necessary effect of the decree and judgment of the state court was against the right and title of defendant sufficiently claimed under Federal authority. But we cannot accept this conclusion.

In the recent case of Oxley Stave Company v. Butler County, 166 U. S. 648, 654, [41: 1149, 1151], this court, speaking by Mr. Justice Harlan, said:

"The only remaining question was not otherwise raised than by the general allegation that the decree was rendered against dead persons as well as in the absence of necessary parties who had no notice of the suit, and therefore no opportunity to be heard in vindication of their rights. Do such general allegations meet the statutory requirement that the final judgment of a state court may be re-examined here if it denies some title, right, privilege, or immunity 'specially set up or claimed' under the Constitution or authority of the United States? We think not. The specific contention now is that the decree of the Butler county circuit court in the suit instituted by the county of Butler was not consistent with the due process of law required by the 14th Amendment of the Constitution of the United States. But can it be said that the plaintiff specially set up or claimed the protection of that amendment against the operation of that decree by simply averring—without referring to the Constitution or even adopting its phraseology—that the decree was passed against deceased persons as well as in the absence of neeessary or indispensable parties?

"This question must receive a negative answer, if due effect be given to the words 'specially set up or claimed' in § 709 of the Revised Statutes. These words were in the 25th section of the judiciary act of 1789 (1 Stat. at L. 85, chap. 20), and were inserted in order that the revisory power of this court should not extend to rights denied by the final judgment of the highest court of a state, unless the party claiming such rights plainly and distinctly indicated, before the state court disposed of *the case, that they were claimed under[111 the Constitution, treaties, or statute of the United States. The words 'specially set up or claimed' imply that if a party intends to invoke for the protection of his rights the Constitution of the United States or some treaty, statute, commission, or authority of the United States, he must so declare; and unless he does so declare 'specially,' that is, unmistakably, this court is without authority to re-examine the final judgment of the state court. This statutory requirement is not met if such declaration is so general in its character that the purpose of the party to assert a Federal right is left to mere inference. It is the settled doctrine of this court that the jurisdiction of the circuit courts of the United States must appear affirmatively from the record, and that it is not sufficient that it may be inferred argumentatively from the facts stated. Hence, the averment that a party resides in a particular state does not import that he is a citizen of that state. Brown v. Keene, 33 U. S. 8 Pet. 112, 115 [8: 885, 886]; Robertson v. Cease, 97 U. S. 646, 649 [24: 1057, 1059]. Upon like grounds the jurisdiction of this court to re-examine the final judgment of a state court cannot arise from mere inference, but only from averments so distinct and positive as to place it beyond question that the party bringing a case here from such court intended to assert a Federal right."

Tested by this rule it is quite apparent that defendant did not specially set up or claim a Federal right or title within the meaning of § 709, and that no right or title so claimed was denied by the supreme court on the first appeal.

And as the judgment of that court determined the rights of the parties and left open only the amount due on the accounting, the suggestion of the disposition of a Federal question by that judgment comes too late.

After the case went back to the circuit court for the entry of decree in favor of Mrs. Kirchoff and the accounting, defendant moved for leave to amend its answer by inserting the following:

"And the said defendant, further answering, says that by reason and in virtue of the said 112] foreclosure decrees in the said *United States court, the sale thereunder, the confirmation thereof, and all the acts and doings of said court therein the said Union Mutual Life Insurance Company acquired a title and right to the lands aforesaid; that said right and title was acquired and is claimed under the Constitution, statutes, and authority of the United States; that a decree for redemption or specific performance of the contract alleged in said bill would be against the right and title of said company thus acquired and hereby claimed under the Constitution, laws, and authority of the United States; that a decree for redemption or specific performance, as prayed for in said bill, or either of them, would fail to give full faith, credit, and effect to the said decrees, orders, and acts of the United States circuit court in the foreclosure proceedings aforesaid; that a decree for redemption or specific performance, as prayed for, or either of them, cannot be entered without attacking and pretending to nullify or impair the said decrees, orders, and acts of the said United States circuit court, and that, for the foregoing reasons, this court is without jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the action set forth in the bill of complaint, and is without jurisdiction to enter a decree for redemption or specific performance, as prayed for in said bill of complaint."

But the circuit court refused to allow the amendment.

There was no contention that any Federal question arose on the accounting itself. The case having reached the appellate court the second time, the insurance company assigned, among other errors, that the circuit court erred "in that it did not dismiss complainant's bill for want of jurisdiction;" "in not holding that it was without jurisdiction to enter a decree allowing redemption;" "in entering a decree which would in effect nullify the decree and doings of the circuit court of the United States for the northern district of Illinois;" "in entering a decree in conflict with the decree of the United States circuit court;" " in refusing to the defendant leave to file the proposed amendment to its answer;" "in entering a decree against the validity of titles claimed by defendant under the authority of the United States."

It will be perceived that so far as Federal ques-113]tions were *thus attempted to be raised, they were all covered by the prior judgment.

The appellate court on the second appeal held itself bound by the previous decision and declined to enter on matters of defense which might have been then availed of. The supreme court was of the same opinion, for it ruled that where a case had once been reviewed by the court, and remanded with directions as to the decree to be entered, error could not be assigned on a subsequent appeal for any cause existing at the time of the prior judgment. Nevertheless the supreme court [149 Ill. 539] said:

"Much of the argument of counsel for appellant is devoted to an effort to show a want of jurisdiction in the circuit court of Cook county over the subject-matter of this litigation. Whether, upon this second appeal, that is an open question, we do not deem it important to determine, being clearly of the opinion that the position of counsel is untenable. It is said the suit is brought to review and set aside a decree of the United States circuit court, and the bill is treated, throughout the discussion, as hostile to the foreclosure proceeding in that court, or as attempting to obtain relief properly available in that action.

"This is a misapprehension of the scope and purpose of complainant's bill. In our former opinion we said: 'After the settlement had been concluded it turned out that certain encumbrances existed against some of the property, which were subsequent to the trust deed, but which would take priority to the quitclaim deed executed by complainant and her husband. It therefore became necessary, in order to obtain a perfect title, to go on with the foreclosure proceedings, which was done.' This statement is based upon an allegation of the bill to the effect that, it being represented to the complainant by the attorney of the company that it would be necessary to foreclose the trust deed in order to make good the title in the company to the lots before they could take a mortgage thereon for the instalments of redemption money, it was agreed between the parties that the agreement for redemption should not be executed until after the title had been perfected *in the company by fore-[114 closure, but in the meantime complainant should execute and deliver to the company her quitclaim deed, and should interpose no defense to such foreclosure. The allegation was found, in the opinion above referred to, sustained by proofs, and is conclusive of that fact upon this appeal. The foreclosure decree in the Federal court was therefore as much the result of the agreement relied upon by complainant as was the making of the quitclaim deed by her. So far from this being an attempt to review, modify, or set aside the decree of the United States circuit court, the right of action is predicated, in part, at least, upon it.

"Whether the bill be called a bill to redeem, or given another name, can in no way affect the question of jurisdiction in the state court. The relief sought is the enforcement of a contract to reconvey the property in question, which we have already held the complainant entitled to. Her rights grow out of the alleged contract, and not by reason of anything that was done, or could have been done, in the Federal court in the foreclosure suit.

"That a court of equity has jurisdiction to enforce the contract, whether it be called a contract to redeem or to reconvey, is, we think, too clear for argument."

The supreme court did not decide that the case was reopened as to matters previously adjudicated, and we cannot regard these observations as amounting to such disposition, on a second appeal, of Federal questions which might have been, but were not, raised on the first appeal, as would justify us in taking jurisdiction.

It was further argued at this bar that the agreement was fraudulent and illegal as respected the foreclosure decree; and that the decree of the state court, upholding an agreement thus tainted, ascribed to that decree an operation which would not have been permitted in the courts of the United States, and in that view involved a review thereof or a refusal to give it its due effect.

We do not find that the state courts were asked to pass on any such question. If it was really contended before them that the agreement was invalid on the ground that it pro 115]vided *that the United States court should go to decree and sale in order to cut off intervening liens, it may be conceded that those courts held, on the facts appearing, that the agreement was not open to that objection, but it would not follow that thereby a Federal question was disposed of. And the point was certainly embraced by the first judgment.

We are of opinion that we cannot revise the present judgment on the ground that plaintiff in error was thereby denied any right properly claimed, and in apt time, in accordance with § 709 of the Revised Statutes.

Writ of error dismissed.

v.
DAVID RYMER et al.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 115-128.)

Review of dismissal of judgment—determination of value of lands—presumption—certainty as to amount.

1. A party whose suit has been dismissed by the United States circuit court for want of jurisdiction has the right to have such judgment reviewed by this court.
2. The determination as to the value of lands in dispute, made by the circuit court upon the evidence, without submitting the question to the jury, can be reviewed by this court when the circuit court has dismissed the suit for want of jurisdiction.
3. A liberal presumption ought to be indulged in favor of plaintiff's evidence as to the value of land in controversy, when this is a jurisdictional question, and the court gave leave to both parties to file affidavits on the question, and the defendant fails to procure a single sworn statement on the subject.
4. A suit cannot be properly dismissed by a circuit court on the ground that the subject-matter is of less value than the jurisdictional amount, unless the facts made to appear on the record create a legal certainty of that conclusion.

[No. 76.]

Submitted November 1, 1897. Decided January 17, 1898.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Tennessee to review a judgment dismissing for want of jurisdiction an action of ejectment brought by George P. Wetmore et al., plaintiffs, against David Rymer et al., to recover a tract of land in Polk county. Reversed and cause remanded with instructions.

Statement by Mr. Justice Shiras:

This was an action of ejectment brought in the circuit court of the United States for the eastern district of Tennessee to recover a tract of land in Polk county. The declaration alleged that the land was worth more than $2,000. The defendants disclaimed as to a portion of the *land, and pleaded not guilty and [116 the statute of limitations as to the remainder.

At the trial, after the plaintiffs' evidence was closed, the defendants moved the court to dismiss the plaintiffs' suit for want of jurisdiction because it appeared that the matter in dispute did not exceed, exclusive of interest and costs, the sum or value of $2,000; but the court suspended action on this motion until the verdict of the jury should be rendered. The defendants then proceeded to introduce their evidence on the matters put in issue by the pleadings, and, after argument of counsel and the charge of the court, the jury found a verdict in favor of the plaintiffs, and assessed their damages for the detention of the premises at $1. Thereupon the court rendered judgment on the verdict and a writ of possession and execution accordingly.

But immediately upon the rendition of the verdict and judgment the court set them aside, entertained the defendants' motion to dismiss for want of jurisdiction, and gave leave to both parties to file affidavits showing the value of the land in controversy.

Upon consideration of the evidence heard on the trial and of affidavits produced on behalf of the plaintiffs, the court, being of opinion that the value of the matter in dispute was less than $2,000, and that there was not a substantial controversy between the parties of sufficient value to be within the jurisdiction of the court, dismissed the suit for want of jurisdiction, and rendered judgment for costs against the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs excepted to this action of the court; a bill of exceptions was sealed; and a writ of error was allowed to this court.

Mr. Charles Seymour for plaintiffs in error.

No counsel for defendants in error.

NOTE.—Jurisdiction of United States Supreme Court dependent on amount; interest cannot be added to give jurisdiction; how value of thing demanded may be shown; what cases reviewable without regard to sum in controversy,—see note to Gordon v. Ogden, 7: 592.

That only parties to record can be heard on appeal or writ of error, see note to Harrison v. Nixon, 9: 201.

As to amount necessary to give jurisdiction in circuit court cases prior to act of 1875; amount necessary since act of 1875; amount in dispute,—see note to Schunk v. Moline, M. & S. Co. 37: 256.

Mr. Justice Shiras delivered the opinion of the court:

The first question that arises upon this record 117]is whether *the action of the circuit court in dismissing the plaintiffs' action for the want of jurisdiction is reviewable by us. The court acted in pursuance of the 5th section of the act of March 3, 1875 (18 Stat. at L. 472, chap. 137), which provided, "that if, in any suit commenced in a circuit court or removed from a state court to a circuit court of the United States, it shall appear to the satisfaction of said circuit court, at any time after such suit has been brought or removed thereto, that such suit does not really and substantially involve a dispute or controversy properly within the jurisdiction of said circuit court, or that the parties to said suit have been improperly or collusively made or joined, either as plaintiffs or defendants, for the purpose of creating a case cognizable or removable under this act, the said circuit court shall proceed no further therein, but shall dismiss the suit or remand it to the court from which it was removed, as justice may require, and shall make such order as to costs as shall be just; but the order of said circuit court dismissing or remanding said cause to the state court shall be reviewable by the Supreme Court on writ of error or appeal, as the case may be."

By the 6th section of the act of August 13, 1888 (25 Stat. at L. 433, chap. 866), amending the act of March 3, 1887, it was enacted "that the last paragraph of section five of the act of Congress approved March third, eighteen hundred and seventy-five, entitled 'An Act To Determine the Jurisdiction of Circuit Courts of the United States and to Regulate the Removal of Causes from State Courts and for Other Purposes,' and § 640 of the Revised Statutes, and all laws and parts of laws in conflict with the provisions of this act, be and the same are hereby repealed."

Any doubt that may have been caused by this repealing enactment, as to the power to review the judgment of a circuit court dismissing a suit for want of jurisdiction, was removed by the act of February 25, 1889 (25 Stat. at L. 693, chap. 236), entitled "An Act To Provide for Writs of Error or Appeals to the Supreme Court of the United States in All Cases Involving the Question of the Jurisdiction of the Courts Below," and which provided "that 118]in all cases where a final judgment *or decree shall be rendered in a circuit court of the United States in which there shall have been a question involving the jurisdiction of the court, the party against whom the judgment or decree is rendered shall be entitled to an appeal or writ of error to the Supreme Court of the United States to review such judgment or decree without reference to the amount of the same; but in cases where the decree or judgment does not exceed the sum of $5,000 the Supreme Court shall not review any question raised upon the record except such question of jurisdiction; such writ of error or appeal shall be taken and allowed under the same provisions of law as apply to other writs of error or appeals."

This act of February 25, 1889, was followed by the act of March 3, 1891 (26 Stat. at L. 826, chap. 517), which provided, in its 5th section, "that appeals or writs of error may be taken from the district courts or from the existing circuit courts direct to the Supreme Court in the following cases: In any case in which the jurisdiction of the court is in issue; in such cases the question of jurisdiction alone shall be certified to the Supreme Court from the court below for decision."

These provisions of the several statutes plainly disclose the intent of Congress that a party whose suit has been dismissed by a circuit court for want of jurisdiction shall have the right to have such judgment reviewed by this court. And we have accordingly heretofore held that the action of the circuit courts in such cases is subject to our revision. Williams v. Nottawa Twp. 104 U. S. 209 [26: 719]; Barry v. Edmunds, 116 U. S. 550 [29: 729]; Hartog v. Memory, 116 U. S. 588 [29: 725]; Morris v. Gilmer, 129 U. S. 315 [32: 690]; Deputron v. Young, 134 U. S. 249 [33: 924]; Lehigh Min. & Mfg. Co. v. Kelly, 160 U. S. 327 [40: 444].

The question raised by this writ of error is whether the circuit court erred in dismissing the plaintiffs' suit for the alleged reason that the value of the property in dispute did not amount to the sum of $2,000, exclusive of interest and costs, and that, therefore, such suit did not really and substantially involve a dispute or controversy properly within the jurisdiction of said circuit court; and, as prescribed by the 5th section of the act of March 3, 1891, *such question of the jurisdiction of the[119 circuit court alone is presented for our decision. Shields v. Coleman, 157 U. S. 168 [39: 660].

The question whether the land in dispute was of a value sufficient to give the circuit court jurisdiction was purely one of fact, and as that question was not submitted to the jury, but was passed on by the court upon affidavit, it is now suggested that, upon a writ of error, this court cannot consider the facts disclosed by the affidavits, but is restricted to any errors of law shown by the record.

Undoubtedly, the general rule is that upon a writ of error only matters of law appearing on the face of the record can be considered, and that evidence, whether written or oral, and whether given to the court or to the jury, does not become a part of the record unless made so by some regular proceeding at the time of the trial and before the rendition of the judgment. Whatever the error may be, and in whatever stage of the cause it may have occurred, it must appear in the record, else it cannot be revised in a court of error exercising jurisdiction according to the course of the common law; and ordinarily a bill of exceptions lies only upon some point arising either upon the admission or rejection of evidence, or is a matter of law arising from a fact found, or not denied, and which has been overruled by the court. Arthurs v. Hart, 58 U. S. 17 How. 6 [15: 30].

The difficulty arises out of the peculiar character of the legislation which we are now considering. Prior to the passage of the act of 1875 questions going to the jurisdiction of the court could only be raised by a plea in abatement in the nature of a plea to the jurisdiction. See Farmington v. Pillsbury, 114 U. S. 138 [29: 114], and cases there cited. If such a plea presented a question of law upon the face of the record, this court could review the decision of the court below upon such question of law. If the plea asserted matters of fact dehors the record, it was open for the parties to agree upon a statement of facts, or to take exceptions to the rulings of the court in admitting or rejecting evidence offered to the jury or in giving instructions, and in either event only questions of law would be presented for our decision.

120] *But, under the act of 1875, the trial court is not bound by the pleadings of the parties, but may, of its own motion, if led to believe that its jurisdiction is not properly invoked, inquire into the facts as they really exist. Williams v. Nottawa Twp. 104 U. S. 209 [26: 719]; Barry v. Edmunds, 116 U.S. 550 [29:729]; Morris v. Gilmer, 129 U. S. 315 [32:690]; Deputron v. Young, 134 U. S. 249 [33: 924]. And our present problem is to preserve as well the power of the trial court to make such inquiries as the right of suitors, so expressly reserved to them in the statute, to have the action of the lower court reviewed by the Supreme Court of the United States.

In equity cases, which come up on appeal, and where the evidence on which the court below acted is presented here, the action of that court can be readily reviewed But in cases at law, like the present one, how can we review the judgment of the court below, unless that judgment is either based on the verdict of a jury or upon facts found in an agreed statement?

The statute does not prescribe any particular mode in which the question of the jurisdiction is to be brought to the attention of the court, nor how such question, when raised, shall be determined.

When such a question arises in an action at law its decision would usually depend upon matters of fact, and also usually involves a denial of formal, but necessary, allegation contained in the plaintiff's declaration or complaint. Such a case would be presented when the plaintiff's allegation that the controversy was between citizens of different states, or when, as in the present case, the allegation that the matter in dispute was of sufficient value to give the court jurisdiction, was denied.

In such cases, whether the question was raised by the defendant or by the court on its own motion, the court might doubtless order the issue to be tried by the jury. The action of the court, in the admission or rejection of evidence, or in instructing the jury, would thus be subjected to the review by this court which was intended by Congress.

Such was the course pursued in the case of Jones v. League, 59 U. S. 18 How. 76 [15: 263]. 121] *That was an action at law to try title to land. League, the plaintiff, averred himself to be a citizen of Maryland, the defendants being citizens of Texas. By a plea in abatement the defendants alleged that, at the time of the commencement of the suit, League was a citizen of Texas. On this plea the plaintiff took issue, and a trial of that issue was had, which resulted, under the instructions of the court, in a verdict of the jury for the plaintiff. The case was brought up, by a writ of error, to this court, where the validity of the instructions given by the trial court was considered.

A similar course was followed in the case of Chicago & Northwestern Ry. Co. v. Ohle, 117 U. S. 125 [29: 837]. There an action had been brought by Ohle in a state court of Iowa against the railway company, which took the case by a removal petition into the circuit court of the United States, on the ground that Ohle was a citizen of Iowa and the railway company a citizen of Illinois. Ohle was permitted by the circuit court to file a plea in abatement or to the jurisdiction, alleging that both he and the railway company were citizens of Illinois. Upon this plea issue was joined, and a trial had with a jury; and the cause was brought to this court by a writ of error, where the instructions of the court to the jury were reviewed and the judgment affirmed.

But the question might arise in such a shape that the court might consider and determine them without the intervention of a jury. And it would appear to have been the intention of Congress to leave the mode of raising and trying such issues to the discretion of the trial judge.

But whether the judge shall elect to submit the issue to the jury, or to himself hear and determine them, it is the manifest meaning of this legislation that, in either event, the parties are not to be concluded by the judgment of the circuit court. As we have already said, if the questions are submitted to the jury there will be a ready remedy, by proper exceptions and a writ of error, to correct any errors into which the trial court may have fallen. And if the court takes to itself the determination of the disputed questions, it is imperative, in order to give effect to the intention of Congress, that *its action must take a form that will ena- [122 ble this court to review it, so far as to determine whether the conclusion of the court below was warranted by the evidence before that court.

Thus in Barry v. Edmunds, 116 U. S. 550 [29: 729], where the judgment of the circuit court, dismissing a cause because in its opinion the matter in dispute did not amount to the jurisdictional value, was reversed, it was said: "In making such an order, therefore, the circuit court exercises a legal and not a personal discretion, which must be exerted in view of the facts sufficiently proved and controlled by fixed rules of law. It might happen that the judge, on the trial or hearing of a cause, would receive impressions amounting to a moral certainty that it does not really and substantially involve a dispute or controversy within the jurisdiction of the court. But upon such a personal conviction, however strong, he would not be at liberty to act, unless the facts on which the persuasion is based, when made distinctly to appear on the record, create a legal certainty of the conclusion based on them. Nothing less than this is meant by the statute when it provides that the failure of its jurisdiction on this account 'shall appear to the satisfaction of said circuit court.'" In Hartog v. Memory, Id. 588 [29:725], it was said: "No doubt if, from any source, the court is led to suspect that its jurisdiction has been imposed upon by the collusion of the parties or in any other way, it may at once of its own motion cause the necessary inquiry to be made, either by having the proper issue joined and tried, or by some other appropriate form of proceeding, and act as justice may require for its own protection against fraud or imposition. But the evidence on which the circuit court acts in dismissing the suit must be pertinent either to the issue made by the parties, or to the inquiry instituted by the court; and must appear of record if either party desires to invoke the exercise of the appellate jurisdiction of this court for the review of the order of dismissal. And when the defendant has not so pleaded as to entitle him to object to the jurisdiction, and the objection is taken by the court of its own motion, justice requires that the 123] plaintiff *should have an opportunity to be heard upon the motion, and to meet it by appropriate evidence."

And this language from Barry v. Edmunds was quoted with approval in the case of Deputron v. Young, 134 U. S. 252 [33: 929].

This court must therefore consider whether the judgment of the circuit court, dismissing the suit for want of jurisdiction, was warranted by the facts of the case as they are disclosed in the record.

The declaration was as follows:

"The plaintiff, George Peabody Wetmore, who is a citizen of the state of Rhode Island. Matilda C. Alloway, a citizen and resident of the state of Pennsylvania, V. K. Stevenson, Hugh Stevenson, Paul E. Stevenson, Eloise Stevenson Kernochan and James L. Kernochan, her husband, and Maxwell Stevenson, by Paul E. Stevenson, his next friend, all of whom are citizens and residents of the state of New York, sue the defendants, David Rymer, Sam. Rymer, Tom Payne, and W. Calvin McConnell, all of whom are citizens and residents of Polk county, Tennessee, to recover the following described lands, situate in the county of Polk, in the southern division of the eastern district of Tennessee, to wit:

"In town. one, range three east, of the basis line, Ocoee district.

"The south half of section one, the south half of section two, the northwest quarter of section eleven, all of section twelve, the southwest quarter of section thirteen.

"In town. two, range four east, of the basis line, Ocoee district.

"All of sections one and two and three and five and eight and nine and ten and eleven and twelve and thirteen and fourteen and fifteen and seventeen and twenty and twenty-one and twenty-two and twenty-three and twenty four and twenty-five and twenty-six and twenty-seven and twenty-eight and thirty-three and thirty-four and thirty-five, the north half and the southeast quarter of section six, the east half of section seven, the east half of section eighteen, the east half and the northwest quar- 124] ter of section nineteen, the *north half and the southeast quarter of section twenty-nine, the east half of section thirty-two, the west half of the west half of section thirty-six.

"In town. one, range four east, of the basis line, Ocoee district.

"All of sections thirty-one and thirty-five and thirty-six, the west half of section thirty-four.

"As shown on the general plan of the Ocoee district of the state of Tennessee, to which and the grants for said land reference is made for full description.

"Which lands are worth more than two thousand dollars and of which lands said plaintiffs were possessed, claiming in fee, before the commencement of this suit, and after said possession accrued the said defendants, on the 1st day of January, 1892, entered thereupon and unlawfully withhold and detain the same, together with one thousand dollars due for the detention thereof."

The plea was as follows:

"And now comes the defendant, David Rymer, and for plea to plaintiffs' declaration says that he is not in possession of and does not claim and has not entered upon or been in possession of or claimed any part of the lands in said declaration described, except the following described lands, to wit: The southwest ¼ of section 17, the north ½ of section 20, the east ½ and southwest ¼ of section 18, and the northeast ¼ of section 19, all in township 2, range 4 east, of the basis line, Ocoee district, Tennessee; and as to all the lands except those herein described this defendant here and now disclaims any and all interest, right, or title.

"And for further plea in this behalf said defendant says that as to the said southwest ¼ of section 17, the north ½ of section 20, the east ½ and southwest ¼ of section 18, and the northeast ¼ of section 19, all in township 2, range 4 east, of the basis line, Ocoee district, Polk county, Tennessee, he is not guilty in manner and form as the plaintiffs in their said declaration have alleged; and of this put himself upon the country."

The verdict and judgment were for all the lands claimed in *the declaration, being a[125 connected body of land of about 25,000 acres. The plea claimed right of possession of between 1,000 and 2,000 acres. The evidence upon which the court passed was restricted to the value of the land claimed by the defendants. And it is urged on behalf of the plaintiffs that the value of the entire tract claimed in the declaration and recovered by the verdict should have been considered in passing upon the question of the value of the matter in dispute; that, while the disclaimer may estop the defendants, it does not deprive the plaintiffs of their right to a verdict and judgment for the entire tract claimed, upon which a writ of possession may issue; that judgment in ejectment is conclusive as to title so far as the parties are concerned.

But we do not consider it necessary to consider or decide this contention, because we are of opinion that the evidence sufficiently disclosed, for the purposes of maintaining jurisdiction, that the value of the land claimed in the plea exceeded the sum of $2,000. As that evidence is brief it seems proper to state it in the very form in which it appears in the bill of exceptions.

At the trial and before the jury rendered their verdict, the plaintiffs introduced as a witness one Oscar W. Muller, who testified that he was a surveyor and had surveyed the lands for the plaintiffs. On cross-examination by defendants' attorney he testified that the market value of the land was 50 cents per acre; that it was wild or mountain land, and not worth more than that unless its prospective value was to be considered, and that the land described in the plea of the defendants was not worth $1,000.

After the verdict and judgment, and upon the motion made to dismiss, the plaintiffs filed the affidavit of Charles Seymour, who testified that he was the attorney and had been for twenty-five years the agent of what are known as the Wetmore and Stevenson lands, in Polk county, Tennessee, and that he is familiar with most of the lands and has been on the lands in dispute in this cause, and that the lands set out in the plea of the defendants lie on Lost creek and Little Lost creek, and form a connecting way 126] to many thousands of acres of land *of the plaintiffs, which lie in that vicinity, and that the lands described in this plea are worth more than $2,000 on account of their location, and are not to be judged by the general price for mountain land in the vicinity; that these lands lie near the foot of Frog mountain, on the northwesterly side, where the timber is more than usually heavy and unusually valuable, both for accessibility and quality.

The plaintiffs likewise filed the affidavit of J. B. Brock, in which he testified as follows:

"I have lived in Polk county over forty years; was sheriff for six years, and have herded cattle for about twenty-five years on and in vicinity of lands set out in defendants' plea, and I know the location of some twenty thousand acres lying near by, understood to be the property of Wetmore and Stevenson heirs, the plaintiffs in this suit. The lands described in the plea are worth much more than the ordinary mountain lands. I sold a quarter section of 160 acres lying a mile from the lands in the plea for $400, and the lands described in the plea are near the foot of the mountain, where the timber is better than on most of the mountains; and the way they lie, if I owned the Wetmore and Stevenson lands, I would not want to sell at all, as they are part of a large boundary that would be needed for shelter of cattle off the mountain and for roadways, and control of the ways to the herding grounds or timber-work, or if mining be done would be in the way. Not long before the defendant took the lease in 1888 from Wetmore and Stevenson he offered to make me a deed for some land a mile and a half from any land in his present plea in this suit."

The plaintiffs likewise filed the affidavit of O. W. Miller, who, having testified that he has been county surveyor for Polk county for a number of years, and has surveyed the lands in dispute, and also surrounding lands, said:

"While I value the mountain land as a whole at fifty cents per acre, the land in litigation, lying on the waters of Lost creek and Little Lost creek at the foot of the mountain, forms part of a connected body of land of about twenty-five thousand acres, and forms a gateway and 127]outlet to this body *for timber and stock to the Hiwassee river and railroad, without which the rest of the body would be materially reduced in value, say from ten to twenty cents per acre. To cut this off and permanently block this approach would reduce the value of the whole from two to four thousand dollars."

The defendants filed no affidavits and adduced no evidence on the question of value, but appeared to have relied wholly on the statement of O. W. Miller when under cross-examination at the trial.

It is not easy to see upon what sound view of this evidence the learned judge of the circuit court deprived the plaintiffs of their verdict and judgment. There was no pretense that the plaintiffs had fraudulently overstated the value of the land in order to confer jurisdiction.

It does not seem to have occurred to the defendants that the land which they claimed was not worth $2,000, until, at the trial, their attorney caught at the statement of one of plaintiffs' witnesses that he estimated wild mountain land at fifty cents per acre. When the court gave leave to both parties to file affidavits showing the value of the lands in controversy, the defendants were unable or unwilling to make or procure to be made a single statement under oath on the subject of the inquiry. A liberal presumption ought, therefore, to be indulged in favor of the plaintiffs' evidence in that regard. It is well known that there is no matter in respect to which the judgments of men more widely differ than in regard to the value of real estate.

We give no weight to that portion of the plaintiffs' evidence that goes to show damage to the balance of their lands by an adverse occupancy of the land claimed by the defendants. But looking only at the evidence bearing strictly on the value of the controverted lands, it seems obvious that while the market value of the wild mountain land generally was estimated by one of the witnesses at fifty cents an acre, yet it was testified by several witnesses that these particular lands possessed a special value by reason of their location at the foot of the mountain, and because the timber on them was more than usually heavy and valuable both for accessibility *and quality. [128 Charles Seymour, who had been familiar with the lands for twenty-five years as agent for their owner, testified that the lands described in the plea were worth more than $2,000 on account of their location and the quality of their timber, and were not to be adjudged by the general price for mountain land in the vicinity.

It is unnecessary to quote authorities to show that, in estimating the market value of land, everything which gives it intrinsic value is a proper element for consideration; not only its present use but its capabilities are to be considered. Even unimproved land lying at the foot of a mountain range is obviously more valuable than similar lands less eligibly situated.

Applying the law as heretofore stated by this court, in the cases cited, that a suit cannot be properly dismissed by a circuit court as not substantially involving a controversy within its jurisdiction, unless the facts, when made to appear on the record, create a legal certainty of that conclusion, we conclude that, in the present case, the want of jurisdiction was not made clear, and that the evidence before that court did not warrant a dismissal of the action for the want of jurisdiction.

The judgment of the Circuit Court dismissing the action is accordingly reversed, and the cause is remanded with directions to restore the judgment on the verdict.

Spanish grant, when not sufficient to sustain ejectment.

A Spanish grant of "an extension or tract of the bay of Pensacola, whose superficies of water" is equal to a certain area, "with the depth from the surface of the water as far as 10 feet English below the actual bottom . . . the whole in full property, and for the purpose of constructing wharves and houses for bathing," reserving the right of the public to construct wharves, is not a grant of title, but of a mere license, easement, or right of use which will not sustain ejectment, where no evidence of prior possession is given.

Submitted December 13, 1897. Decided January 17, 1898.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of Florida to review a judgment of that court affirming the judgment of the Circuit Court of Escambia County, Florida, in favor of defendants, in an action of ejectment brought by William Richardson, trustee, plaintiff, against the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company et al., for a tract of or extension of the Bay of Pensacola. On motion to dismiss. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Gregory L. Smith for defendants in error, for motion to dismiss.

Mr. W. A. Blount for plaintiff in error, in opposition to motion.

Mr. Chief Justice Fuller delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action of ejectment brought by plaintiff in error in the circuit court of Escambia county, Florida.

On the trial plaintiff offered in evidence an alleged Spanish grant of several tracts from Don Alexander Ramirez, intendant of the army and superintendent general of Cuba and the two Floridas, to Don Vicente Sebastian 130] Pintado with proof of *execution; and also deraignment of paper title from Pintado's heirs to himself. No evidence was offered of actual prior occupation. The property sued for was included in one of the tracts, described as follows:

"The lands designated by the letter C are an extension or tract of the bay of Pensacola, whose superficies of water is equal to an area of 718½ arpents, superficial, occupying between the eastern point of the mouth of the creek of Casa Blanca, commonly called Bayou Chico, and the western point of the mouth of the rivulet or creek of Texar, commonly called Bayou Texar, and a line drawn in the direction of southeast of the needle, 95 perches of Paris, within the sea, from the aforesaid first point, and the other line of 100 of said perches in length, counted from the second point mentioned within the sea, also from the same point of southeast of the needle, which embraces the whole of the front from the one to the other mouth of the creeks of Casa Blanca and Texar, between which is the town of Pensacola, the whole conforming and according to the plan annexed, made for the greater clearness and understanding in which is represented the figure which the said land forms in the water and the limits within the bay of Pensacola, being that part of the land and beach which is found between the said two points of the mouths of the mentioned creeks, the curve which the shore of the water of the sea at the highest tide in calm weather makes, and with the depth from the surface of the water as far as 10 feet English below the actual bottom, or towards the center of the earth, in the whole, the space which the figure represented in the said plan C embraces, considering it as a solid, since it has these three dimensions of longitude, latitude, and depth. . . . The whole in full property and for the purpose of constructing wharves and houses for bathing, reserving and saving, not only the right of his majesty, but also that of the public, at all times whenever it becomes convenient, and it be designed to construct wharves with whatsoever funds, municipal or common, intending the exclusion only with respect to particular individuals."

*Defendants objected to the introduc- [131 tion of the grant upon the following grounds, viz.:

"The grant so far as it relates to the locus in quo was a mere license to Pintado to use the property in a particular way and vested in him no sufficient title upon which to recover in ejectment.

"Because said grant, so far as it relates to the locus in quo, was not an exclusive grant of the property occupied by the defendants.

"Because said grant, so far as it relates to the locus in quo, was not within the delegated authority of the officer who attempted to grant the same.

"Because said grant, so far as it relates to the locus in quo, is not one which was validated or recognized by the treaty between the United States and Spain.

"Because it is not shown that Alexander Ramirez had the power or authority to make said grant, so far as it related to the locus in quo."

The trial court sustained defendants' objections and excluded the grant, and plaintiff excepted.

Thereupon a verdict was returned for defendants and judgment entered thereon, from which an appeal was taken to the supreme court of the state. In that court the plaintiff in error assigned but one error, to wit. "The refusal of the court to admit in evidence the grant from Alexander Ramirez to Vicente S. Pintado."

The supreme court of Florida affirmed the judgment, and held that the purpose of the grant "as to the water front therein described was not to grant the land and water as such within the described limits, but the right to use the same, within such limits and to the depth stated below the surface of the soil, for the purpose of constructing wharves and houses for bathing, such right of use being to the exclusion of any similar right of use in any other individuals, and subordinate to the right of the King and the public to construct wharves with municipal or common funds within such limits; also, that while the King of Spain could have made such a grant to Pintado, it would have 132]been contrary to his laws then in *force in West Florida and a case of special exception from their effect, and that Ramirez had no authority to make the grant, and it was void and vested no title in the grantee." Richardson v. Sullivan's Executors [38 Fla. 90], 20 So. Rep. 815. And see Sullivan v. Richardson, 33 Fla. 1, where the case is fully considered on a prior appeal.

On affirming the judgment the supreme court entered an order to the effect that, in holding the grant void, a claim by plaintiff of a right, title, or privilege under the treaty between the United States and Spain of February 22, 1819, had been disposed of adversely to him; and a writ of error from this court was allowed.

As before stated, defendants objected to the admission of the grant in evidence on the grounds that, so far as it related to the locus in quo, it "was a mere license to Pintado to use the property in a particular way, and vested in him no sufficient title on which to recover in ejectment;" and also that the grant "was not within the delegated authority of the officer who attempted to grant the same." Thus the construction of the grant and its validity were presented for consideration as distinct inquiries, and while the trial court assigned no reasons for its action, the supreme court passed on both questions, and in its first opinion elaborately discussed them.

But in sustaining the ruling of the trial court in excluding the alleged grant, the supreme court rested its decision on the want of authority to make such a grant as it held this to be. Therefore, the contention on behalf of plaintiff in error is that this court necessarily has jurisdiction. As, however, we entirely concur with the state court in the view that the grant was not a grant of title, but of a mere license, easement, or right of use, and no evidence of prior possession was offered, we need not consider whether the grant as thus correctly construed was valid or not, for, even if valid, the ruling on this record could not have been other than it was. The ruling was so obviously correct that we do not feel constrained to retain the case for further argument. Chanute City v. Traper, 132 U. S. 210 [33: 345]

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of Iowa to review a judgment of that court affirming the judgment of an inferior court of that State in favor of Patrick L Solan, plaintiff, against the Chicago, Milwaukee, & St. Paul Railway Company, for the recovery of damages for injuries to plaintiff from the derailing, by defendant's negligence, of a caboose attached to a freight train of defendant. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. George E. Clarke, Burton Hanson, and George R. Peck for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. S. M. Stockslager and George C. Heard for defendant in error.

Mr. Justice Gray delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action brought in an inferior court of the state of Iowa against a railroad corporation incorporated under the laws of the state of Wisconsin, and authorized to transact business in the state of Iowa, and having a railroad extending from Rock Valley in Iowa to Chicago in Illinois, to recover $10,000, as damages for injuries suffered by the plaintiff between Boyden and Sheldon in Iowa, from the derailing, by the defendant's negligence, of a caboose attached to a freight train of the defendant, in which the plaintiff was traveling under a written contract by which the defendant agreed to carry him with cattle from Rock Valley to Chicago.

The defendant, in its answer, denied its negligence, and alleged contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff; and further alleged that by a clause in the contract under which the plaintiff and the cattle were carried it was "among other things expressly stipulat [134 ed that the company shall in no event be liable to the owner or person in charge of said stock for any injury to his person in any amount exceeding the sum of $500;' that in consideration of said clause in said contract the defendant entered into a contract for the transportation of said stock from Rock Valley, Iowa, to Chicago, Illinois, for a less sum than its regular, usual charges, which fact the owner and ship-

In some states it has been held that the carrier may, by express contract, limit its liability for damages caused by the negligence of its servants. Spinetti v. Atlas S. S. Co. 80 N. Y. 71, 36 Am. Rep. 579; Westcott v. Fargo, 61 N. Y. 542, 19 Am. Rep. 300; Pearsall v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 124 N. Y. 268; Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Skeels, 3 W.Va. 556; Farmers' & M. Bank v. Champlain Transp. Rep. 75; Ulrich v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 108 N. Y. 80.

It cannot by a general notice limit its liability. Steele v. Townsend, 37 Ala. 247, 79 Am. Dec. 49; Michigan S. & N. I. R. Co. v. Heaton, 31 Ind. 397, note; Kimball v. Rutland & B. R. In order that it may limit its liability by a notice in a receipt, it must be shown that it was assented to by the shipper (Southern Exp. Co. v. Crook, 44 Ala. 468, 4 Am. Rep. 140; Peck v. Weeks, 34 Conn. 145; Southern Exp. Co. v. Newby, 36 Ga. 635, 91 Am. Dec. 783; Illinois C. R. Co. v. Frankenberg, 54 Ill. 88, 5 Am. Rep. 92; Little v. Boston & M. R. Co. 66 Me. 239; Buckland v. Co. 64 N. C. 235; Mann v. Birchard, 40 Vt. 326), or brought to his knowledge (Sager v. Portsmouth S. & P. & E. R. Co. 31 Me. 238, 1 Am. Rep. 659; Camden & A. R. Co. v. Baldauf, 16 Pa. 67; Laing v. Colder, 8 Pa. 479, 49 Am. Dec. 533).

Every presumption is against an intention to contract for immunity of the carrier for not exercising ordinary diligence, and hence the general rule is that contracts will not be construed as exempting from liability for negligence unless expressed in unequivocal terms; such exemption will not be inferred from general words in the contract. Mynard v. Syracuse, B. & N. Y. R. Co. 71 N. Y. 180; Nicholas v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 89 N. Y. 370; Kenney v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 125 N. Y. 422; Zimmer v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 42 N. Co. 32 N. Y. 333; Jeanings v. Grand Trunk R. Co. 127 N. Y. 438; Park v. Preston, 108 N. Y. 434.

In England since the railway and canal traffic act of 1854 a common carrier may exempt himself from liability for negligence by express contract, provided the circumstances make such an exemption just and reasonable. per of said stock and the plaintiff all well knew at the time of the making of the said contract and at the time the plaintiff started in transit with said stock from Rock Valley, Iowa, to Chicago, Illinois; that said contract related exclusively to interstate transportation and constituted an interstate commerce transaction, and that the plaintiff and the owner and shipper of said stock, having accepted the benefits of said contract, are now estopped from questioning its validity or disavowing the same; that at common law said contract is a valid and legal contract, and that § 1308 of the Code of Iowa is void and unconstitutional, so far as said contract is concerned, as being an attempt to regulate and limit contracts relating to interstate commerce; that under and by virtue of the terms of said contract plaintiff is not entitled in any event to judgment herein to exceed the sum of $500."

The section of the Code of Iowa, referred to in the answer, is as follows: "No contract, receipt, rule, or regulation shall exempt any corporation engaged in transporting persons or property by railway from liability of a common carrier, or carrier of passengers, which would exist had no contract, receipt, rule, or regulation been made or entered into." Iowa Code of 1873, § 1308.

At the trial, it appeared that the plaintiff and the cattle under his charge were carried under such a contract as alleged in the answer, and that he suffered injuries as alleged in the declaration; and the court, against the defendant's objections and exceptions, excluded evidence offered by the defendant that the rate on cattle carried the same distance under contracts other than this one was 50 per cent higher than was charged by this contract; and instructed the jury that, if the *defendant was [135 negligent and the plaintiff was without fault, the jury should allow him such a sum as would compensate him for his injuries; and that the clause in the contract, limiting the plaintiff's damages to $500, was not permitted by law, and was void.

The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff in the sum of $1,000, upon which judgment was rendered. The defendant appealed to the supreme court of Iowa, which affirmed the

A recovery for damages to a passenger from negligence may be had, notwithstanding the contract under which he rides contains a clause exempting the carrier therefrom, if such contract is one providing for the transportation of freight for hire and the passenger is to look after it during transit. Smith v. New York C. R. Co. 24 N. Y. 222.

A common carrier may lawfully contract to exempt itself from liability for negligence in consideration of carrying a person and his property at reduced rates. Bissell v. New York C. R. Co. 25 N. Y. 442, 82 Am. Dec. 369.

Loading stock on a car is not part of a journey so as to come within a clause in a pass exempting a carrier from injuries to persons riding free to take care of the stock. Stinson v. New York C. R. Co. 32 N. Y. 333, 88 Am. Dec. 332.

A contract to carry a person free, assuming no liability in the matter, is not sufficient to free a carrier from liability for the consequences of its negligence. Blair v. Erie R. Co. 66 N. Y. 313, 23 Am. Rep. 55.

When a common carrier is required by law to transport anyone without charge, the latter's involuntary acceptance of a pass containing a stipulation against liability for damages does not operate as a forfeiture of the right to recover them. Seybolt v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. 95 N. Y. 562, 47 Am. Rep. 75.

When a person is travelling under a pass containing the usual agreement of assumption by him of all risk of accident, his purchase of a seat in a drawing-room car does not nullify such agreement. Ulrich v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 108 N. Y. 80.
